PREFACE.

AMONG the various Pursuits of Mankind, there is, perhaps, no Study which contributes in so great a Degree to Instruction and Amusement, as that of History; for while it describes the Progress of Nations from Rudeness to a Civilized State, it presents us with a Detail of all those Particulars which are most interesting to the Human Race; and while it tends to remove every Kind of Prejudice, by enlarging the Sphere of our Ideas, it inculcates those Duties which we owe as Men, and as thé Members of a Community. But though the History of every Nation excites Curiosity and Attention, that of a free People exhibits the greatest Variety of Contests and Revolutions, and affords the most ample Field for the Exertion of Eloquence and Political Sagacity. England, in particular, offers, at least in modern Times, the greatest Number of important Objects to the Historian, the more especially if we consider the eventful Period of the present Reign; and although its Transactions have been delineated by very able and intelligent Writers; yet their voluminous Publications on this Subject, while they gratify those who have Leisure, and possess a Taste for Enquiry, are too minute and circumstantial for the Generality of Readers. It is admitted, that there have been many Histories of England published at different Periods; but few of them seem calculated to convey that Information which it is the peculiar Province of the Historian to confine himself to. Some have been written with the avowed Purpose of supporting the Prerogative of the Crown, upon high Tory Principles; others have been put forth with the View of advancing Party Notions, and in Defence of Democratical Ideas; and others again have been so much interspersed with Reflections and Observations on almost every Transaction, that they appear to be calculated more for the Purport of acquainting the World with the Writers' Opinion of the State of Affairs, than to lay before the Public an impartial Account of Events which have taken place concerning the Realm. No Work therefore written avowedly on Party Principles is properly calculated for the Conveyance of that Information which is essentially required; and as it is sufficient for the general Reader to be informed of the great Facts in the History of England, the Author of the present Work has restricted himself to the recording of mere Matter of Fact, totally divested of Prejudice to this or that Party or Faction, and unsophisticated with jesuitical Animadversion.

In the Prosecution of this Work it has necessarily been requisite to consult an immense Body of History, as well of our own as of other Nations; but the principal Authors we have chosen to make Use of are, Rapin, Tindal, Burnet, Carte, Hume, Smollet, Belsham, Clarendon, Guthrie, Macaulay, Coote, Henry, Andrews's Continuation of Henry's History, Bisset, Adolphus, and the Universal History. But in the Perusal of the above Authors it was particularly necessary to pay Attention to the Political and other Observations which they made upon many Transactions and Circumstances; to the End, that we might avoid falling into their Errors, and select only those Passages which bore Marks of undoubted Authenticity. Mr. Rapin's History of England with Tindal's Continuation has been generally allowed to be one of the best with which this Country has been favoured, so far as it reaches; but this Work is too voluminous for general Use. The Facts recorded therein are, for the most part, authentic, and the Dates are pretty accurate; but the Reflections of the Author, take up so great a Portion of his Work, that they rather tend to bewilder than inform the Reader. Mr. Hume's History is an elegant Piece of Composition, its Language is admirable, but he was defective in his Dates. He was avowedly a Republican and a Freethinker; so that while he seems to be writing in Praise of the State, he is endeavouring to sow the Seeds of a contrary Opinion: and whenever he had Occasion to mention Religion, he appears to have been desirous of playing a double Part, of seeming to some as if he reverenced, and to others as if he held it in Contempt. He appears indeed throughout his Work to be sensible of the political Necessity of Religion in every State; but at the same Time he would every where insinuate, that it owes its Authority to no higher an Origin.

Thus

Thus he endeavours to weaken its Influence, while he seems to contend for its Utility, and vainly hopes, that while Freethinkers shall applaud his Scepticism, real Believers will reverence him for his Zeal.—Mr. Smollet's History, Part of which usually accompanies Mr. Hume's as a Continuation to the End of the Reign of George the Second, is greatly inferior to that Gentleman's in point of Style and Elegance of Diction, and is likewise deficient in Matter of Fact.—Lord Clarendon's History is entirely a Party Work, written for the express Purpose of establishing arbitrary Power and the Prerogative of the Crown; and that of Catharine Macaulay, is on the avowed Principles of Republicanism.

In the present State of Affairs in the World, particularly in Europe, it is almost impossible for any Man, especially those who are engaged in Literary Pursuits, not to have some Opinion peculiar to himself; the Author of the present Work undoubtedly has his, but he does not think it necessary to trouble the World with the Notions which he esteems best suited for the Welfare of the Commonwealth: he thinks every Man should judge for himself; therefore he has kept himself from speaking in the Praise of one and condemning another Minister, merely for the sake of displaying his Talents in Eulogium, or of venting his Spleen in Sarcasm; so that whenever he has thought it necessary to say any Thing of Men or Measures, he has constantly been extremely brief, and has not hazarded an Opinion which is contrary to the General Feelings of every Englishman: Truth has been his Aim, and to that Maxim he has strenuously adhered. He has therefore kept himself at an equal Distance from that Conciseness which borders upon Obscurity, and that Prolixity which enervates Narration. He has taken his Information from a Consultation of our best Historians, and has omitted no Event of Importance. He has explained with Perspicuity the complicated Fabric of the Feodal Polity, and has examined with Attention the Constitution of our Government. He has neither allured the Vanity of the Great by Flattery, nor attempted to satisfy the Malignity of the Vulgar by Scandal. He has therefore contented himself with a faithful Detail of Historical Facts, and has kept himself free from the Charge of Petulancy or Adulation. Such is the Plan upon which this Work is written. One Thing, however, it may be necessary to observe, that the more important Matter is preserved in the Text, while that of less Consequence is thrown into Notes. Historical Documents, in the Form of Abstracts of Treaties, whether relative to the Affairs of State, or confined to the Purposes of Commercial Intercourse, by Reason of the Space they would occupy if inserted in the Text, are likewise preserved in the Notes.

The Engravings, with which this Work is embellished, are of that superlative Description which will not only add Elegance to the History, and illustrate the different Passages, but in a strong Point of View mark the Progress of that Branch of the Polite Arts in this Country. Printing and Engraving did not, in Great Britain, keep Pace with Literature; for till within the last Half Century all our best Engravings were had from abroad, and Encouragement to English Artists seemed totally neglected: the Want of Emulation to excel was the natural Consequence. The Taste and sound Judgment of the British Nation, however, would not suffer the Palm of Excellence to remain in the Hands of Foreigners. As Encouragement took Place, Talent made rapid Progress; and at this Day, English Engravings are in the highest Estimation all over the World, and our noblest and best Literary Compositions are accompanied and adorned with Embellishments suited to the Dignity of their Subjects.

THE

FRONTISPIECE.

BRITANNIA in the Centre, seated on a Rock, one Arm resting on the Bible, behind which is seen the Model of a Ship;—intended to convey this important Truth, that the grand Supports of the BRITISH EMPIRE are its Commerce and its Religion. At her Feet are,—Malice, bound Hand and Foot, and Superstition overthrown. Thus having conquered the internal Enemies of her Peace, Britannia is surveying, with Firmness and Composure, the Storms that agitate the Universe; she hears, unmoved, the Crash of Empires, and sits secure amidst a falling World.

Two Tuscan Columns, Emblems of the Simplicity and Strength of the British Character, support the whole Composition. A String of Tablets are seen passing round, and occasionally displaying the Names of those Princes who have contributed most to the Glory of the Empire, and whose Memories are cherished by Englishmen with Veneration and Gratitude. On one Side are Implements of War and Trophies of Victory, and on the other, Instruments of scientific Research; through one passes a Scroll, containing the Names of those Heroes whose Achievements have added Splendour to the British Name; and the other is inscribed with the Names of the Philosophers, whose Conquests over Nature have obtained for them a still more glorious and permanent Reward—the Admiration of Posterity! At the Bottom are seen the Rudder, the Ploughshare, and the Sickle; which, together with the Lamb, placed in the Centre, are intended to shew, that whatever temporary Fame we may obtain by the Splendour of our Arms, or the Extent of our Conquests, the Basis of real national Glory must ever be—Commerce, Agriculture, and the Arts of Peace. The Scroll at the Top, with the Names of celebrated Divines, surrounded by Glory, completes the Whole, and makes perfect the leading Idea of the Design; the Object of which is to illustrate an important Truth, drawn from the Pages of History, namely, that Commerce is the Means of the Growth of Empires, and Religion the Bulwark of their Security.

THE IMPERIAL

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER.

IT is a remark that has been made by the most enlightened authors, that, in perusing the history of the earlier periods of nations in general, we are presented with an uniform picture of ignorance, barbarism, and superstition. We perceive the harsh features of native ferocity, free from reserve, disguise, or affectation. We observe the licentious manners, the rude amusements, and the barbarous rites of illiterate tribes. The general prevalence of this savage state accounts for the darkness in which the origin of nations are enveloped. This obscurity, which, among the readers, as well as the writers, of history, is a constant theme of regret, cannot be supposed to suffer any diminution from the practice of the more ancient historiographers, who, instigated by vanity, caprice, or credulity, have ever been desirous of reserving the origin of their respective nations to periods of the remotest antiquity; and in the gratification of this desire they have too frequently disregarded the suggestions of truth, reason and probability. Indeed, the ancient history of this country is so much involved in uncertainty, that even the origin of its name rests upon conjecture. The most probable opinion is, that the word BRITAIN is derived from the Phœnician BARAT-ANAC, i. e. THE LAND OF TIN; or, that it is taken from BRITHAN, which signifies OUTER, because it was the farthest land known at that period. The inhabitants, however, called themselves CYMRI.

This island was, without doubt, originally peopled from that part of the continent which lay opposite to the coast of Kent, and which was then called Gaul. This idea is confirmed by the affinity between the language, religion, manners, customs, and complexion of the Gauls and Britons.

The people of Britain were, in general, tall and well made, and yellow-haired; which they permitted to grow to a great length, but shaved the whole face, except the upper lip, on which they encouraged the growth of enormous whiskers. Their constitution was so good, that it is said they frequently lived to the age of one hundred and twenty years.

The use of cloaths was scarcely known in the island; for none but the inhabitants of the southern parts made use of any sort of covering, and those that did, carelessly threw the skin of some wild beast over them. By way of ornament, they made incisions in their bodies, in the shape of flowers, trees, and animals; which they stained of a sky-blue colour with the juice of woad (a).

The aboriginals generally lived among the woods, in huts covered over with skins, boughs, or turf. Their usual food was milk, and flesh got by hunting. If they bred any domestic fowl, it was for pleasure, being strictly forbidden by their religion to eat either poultry or fish. Their towns, if such they might be called, were only a confused parcel of huts placed at a little distance from each other, without any regard to order. These were generally erected in the middle of a wood, the avenues whereof were defended with slight ramparts of earth, or with the trees which they felled to clear the ground. Notwithstanding this plain manner of living, they were as quick of apprehension, nay, even of greater penetration, than their neighbours the Gauls, and were remarkable for honesty, integrity, and hospitality. They had this curious custom among them; that ten or more brothers lived together, and had their wives in common; and the children produced from such an indiscriminate and incestuous commerce were adjudged to belong to those who had originally married the respective mothers (b).

It seems, indeed, extremely probable, that the jealousy for which the Phœnicians were remarkable, induced them to avoid communicating to other nations any intelligence respecting Britain; for they reaped such benefit from their traffic with this island, that it is reasonable to suppose, they wished to be the exclusive carriers of its commodities to the different parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa, with which they traded. This advantage, it is certain, they enjoyed for a considerable time; but the Greeks at length made a discovery of the island, and commenced an immediate traffic for those articles of British produce which they had before received through the medium of the Phœnicians. The chief commodities that were hence exported by these commercial adventurers, were tin, lead, and hides, for which they bartered earthen ware, salt, brass trinkets, and other trifles. But for some time previous to the invasion by Cæsar, the Gauls appear to have been the only foreign nation that carried on a direct trade with the Britons. Their intercouse was not confined, like that of the Phœnicians and Greeks, to the coast of Cornwall and the islands of Scilly (c), but extended to the greater portion of the long range of coast in the southernmost parts of the island, though the inhabitants of Kent are supposed to have had the principal share of the Gallic commerce.

The natives of the more inland parts of Britain, however, had very little trade or connection with the Belgic Britons, and still less with foreigners: their wealth was comprised in their herds of cattle, which they bartered, as occasion required, for other articles which, to them, appeared to be more necessary for their convenience. But notwithstanding the practice of bartering, the Britons carried on a part of their trade by the medium of pieces of metal; which, according to Cæsar, were either plates of brass, or rings of iron, of a determinate weight.

The arts of ship-building and navigation must have been very imperfectly understood by them. The vessels which they made use of were extremely small and light; the keels and ribs of which were formed of slender pieces of wood, the intermediate spaces were composed of wicker work, and the whole was covered with hides.

The military art, among a rude and savage people, divided into petty and discordant states, is generally better understood than others which relate to civil society. This seems to have been the case in Britain. The frequency of wars between contiguous powers kept the inhabitants always prepared for action, stimulated their courage, and increased their experience. All the members of the state, except the Druids, (who were the ministers of religion,) were accustomed, from their youth, to martial exercises, in which they took great delight. The songs of their Bards contributed to cherish this warlike spirit, and the doctrine of the metempsychosis, in which they firmly believed, inspired them with a contempt of danger and of death. The offensive arms of the British infantry were daggers, broad-swords, javelins, and spears headed with copper or edged with flint; at the upper end of which was a hollow ball of brass, filled with pieces of metal, for the purpose of terrifying the horses of the enemy. Their defensive armour consisted of a light round target, made of wood, or osiers closely interwoven, covered with leather, and studded with brass nails, for strength as well as ornament. Their troops of horse were furnished with spears, shields, and broad swords; and the men would frequently dismount, and engage with the enemy on foot: their horses were so well trained, it has been asserted, with confidence, that they would remain on the spot where they were left till the return of their riders. The principal men of the state usually fought in chariots, which were generally drawn by two horses, and provided with sharp scythes and hooks fixed to the axle-tree. These carriages contained the charioteer and one or more warriors (d).

(a) It is worthy of remark, that a similar practice still prevails among the natives of the newly-discovered islands in the South Pacific Ocean.

(b) See Cæsar. De Bello Gallico, lib. v. cap. 10.—Dio Nicæus likewise informs us, that the same custom was common among the Caledonians, at the time of the emperor Severus's expedition against them. He also relates a conversation that took place on this subject between Julia, the wife of that emperor, and a British lady of rank. The empress, he says, was rallying the latter on the prevalence of this disgraceful practice among her countrywomen. The British lady, in her reply did not deny the charge, but observed, "that the Roman ladies had little reason to reproach them on that account; for they only performed openly with the best of their men what the former practised in secret with the worst of theirs, namely, freedmen and slaves." Xiphil. ex Dione.

(c) Called by them Cassiterides.

When an army of Britons was composed of the troops of several princes, each chieftain was captain of his own tribe; the sovereign of each state was commander in chief of the united tribes; and one of the sovereigns whose troops were thus confederated, was chosen generalissimo of the whole force. They generally attacked their enemy with the most eager impetuosity; but their ardour was too frequently cooled by the first repulse, after which it was difficult to rally them. When engaged in action they would sometimes retreat in apparent disorder, with an intention of drawing the enemy in pursuit of them; and when this feint had the desired effect, they returned to the charge with redoubled alacrity and ferocity.

It is a circumstance worthy of remark, that among the ancient inhabitants of Britain, every mother, notwithstanding her rank, nursed all her own children; not thinking it possible that the duties of nature could be performed by deputy, or that the care of a nurse employed for that purpose could prove an adequate substitute for parental affection. They always allowed their children to enjoy the free use of their limbs, which were wholly exempt from the stricture of dress. To this practice, together with the remarkable simplicity of their diet, it is that Cæsar very properly attributes the great strength of body, as well as boldness of mind, to which the British youth in general attained.

The religion of every country has a great influence on its government, and that of the Britons formed one of its most essential parts. The authority of their Druids, or priests, was almost unlimited: it was not merely confined to religious duties, but extended to the administration of all civil judicature (e). Besides the Druids, who were extremely numerous, there were also Druidesses, who shared the duties and participated the honours and emoluments of the priesthood. These Druidesses are supposed, on good authority, to have been divided into three classes.

The first class, like the Roman Catholic nuns, made vows of perpetual celibacy, lived together in communities, and mixed but little with the world. They were held in great veneration by the people, who resorted to them for purposes of divination and prophecy, to which these virgin fanatics were great pretenders; but, like more modern adepts in those mystic sciences, they refused to exert their knowledge till they were inspired by a present.

The second class was composed of certain devotees, who were married, but who allotted a much more considerable portion of their time to the discharge of religious than of conjugal duties.

The third and lowest class of Druidesses consisted of such as were employed in menial offices about the temples or persons of the Druids.

The Druids of Britain, like the Chaldeans of Assyria, the Magi of Persia, the Gymnosophists of India, and indeed all other priests of antiquity, had two sets of religious tenets: one of which they only imparted to such as were admitted into their own order, who were sworn to secrecy; nor was any precaution neglected which ingenuity could invent, or interest suggest, to prevent the promulgation of their secret doctrines. What those doctrines were it is impossible to say; but there is strong reason for believing that they were more agreeable to primitive tradition and to right reason than those which they rendered public, since they could have no possible temptation to conceal or disguise the truth in their private seminaries. "There is one thing," however, says Pomponius Mela, "which they teach their disciples, that has been made known to the people, in order to inspire them with courage, and to render them strangers to fear; which is, that souls are immortal, and that there is another life after the present."

We are informed by Cæsar, as well as by Diodorus Siculus, that the Druids likewise taught the Pythagorean doctrine of the metemsychosis, or the transmigration of souls, into other bodies. They probably considered this doctrine in no other light than as best suited to the gross conceptions of the vulgar, and as the most certain mode of securing obedience to their will by the powerful operations of religious terror. Whatever their own private opinions might have been, they were of little benefit to the multitude, from whom they were concealed with the most studious perseverance. These mercenary priests, like too many in more modern times, had adopted the maxim, that ignorance is the mother of devotion; and that the common people, incapable of being governed by the principles of plain reason, require to be awed by the more imposing rites of superstition. For this purpose they called in the aid of mythology, and admitted a plurality of gods.—Hesus, Teutates, Belinus or Bel, and Taranis, were their chief deities (f). Exclusive of these principal deities, they had a long list of inferior gods; men who had been deified by their eminence in wisdom, their valour, or their virtue.

The Britons likewise made sacrifices to the objects of their idolatry. They were not content, however, with the mere sacrifice of animals to their gods, but were urged, by the cruelty of superstition, to the offering up of human victims. That nothing but the life of a man could atone for the life of a man, had become an article in the Druidical creed, and was productive of the most horrid acts of barbarity which the fury of fanaticism could suggest. On some particular occasions they formed with osier twigs a large colossal figure of a man, which they filled with human victims; and, surrounding the whole with combustible materials, set fire to it, and reduced it to ashes. Though they gave a preference to criminals for this abominable purpose, as being most acceptable to their gods; yet, when a sufficient number were not to be had, they made no scruple to supply their places with innocent victims (g).

"The Druids," says Pliny, "had such an esteem for the oak, that they would not suffer any religious ceremony to be performed without being embellished with garlands made of its leaves. These philosophers," adds he, "believe that it is the chosen tree of God, and that whatever grows upon it cometh from Heaven." In consequence of this belief the misletoe shared in the honours paid to the (d) The dexterity of the islanders in the management of these destructive vehicles is mentioned by ancient writers in terms of the highest commendation. They could stop the horses at full speed, with the greatest ease, even on the declivity of steep hills, and immediately guide and turn them: they could run along the pole, rest on the yoke, and thence, with surprising agility, return to their seats. They drove their chariots with great fury among the thickest ranks of the enemy, diffusing terror and confusion around them; and when they engaged the horse, they leaped from these machines, and fought on foot; their charioteers in the mean time retiring, and posting themselves in such a station, that, if their masters were in danger of being overpowered by numbers, they might effect a speedy retreat to their chariots. By this mode of combat (says Cæsar, lib. iv. cap. 29.) they blended the speed of cavalry with the steadiness of infantry.

(e) The first principles of their religion had, without doubt, descended to them, together with their language, from Gomer, the eldest son of Japhet; from whom the Gauls, the Britons, and all the other Celtic nations, derived their origin: but, unhappily, this religious knowledge had, in the course of its traditional descent from Gomer (Japhet was born one hundred years before the deluge, and Gomer a little after it,) to his numerous posterity in succeeding ages, been corrupted by superstition, and was, at this period, replete with absurdity, wickedness, and cruelty.

(f) Hesus and Teutates were names originally expressive of the attributes of the Supreme Being; the first signifying Omnipotence, the last God the Creator: but in these times of superstitious idolatry, they were worshipped as particular deities. To Hesus they paid the same divine honours as were rendered to Mars by the Greeks and Romans; and Teutates was their Pluto, the god of the infernal regions, whose favour they solicited by such offerings as could only be acceptable to an infernal deity. Belinus or Bel was the same with Apollo; and Taranis was named from Taran, which signifies thunder.

(g) These sacrifices were generally offered in times of public danger, to appease the anger, or to ensure the protection, of their deities; but sometimes merely to promote the cure of persons of rank labouring under some dangerous disorder.

oak; and the ceremony of cutting that arboreous plant, as performed by the Archdruid with a golden knife, was one of their most solemn festivals. This Archdruid, whose residence was at Mona (h), now the Isle of Anglesey, in North Wales, from the nature and extent of his authority, may be considered as the metropolitan, or the pontiff, of the Britons.

Had our ancestors, from their skill in divination, been enabled to foresee that their posterity would in future ages arrive at the summit of glory by means of the oak, of which their ships of war are built, they could not have held that sovereign of the British forests in higher respect or veneration.

We learn from Tacitus, that the Druids held it was not lawful to build temples to their gods, or to worship them under roofs, or within walls; for which reason their places of worship were the thickest woods and groves, planted for that purpose in proper situations. Each of these sacred retreats was surrounded by a ditch, to secure it from intrusion; and in the centre was an open space, of a circular form, containing an altar of four broad stones, three placed edgeways, and the fourth at top, for the purpose of sacrifice (i).

From the testimony of the best authors it appears, that the general form of government which prevailed in Britain was the monarchical; and that the whole island was divided into thirty-nine small states, which were independent of each other (k). These numerous nations were in a state of continual perturbation; each shaken by domestic faction, or harrassed by wars with its neighbours. The Britons, altogether unacquainted with those arts which give charms to peace, and add a zest to the enjoyments it procures, conceived a strong disgust to the sameness of a tranquil state, and they consequently had frequent recourse to war, as to a refuge which alone could afford them that variety without which life itself is a burden.

Such were the inhabitants of this island at the time when the ambitious Roman first formed the resolution of invading it. Had their discipline been equal to their courage, the laurels of Cæsar might have withered on the shores of Britain.

Though well situated for trade, the Britons had not any large vessels, and never ventured to sea beyond the coasts of Gaul. Their chief commerce was with the Phœnician merchants, who, after the discovery of the island, exported every year great quantities of tin.

CHAPTER I.

THE BRITONS AND ROMANS.

ABOUT the year 55 before Christ, Julius Cæsar entertained the design of conquering Britain; in which he was actuated by two motives; the one, a thirst for glory; the other, a desire to enlarge the boundary of the Roman empire (l): but with a view to colour his ambition, he made use of the pretence, that the Britons had assisted the Gauls while the Romans were engaged in war against that nation. Not being able to gain the necessary information from the Gaulic merchants who traded to Britain, he sent Caius Volusenus in a galley to take a view of the coasts and gain information: in consequence of which the Britons sent ambassadors to Julius Cæsar, with offers of obedience, and with an intent to divert him from his attempt. Cæsar received the British envoys with his usual politeness, and exhorted them to persevere in the same favourable sentiments. Upon their return to Britain they were accompanied, at the desire of Cæsar, by Comius (m), who received instructions to persuade the Britons to enter into an alliance with the Romans; but they, for some reason at present unknown, put Comius in prison.

Exasperated at this treatment of his ambassador, Julius Cæsar embarked two legions on board eighty transports, and gave orders to the horse to follow in eighteen more. On the 26th of August, at about five o'clock in the afternoon, he landed at Ritupæ, at the mouth of the river that runs up to Richborough. The Britons, upon finding that Cæsar was intent on paying them a visit, prepared for defence, and assembled a large force on that part of the coast where they supposed he would endeavour to effect a descent. Cæsar therefore found the rocky coast which he first approached covered with troops; and the cliffs in this part had such a command of the landing places, that it would have been dangerous to have set foot on shore while those heights were so crowded with combatants. He then resolved

(h) Tre'r Dryw, in this island, is supposed to have been the place of the Archdruid's residence; and this opinion is corroborated by the signification of the name, which is, "the city of the Druid." In the environs of this town is a large circus or theatre, raised up of earth and stones to a great height, and called Bryn Gwyn, i. e. "the supreme or royal tribunal." This Mr. Rowlands supposes to have been the tribunal of the Druidical pontiff. See Mona Antiquæ Restaurata, p. 89.

(i) The principal Druidical temples of which we have any remains in this island, are those of Stonehenge and Abury in Wiltshire, and Tre'r Dryw above mentioned.

(k) The following is an enumeration of their names and situations:

1. The Danmonii, who possessed Cornwall and Devonshire.
2. The Durotriges—Dorsetshire.
3. The Belgi—Hampshire, Wiltshire, and Somersetshire.
4. The Bibroci—part of Berkshire.
5. The Attrebatii—part of Berkshire and part of Oxfordshire.
6. The Ancalites—part of Berkshire and part of Oxfordshire.
7. The Regni—part of Surrey and Sussex.
8. The Cantii—Kent.
9. The Trinobantes—Essex, Middlesex, and part of Surrey.
10. The Cattieuchlani—Herefordshire, Bedfordshire, and Buckinghamshire.
11. The Dobuni—Gloucestershire and part of Oxfordshire.
12. The Iceni—Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingdonshire.

The last thirteen states were known by the general name of Caledonians till the beginning of the fourth century; when they were formed into two considerable nations, called the Scots and the Picts.

(l) Notwithstanding this assertion, which appears to be founded in truth, there are authors who aver, that the Roman people were not satisfied with this expedition; considering it not only as hazardous, but an unprofitable undertaking. Cicero, in one of his epistles to Atticus, says, "The event of the war in Britain is impatiently waited for. It is certain that all the approaches to that island are fortified by amazing outworks; and it is universally known, that a scruple of silver is not to be found in the whole island, nor are there hopes of any acquisition except slaves, amongst whom, I suppose, you will not expect to find either musicians or men of learning." Herein, however, the orator was mistaken; for the learning of the Druids was at least equal to that of the Romans.

(m) Comius was a particular and tried friend of Cæsar, whom that conqueror had promoted to the sovereignty of the Attrebatii in Gaul, who resided on that part of the continent which is best known by the names of Picardy, Artois, and French Flanders.

to make search for a more convenient strand; and having discovered, eight or nine miles further to the northward, an open level shore, he determined to make his descent. The Britons were not slow in suspecting his intention; and they detached their cavalry and military chariots to this spot, with a firm resolution of hindering, if possible, the landing of the Romans. The rest of the British army followed with great expedition.

The difficulties to which the Roman forces were exposed in endeavouring to land were truly formidable, and are thus described by the elegant pen of the general who conducted this expedition. Their ships were too large to float near the beach; so that the soldiers, though unacquainted with the depth, and encumbered with heavy armour, were obliged to leap overboard, fix their footing amidst the waves, and engage in unequal combat with enemies who either stood on dry ground, or advanced a little way into the water, in places of which they had a perfect knowledge; who had all their limbs at full liberty, made the most effectual use of their javelins, and pushed forward their horses, inured to hazardous service, with great intrepidity. This obstinate resistance struck the Romans, who were unaccustomed to such a mode of fighting, with confusion and dismay. They did not act with their usual courage and alacrity, and would perhaps have yielded to the desultory valour of the ferocious islanders, had not Cæsar's presence of mind suggested to him the following expedient: he gave orders that his galleys should be rowed nearer the shore, so as to flank the Britons, who might then be successfully attacked with engines, slings, and arrows. The novelty of this method of attack confounded the Britons, who made a sudden pause, and then retreated to a small distance. The Romans, however, were still unwilling to commit themselves to such a depth of water, in the face of the enemy; but they were soon roused from their timidity by the intrepid behaviour of the standard bearer of the tenth legion, who, after imploring protection of the gods, exclaimed with a loud voice, "Leap overboard, my fellow soldiers, unless you wish to betray the eagle into the hands of the enemy: for my own part, I am resolved to discharge my duty to my country and my commander." He had no sooner uttered this laconic and spirited harangue, than he leaped into the sea, and advanced his ensign against the Britons. The soldiers that were in his ship exhorted each other not to suffer so great a disgrace as the loss of their standard: the dread of danger gave way to the fear of shame; they all sprung from the vessel, and pushed forward amidst the waves with great resolution. This example soon diffused its influence among the other transports, from which the Romans leaped in mutual emulation, and proceeded in a body against the islanders.

A fierce conflict now ensued, which was maintained with equal obstinacy on both sides, till the Romans, finding it impracticable to form in the water, and being consequently unable to exert that superiority of discipline by which they were distinguished, were thrown into confusion; while the Britons furiously attacked all who gained the shore, and cut them in pieces before they could unite. In this second emergency, Cæsar ordered all the boats of his fleet to be filled with men, whom he directed to sustain such as appeared most to require assistance. This critical suceour turned the scale in favour of the Romans, who being now enabled to set foot on dry land in considerable numbers, formed their ranks, and attacked the islanders with renewed alacrity. This engagement on land was of very short continuance. The military skill and experience of the Romans, their steadiness of discipline, their confidence of victory over a tumultuous army of barbarians, rendered them superior to all the efforts of the enemy, whom they compelled to retire with precipitation; but Cæsar thought proper to desist from the pursuit, as his cavalry had not arrived.

This defeat threw the Britons into such a consternation, that they laid aside, for the present, all thoughts of resistance; they sot Comius at liberty, and sent ambassadors to sue for peace; which was granted four days after Cæsar's landing. The Roman horse did not arrive in Britain, for they were forced back to Gaul by a storm, which shattered the Roman gallies on the British shore. This circumstance encouraged the Britons to break the treaty; and attacking the seventh legion they obtained some advantage. They then attacked the Roman camp, but were repulsed. Hereupon they again sued for, and obtained a peace. Julius Cæsar, having repaired his fleet, left Britain about the 20th of September, and returned to Gaul (n).

Still entertaining a desire to subjugate Britain, he meditated a second expedition, and accordingly embarked with five legions and two thousand horse, on board six hundred ships, and twenty-eight gallies; with which he set sail from Calais, in the year 52, before Christ, and landed about Dover without opposition. The Britons, who had beheld the large fleet of Cæsar from the heights on the sea coast, were so terrified by its appearance, that they retired to a place of greater security, whither they were followed by Cæsar, and were soon put to flight. Cassibelaun, the British general, at the head of a powerful army, then made an attack upon the Romans, but was repulsed. In the next rencontre he gained some advantage over the Romans, but the day following the Britons were entirely defeated. Flushed with success, Julius Cæsar advanced farther into the country, and passed the Thames at Coway Stakes, near Walton upon Thames, in Surrey, in sight of the British army. The Trinobantes and some other states speedily submitted to him; and he took Cassibelaun's chief city, which is supposed to be Verulamium, in the vicinity of St. Albans, in the county of Hertford. The Roman camp was attacked by Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, when Cingetorix was taken prisoner. Hereupon Cassibelaun sued for peace, which was granted upon condition that the Romans should receive an annual tribute; which was paid by Tenuantius and Cunobeline. Having taken hostages Julius Cæsar retired from Britain to Gaul, on the 26th of September, and never afterwards returned to this country (o).

For almost a century, subsequent to the departure of Julius Cæsar, there is a chasm in the history of this island. Some authors have endeavoured to fill up the void with improbable fiction and ill-founded conjecture; but as it is not our intention to amuse the reader with fabulous narrations, we shall endeavour to pursue a track in which he will not be bewildered, and relate only those circumstances which occur in the records of this period that have relation to Britain.

During the reign of Augustus, who succeeded Julius Cæsar, the Britons were threatened with a visit from the Romans, to enforce the payment of the tribute; but those menaces were never put in execution. Tacitus says, that Augustus was restrained from invading Britain by pru-

(n) This expedition of the great Julius Cæsar, though it scarcely exceeded the merit of a discovery, and was not attended with any advantages to the Roman republic, was so highly applauded by the senate, that a supplication of twenty days was decreed in honour of the enterprize. This decree, while it overbalanced the desert of the exploits from which it originated, may be deemed a tacit acknowledgement of the favourable sentiments which the Romans entertained not only of British valour, but of the importance of so extensive an island, which they hoped would soon be reduced under their dominion, and to the conquest of which, they might imagine, Cæsar would be greatly encouraged by a thanksgiving that redounded so much to his honour.

(o) The opinion of Cæsar's literary countrymen, and other ancient writers, respecting the merits of the two expeditions against Britain are various. Quintus Cicero, who accompanied Cæsar in the second of the expeditions, observes, in a letter to his brother the orator, that the affairs of Britain gave no room for much fear, nor, on the other hand, for much joy. Horace intimates, that the Britons, in the reign of Augustus, continued unsubdued; from which it is evident, that he did not conceive the atchievements of Julius Cæsar in Britain as having any claim to the merit of a conquest. Tibullus, the contemporary of Horace makes a similar assertion. Lucan even accuses Cæsar of having turned his back to the Britons; but it must be observed, that the poet has put these expressions into the mouth of Pompey, the avowed rival and adversary of Cæsar, while he is encouraging his troops to oppose that commander with confidence and hope, by depreciating his exploits and diminishing his successes. Tacitus remarks, that Cæsar seems rather, to have shewn Britain to the Romans, than to have delivered it into their hands. Suetonius mentions the British enterprize in words which are strictly true, if understood in a less general sense than the writer apparently meant them: he says, that Cæsar, after having conquered the Britons, imposed a tribute on them, and exacted hostages. Diodorus Siculus is also too general in his expressions on this head, and seems to intimate that the island was subdued and rendered tributary; though the real fact is, that a very small part of the aggregate British nation stood in that predicament. Strabo observes, that nothing of importance was performed by Cæsar in Britain, and that he did not advance far into the island. Dio Cassius insinuates, that his expeditions into Britain were not productive of any benefit to the Romans, or of glory or advantage to himself. Velleius Paterculus speaks in a lofty strain on the subject, as if Cæsar had twice passed through the island; but the testimony of Cæsar himself proves that his progress was very inconsiderable, and was confined to a distance not much exceeding a hundred miles from the place of his debarkation. From these concurring testimonies we infer, that although Cæsar by his veteran troops overcame the Britons in the several actions he had with them, yet the advantages he gained, if successes they could be called, scarcely produced a single denarium to the empire of Rome. dential motives: and when we consider that his favourite maxim was, "Never to engage in a war in which the hope of emolument was not greater than the fear of loss, we shall cease to wonder that he abstained from such an enterprize. Tiberius followed the example of his predecessor, and made no attempt on the island.

Caligula, the pusillanimous successor of Tiberius, was led to form a design of invading Britain by Adamine, son of Cunobeline, who had been banished the island by his father, and had fled to the continent, where he and his followers surrendered themselves to the emperor. This had such an effect on Caligula, that he immediately marched, with an army of two hundred thousand men, to the sea coast opposite Britain; where, having drawn up his army in order of battle, and made every preparation for an attack, he embarked on board a galley, and commanded his men to row him towards the British shore. When he had sailed to a little distance, he suddenly returned; and, mounting a throne, he harangued his troops, and gave them the word of command to begin the engagement: as no enemy appeared, he ordered his men to gather cockle-shells; and, for their alacrity in this important service, he bestowed on them the highest praises, and the most liberal rewards. The shells were sent to Rome, "as the spoils of the conquered ocean," which his courage had subdued, and for which he claimed the honours of a triumph; but which the senate refused to admit.

But the time now approached when Britain was to be deprived of her native liberty, and to submit to the government of Rome, whose power had become almost as boundless as her ambition. In the year 42 after Christ, Claudius Cæsar formed the design of conquering Britain; but the personal character of Claudius could not possibly afford the smallest grounds for apprehension to the Britons; for, to the indolence of Tiberius, he added the cowardice of Caligula: but it was his good fortune to be governed by men whose judgement was greatly superior to his own. He first demanded the tribute due to the Roman empire, which the Britons refused to pay: and thereupon he ordered Aulus Plautius to invade the island, which he did with fifty thousand men, in the year 43, without any resistance. He defeated Togodumnus and Caractacus. The Romans then passed a river in sight of the British army, by whom they were put in disorder; the victory long remained doubtful, but the Romans were ultimately victorious. Upon this defeat the Britons retired beyond the Thames, and the Romans immediately followed them, when another action ensued, in which Togodumnus was slain, and the Britons were again defeated with great slaughter.

In 44 Claudius arrived in Britain, defeated the islanders, and advanced as far as Camelodunum, (now Malden in Essex.) He behaved with great moderation towards the conquered, who erected a temple to him, and paid him divine honours. After about six months absence from the continent he returned to Rome, leaving Plautius in Britain, who returning to Rome, received the honours of an ovation, in which he walked at the right hand of the emperor. He left the command of the army to Vespasian, whose actions were more brilliant than even those of Plautius: he carried on the war against the inhabitants of the sea coasts from Kent to the Land's End in Cornwall; and in a short space of time he fought thirty-two battles, reduced the Isle of Wight, and totally subdued two powerful nations, the Belgæ and the Durotriges.

In the year 50, Plautius was succeeded by Ostorius Scapula in the government of Britain, who built forts to confine the Britons between the rivers Avon and Severn. About this period Camelodunum was made a military colony, and London a trading colony. That part of Britain which lay between the Thames and the sea was reduced to a Roman province, under the name of Britannia Prima. The Icem and other neighbouring nations united against Ostorius, but were defeated.

The most powerful enemy, however, that Ostorius had to encounter were the Silures, a warlike nation, whom his repeated conquests had not been able to intimidate, and whom neither his offers of lenity could soothe into subjection, nor his menaces of punishment awe into slavery. They were headed by the brave Caractacus, the most renowned prince of the Britons, who possessed every requisite for a great general. He had the most consummate prudence, and the most undaunted courage: quick to discern, bold to attempt, and ready to pursue; he had opposed, and successfully harassed the Romans for nine years. He possessed all the advantages over Ostorius which could arise from local knowledge; and, to render it effectual, he transferred the war into the country of the Ordovices. At length the two armies met, and, when Caractacus saw the Romans approach, he endeavoured, by the most animating speeches, to inspire his troops with a portion of that courage which glowed within his own breast, he flew from rank to rank, exhorting them to the most vigorous resistance; and conjured them, by the respect which they owed to their brave ancestors, to preserve themselves from slavery, and their wives and daughters from pollution, by a due exertion of their native spirit. But what could undisciplined valour avail against an army of equal courage, skilled in all the arts of war, and inspired by a long train of victories? The event was such as might be expected. The attack was resolute; the resistance firm; the contest long and bloody: but the Romans prevailed; the unfortunate Britons were routed with great slaughter; and the wife, daughter, and brothers of Caractacus, made prisoners. The importance of this victory was augmented by the treachery of Cartismandua, queen of the Brigantes; who, violating all the rights of hospitality, which even in the rude times of which we are treating were held sacred, delivered up Caractacus, who had fled to her court for protection, and this unhappy prince and his whole family were sent captives to the capital of the Roman empire. Such, however, was the glory that Caractacus had acquired by the noble stand which he had made against the invaders of his country, that Britain rung with his praises, and the fame of his exploits filled the empire of Rome with wonder and admiration. The emperor of Rome, proud of such a captive, determined to render his entry into the capital as solemn and as public as possible. Accordingly, on the day appointed, the prætorian bands were drawn up under arms; and the emperor and empress being seated on two lofty thrones, the captive Britons were ordered to advance. First appeared the vassals of the British king, with the military trappings and the spoils of war; next followed his brother, wife, and daughter, with looks that bespoke despair and seemed to implore mercy. The procession was closed by Caractacus himself, who, notwithstanding his misfortunes, appeared firm and undaunted; neither dejected by the consideration of his troubles, nor intimidated by the fear of punishment. Casting his eyes on the splendid objects which presented themselves as he passed along, he exclaimed, "Alas! how could a people, possessed of such magnificence at home, envy me a humble cottage in Britain!" When brought into the imperial presence, he addressed the emperor in the following terms: "Had my moderation been equal to my birth and fortune, I should not now have entered this city as a captive, but as a friend; nor would you have disdained the alliance of a prince descended from an illustrious line of ancestors, and reigning over many nations. My present state redounds to your honour, but to my disgrace. I was lately in possession of subjects, horses, arms, and wealth: is it wonderful that I should have endeavoured to preserve them? Because you are ambitious of universal power, does it follow that all the nations of the earth must tamely submit to servitude? Had I yielded without a struggle, your glory would have been trifling: the obstinacy of my resistance serves to increase the lustre of your victory. Should you now consign me to death, my name will soon be sunk in oblivion; but, if you preserve my life, I shall remain a lasting monument of your clemency" (p). This noble, firm, and bold address, from one situated as Caractacus then was, so wrought upon the feelings of Claudius that he was immediately won to mercy; and it is said that the tears of Agrippina his queen so powerfully influenced him, that he ordered the immediate releasement of Caractacus and his whole family.

Notwithstanding these misfortunes, the Britons were not conquered, and the Silures, a warlike nation, gained several advantages over the Romans, in the year 52. Ostorius, finding the Romans on the losing side, died with vexation in 53, and was succeeded by Aulus Didius; but before he could arrive, the Silures had defeated the legions commanded by Manlius Valens, and were making incursions into the territories of the Romans and their allies.

About this time Venutius, king of the Brigantes, was persuaded by his queen Cartismandua to enter into an alliance with the Romans; but upon a family quarrel, supposed to have originated in a criminal levity of the queen, the Romans espoused her cause, and Venutius declared war against them. About this time Claudius died, and,

In the year 57, under the reign of Nero, Suetonius Paulinus was invested with the command of the Romans in Britain. Perceiving that Mona, now Anglesey, was the chief seat of the Druids, and the place which afforded protection to the baffled forces of the Britons, he resolved upon its subjugation. He accordingly marched his army to the coast, and transported his infantry to that island in flat-bottomed boats: his cavalry followed, partly by fording, and partly by swimming. The Britons endeavoured to obstruct the landing of the Romans on this last retreat of British superstition and British liberty, both by the force of their arms and the terrors of their religion. The women, dressed like furies, with dishevelled hair, and with torches in their hands, ran up and down the ranks, uttering loud imprecations on the Romans, and exhorting the troops to a determined resistance: there were also multitudes of Druids standing around the army, with their hands lifted up to heaven, imploring the vengeance of their deities on the enemy. Such an extraordinary spectacle had, at first, the desired effect. The Romans, struck with consternation, remained motionless, and received the first attack without opposition, but the suggestions of fear being quickly dispelled by the exhortations of their general and officers, they advanced to the charge, routed the British army, drove it from the field of battle, burned the Druids in the fires which had been prepared for their own immolation, and demolished the consecrated groves and altars. He now thought that the conquest of Britain would be easy; but Boadicea, queen of the Iceni, taking advantage of his absence, caused a general insurrection against the Romans (q). London, by this time become a flourishing Roman colony, was attacked by Boadicea, who headed the Britons in person, and reduced it to ashes. The Romans and all strangers, to the number of seventy thousand, were put to the sword without distinction. Suetonius revenged this cruelty in a great and decisive battle; where eighty thousand of the Britons are said to have perished, and Boadicea herself, rather than fall into the hands of the enraged victor, put an end to her existence by poison.

Previous to the commencement of this last battle, Boadicea appeared at the head of her army, standing in a war-chariot, and arrayed in her royal robes, with a spear in her hand, and her two daughters sitting at her feet. She harangued her troops as she drove through the ranks; and, by a representation of the wrongs they had received from their Roman oppressors, who, she observed, were prompt to injure, but slow to redress, endeavoured to inspire them with an eager thirst for vengeance. "Though a woman," said she, "I am fully determined to conquer or die; but the men, if such is their pleasure, may live and be slaves." Suetonius was determined to pursue the advantage he had gained, and treated the unfortunate Britons with unrelenting barbarity; but Nero, wisely judging that a man of his fierce disposition was more calculated to create animosity than to promote conciliation, thought fit to recall him in the year 62. He was succeeded by Petronius Turpilianus, whose mildness and humanity tended more to reconcile the Britons to the Roman yoke than the active spirit of his predecessor.

In the year 70 Vespasian ascended the imperial throne, and Petilius Cerealis was appointed governor of Britain in the room of Trebellius Maximus, who had succeeded Petronius Turpilianus. Cerealis carried on a long and bloody war with the Brigantes, whom he had not entirely reduced, when he was recalled; and at length Julius Agricola was made governor of Britain in 78. He made seven campaigns against the Britons, and conquered the isle of Mona. He then caused forts to be built in several places, and induced the Britons to conform to the Roman customs. He carried his conquests into Scotland, beyond the Friths of Dunbritton and Edinburgh, and raised forts between those two Friths. In 84 he defeated Galgacus, a British chief, under whom the Britons made their last effort to recover their liberties. From some capricious cause the emperor Domitian recalled Agricola in 85 (r).

That part of Britain which lay to the southward of the two Friths being now reduced to a Roman province, the Britons in general began to adopt the manners and customs of the conquerors, and the peace of the country continued uninterrupted, except from the incursions of northern invaders, till about the year 120, when the emperor Hadrian came over to Britain, on purpose to subdue the Caledonians. In order to confine them within the limits of Caledonia, he caused a rampart of earth to be thrown up, which he covered with turf, from the mouth of the Tine to Solway Frith, 80 miles in length; but the Caledonians destroyed it in several places.

The Caledonians, however, after the departure of Hadrian continued their ravages, making inroads into the Roman province; and, in 138, Lollius Urbicus, under the reign of Antoninus Pius, was sent to put a stop to their progress. Upon his arrival he found the Brigantes in arms, endeavouring to shake off the Roman yoke: these he subdued, and then marched against the Caledonians, whom he compelled to retire farther to the north, and then raised another rampart of earth between the Frith of Firth and the Frith of Clyde, about 37 miles in length.

About the year 165 Marcus Aurelius constituted Calphurnius Agricola governor of Britain; and it was in his time that Lucius, a British king, embraced Christianity. But the Caledonians, although checked in their progress, and apparently confined within their borders, were not conquered; for they made frequent irruptions into the Roman territory, committed great ravages, and overcame the Roman army in the north, whom they actually cut in pieces. Upon the news of these disasters the emperor Marcus Aurelius sent Ulpius Marcellus in 183 against them, who soon put an end to that dangerous war. He likewise restored the ancient discipline in the Roman army: but he was ill rewarded for his services by the emperor, who recalled him, and he narrowly escaped with his life.

Under the emperor Commodus, the old officers in Britain were either called home or broke by the orders of Perennis, who put his creatures in their places; in consequence of which the army mutinied, and sent a detachment to Rome, in 187, to demand justice of the emperor against him: the emperor, incensed at his conduct, delivered him up to the soldiers, who put him to death on the spot.

In order to suppress the mutinous spirit of the army, Commodus sent Pertinax to Britain in 186. As he resolved to proceed according to the rigour of military discipline, the ninth legion mutinied, and he was left for dead among the slain. He however gained his point, but desired to be dismissed, and he was succeeded by Clodius Albinus in 190; who was shortly after recalled, and Junius Severus appointed in his stead. Clodius Albinus was again made governor in 193; and upon the death of Julian, Albinus was proclaimed emperor by his army in Britain. At the same time Septimus Severus in Pannonia, and Pescennius Niger in Syria, received the same honour from their respective armies. Severus pretended to be willing to divide the empire with Albinus, in order to amuse him, and then marched against (q) It should be observed, that Prasatagus, king of the Iceni, at his death, had bequeathed one half of his dominions to the Romans, and the other to his two daughters; hoping, that by the sacrifice of a part, he should secure the quiet possession of the remainder to his family: but the sequel proved very different to his expectations; for the funeral obsequies were no sooner performed, than the Roman procurator took possession of the whole. The houses of the deceased monarch were plundered by the officers and soldiers, and his family seized and made captives. When Boadicea, his widow, attempted to remonstrate against such injurious and unjustifiable conduct, she was ordered to be publicly scourged like a slave; and such was the outrageous brutality of the Roman officers, that they even proceeded to violate the chastity of her virgin daughters. These flagrant enormities were sufficient to rouse the indignation of the insulted Boadicea, and to excite a general revolt; and the desire of revenge now widely diffused itself through bosoms of little civilization, but who had still a high sense of honour.

(r) Agricola was a person of great accomplishments, military and political, and was justly held in the highest estimation. He had a perfect knowledge of the country he was sent to govern, and entered on his command with peculiar advantages. Though he had led an active life, he was greatly attached to speculative knowledge; and had studied, with diligent attention, the genius and disposition of the Britons. Experience had convinced him, when he served in the island under Suetonius and Cerealis, that the Britons were more easily to be drawn into compliance by acts of generosity, than forced to submission by severity. He administered justice throughout the conquered provinces. He commenced a strict reformation in his household, and among his immediate dependants. The conduct and discipline of his army underwent as severe a disquisition. Faults he would frequently excuse; but crimes he never failed to punish. His was the severity of justice, not the cruelty of oppression. He rather required than exacted imposts: he regulated the inequality of assessments; and, by striking at the root of corruption, destroyed all iniquitous impositions. He preferred the obedience which flows from esteem to the submission which arises from fear. In the disposal of preferments he was just and sagacious, uninfluenced by rank, and swayed only by merit. In veneration of such virtues, a real attachment to his person, and an humble imitation of his conduct, universally obtained: his soldiers became modest and regular, his officers generous and humane. In short, by the wisdom and mildness of his administration, the Britons began to be reconciled to the Roman government, and to enjoy the blessings of peace, which till then had been unknown to them. The news of Agricola's success was received by Domitian, who was now seated on the imperial throne, with the rancour of envy, and the discontent of ungratified malice, though the royal hypocrite concealed the real feelings of his mind beneath the specious mask of joy and satisfaction. As a pretence for recalling him from Britain, he pretended that he wished to bestow on him an honourable mark of his favour, but meanly and treacherously caused him to be put to death.

Pescennius, who was slain in battle. He afterwards came to an engagement with Albinus near Lyons, who was also defeated and slain, in 196.

Severus being now sole emperor, divided Britain into two governments: but the island was not long at peace; for in 205 the Caledonians made fresh incursions into the northern provinces, and Severus in 207 came over to Britain to chastise their insolence, though he was sixty years of age at the time. Being applied to, he refused to make peace with them, unless they would submit to his mercy; which they positively determined not to do. Thinking to strike terror into them, he ordered his army to march, and penetrated to the utmost parts of the north; but in this expedition he lost upwards of fifty thousand men. At length, finding himself unable to vanquish them, he relinquished the northern parts, and caused a wall of free stone, sixty-eight miles in length, to be built in the place where Hadrian had before made his rampart. He then left the command of his army to his son Caracalla, and returned to York. By some supineness or mismanagement Caracalla suffered the Roman soldiery to grow licentious, and the Caledonians renewed hostilities. Those who fell into the hands of the Romans were ordered to be massacred by Severus, and shortly after, February 4, 211, he died at York. Caracalla and Geta, Severus's two sons, made peace with the Caledonians, and retired to Rome, about the year 259.

From this time the Roman empire was greatly troubled by factions; all strove for the mastery; and some of the thirty tyrants, by whom that empire was distracted, were acknowledged in Britain, although they were not personally present.

In the time of the emperor Probus, who was the first that permitted the Britons to plant vines, Bonosus, who was born in Britain, assumed the purple; and it is conjectured that his countrymen abetted him in his pretensions. But, after a short enjoyment of his usurped title, he was vanquished by Probus, and hanged himself in despair. After subduing the Vandals and Burgundians, Probus sent great numbers of those people to form a colony in Britain, who are supposed to have settled about Gogmagog Hill, near Cambridge.

About 285, Carausius was sent with a fleet to scour the seas about Britain of the piratical Franks and Saxons. He grew immensely rich, and assumed the imperial purple. With a design to chastise him, Maximian advanced as far as Gaul; but he was forced to associate him in the empire, and left him Britain for his share. Being desirous, however, to get rid of his associate, he sent Constantius Chlorus against him with an army, in the year 290. Carausius was slain by Alletus, who assumed the title of emperor. Alletus was put to death by Asclepiodotus, in 300, who also assumed the imperial dignity, and who was likewise afterwards slain in battle.

Dioclesian who reigned in the East, and Maximian who reigned in the West, resigned the empire, and Galerius and Constantius swayed the imperial sceptre. Some commotions, however, breaking out in Britain, occasioned Constantius to come to the island, where not long after he died, at York, on the 25th of July, 306.

Constantine, who succeeded Constantius, in 307, is supposed to have been born at Colchester in Britain. Under his government the Britons lived in great tranquillity; and the Christian religion flourished among them. He divided Britain into three provinces, viz. BRITANNIA PRIMA, BRITANNIA SECUNDA, and MAXIMA CÆSARIENSIS. The latter was afterwards divided into two.

In 353 the emperor Constantius, who succeeded Constantine, sent Paulus, a Spanish notary, into Britain, as inquisitor-general, an office well adapted to the disposition of his mind; in the discharge of which he committed numberless extortions, and cruelly oppressed the inhabitants. The villanies and extortions of Plautus were so great, that Martinus, the governor, a man of humanity, spared no pains to put an effectual stop to his flagitious proceedings; but all his remonstrances being despised and neglected, he formed the resolution of destroying him. For this purpose he repaired to Paulus's house; and, drawing his sword, made a furious thrust at him; but missing his aim, and knowing that the attempt would inevitably produce his destruction, he plunged the weapon into his own breast, and expired on the spot. Paulus avenged himself on Martinus's whole family, by exercising against them the engines of confiscation, torture, and exile (s).

(s) Ammanius Marcellinus acquaints us, lib. xxii. that the monster of inhumanity, Paulus, was afterwards burned alive by order of Julian the apostate.

The Picts and Scots again becoming restless, made incursions into the Roman province, and Lupicinus was dispatched in 361 by the emperor Julian, to stop their progress; but he was recalled before he reached London. Encouraged by this circumstance, and the dissatisfaction which pervaded the Roman empire, the Picts, Scots, Attacots, Franks, and Saxons, invaded the Roman province about the same time. Severus and Jovinus were successively sent by Valentinian to put a stop to their ravages, but in vain, in 365, and 366; and in 367 Theodosius the Elder was commissioned to command the Roman forces in Britain; he defeated his opponents in several encounters, and drove them out of the Roman province. After which, in 368, he repaired London and other places; built fortresses between the Friths of Forth and Clide, and made a fifth province, which he called VALENTIA.

Maximus, the governor of Britain, entertained the design of reducing the whole island; to effect which purpose, he engaged the Picts to join him against the Scots, who were compelled to fly into Ireland and the adjacent isles.

In 378 Gratian associated Theodosius in the empire; which so greatly displeased Maximus, that he formed the project of making himself emperor. At the same time the Scots endeavoured to recover their dominions, but were driven back into Ireland; and shortly after Maximus granted a peace to the Irish.

In 388 Maximus assumed the imperial dignity, and caused Gratian to be assassinated, but, being himself vanquished by Theodosius, was beheaded.

In 393 Arcadius and Honorius were at the head of the empire, and Honorius sent Victorinus over to Britain as governor, with orders to curb the insolence of the Picts: but he treated the Picts exceedingly ill; insomuch that they recalled the Scots, and invited Fergus II. from Denmark. Upon his landing in Scotland, they made him their king, and shortly after re-entered Britain. Fergus, in 403, took the fortresses which had been built by Theodosius, and, passing over Severus's wall, laid the Roman province waste.

In 408 the Britons resolved to choose an emperor of their own, and their choice fell upon Marcus, an officer, who was quickly slain or dethroned. After him Gratian was chosen, and he met with a similar fate: and Constantine, a common soldier, was the third they raised to the imperial dignity. He was successful against the northern people, compelled them to retire into their own country, and concluded a peace with them. But not being content to reign in Britain alone, he formed the design of becoming master of the whole empire: to effect which, he assembled an army, and passed over to Gaul in 409. Honorius, being now pressed on all sides, was forced to own Constantine for his associate in the empire. With this, however, Constantine was not satisfied, and therefore associated his son Constans with himself, and marched towards Italy, to dethrone Honorius. But Gerontius, the general of Constans, caused Maximus to be proclaimed emperor, and besieged Constans in Vienne, who was slain in a sally. Hereupon Constantine retired to Arles, where he was besieged by Gerontius. Honorius, to curb the insolence of his opposers, sent Constantius at the head of a powerful army. Gerontius fled into Spain, and was slain by his own people; and Constantine, being taken at Arles, was sent to Honorius, and beheaded.

In 410, the Britons being left to themselves, were reduced to great extremities. Their defenceless country was ravaged by the Picts and Scots; and in this extremity they implored the assistance of the Romans, but implored in vain; for the continental empire of the Romans was now on the point of being overwhelmed by a barbarous herd of Goths, Vandals, and other invaders, from the regions of the north and east. Honorius voluntarily resigned the sovereignty of Britain, and discharged the inhabitants from their allegiance to the Roman empire. This circumstance only tended to render the situation of the Britons more wretched, and the more exposed to the ravages of their northern neighbours. At length Ætius sent them a legion, in 416, under the command of Gallio, which, however, was shortly after recalled; and the commander of that legion advised them to inure themselves to arms, and to repair Severus's wall, which they accordingly did: and in 426 or 427 the Romans took their final leave of Britain. Thus were the Britons deprived of Roman assistance, and delivered from Roman tyranny (t).

CHAP. II.

The History of the British Church, from the Conversion of the Britons, till the final Departure of the Romans.

CONCERNING the religion which prevailed in Britain at the earliest period from which its history can be traced, a concise view has been already given in the Introduction. The system of Druidism long flourished among the ancient Britons; but as the Druids, the ministers of that superstitious and sanguinary persuasion, were greatly persecuted by the Romans, many of them were induced to retire into the Isle of Anglesey, which was the principal seat of that superstition, and where the Archdruid resided.—Suetonius Paulinus attacked the Druids in this retreat, and exercised great cruelty against the promulgators of that persuasion, massacring or burning all that fell into his hands, as has been already mentioned. This severe blow to their religion was strengthened by the slaughter of a vast number of Druids, who accompanied the army of Boadicea, when an engagement took place between the British forces under that queen and the Roman legions under Suetonius. After that action many of the Druidical order retired into North Britain, Ireland, and the Hebrides or Western Isles, where they exercised their ancient mode of worship till the light of Christianity had spread its influence among them.

As to the precise time when the Christian faith was introduced among the Britons, the histories of that period give us no certain information. In the ages of monastic superstition, however, a tradition was current, importing that Joseph of Arimathea, who undertook the charge of burying the crucified Author of our religion, landed in Britain about the year 63, and was the first preacher of Christianity in this part of the world; and that he erected a church on that spot which was afterwards occupied by the abbey of Glastonbury. But this tradition is so destitute of genuine support, that it may be considered as the production of the monks of that abbey, who were prompted by the desire of encouraging the resort of pilgrims to a monastery built, as they pretended, on so sacred a spot.

Archbishop Usher has adduced various assertions of old writers, intimating that the apostle James preached the gospel in this island (u); and some authors have ascribed this pious work to Simon Zelotes (x). The apostles Paul and Peter (y) have been respectively mentioned as the first propagators of Christianity in this and other western countries: but there is some difficulty attending the proof that either of the apostles ever came into Britain; though if any one of them ever did, we hesitate not to give the preference to the apostle Paul, because in his favour the claim is by far the strongest (z).

But whoever was the first preacher of Christianity in this island, there is great reason to think that it became known here in the reign either of Claudius or Nero. It had been adopted by a considerable number of the Romans under the former of those emperors; and, as the intercourse between Rome and Britain was greatly augmented on the reduction of some of the British states by Claudius in person, we may infer that the Christian tenets had reached this island, and met with some proselytes, before the decease of that emperor, whose death happened A. D. 54. Nevertheless, it is certain that the pure religion of Jesus was known to the Britons about the middle of the first century, though at that time, and for many succeeding years, the converts were few in number, and their devotions were privately exercised. Their number may be supposed to have received some augmentation from the zealous exertions of those Roman Christians who fled hither during the persecutions of the infamous Nero, (who began to reign in 57,) in the more centrical parts of his empire; and the extermination of the Druids from provincial Britain, by disengaging the minds of the islanders from the dominion of those priests may have contributed to hasten the progress of Christianity among them.

It does not appear that the converts of this island were molested during the persecutions which the Christians suffered under several of the emperors who preceded Dioclesian: perhaps their tranquillity in this respect was owing to their being so few in number, and the unoffending quietness of their deportment. But in the reign of Dioclesian the British Christians, whose numbers had gradually increased, were exposed to the horrors of religious persecution, from which they had been hitherto exempt. The first person who suffered death in this island for his adherence to the faith of Christ, is generally allowed to have been a native of Verulam, named Alban, from whom that town was afterwards called St. Alban's. About the same time, Aron and Julius, two inhabitants of Caerleon upon Uske, and many other Britons, were put to death for their adherence to the Christian faith (a).

Constantius, who, while he enjoyed the title of Cæsar, had been under the necessity of enforcing the edicts of the joint emperors, Dioclesian and Maximian, against the Christians resident in Britain and the other provinces which he governed, had no sooner ascended the imperial throne, than he stopped the progress of persecution, and in the year 305 tolerated the exercise of the Christian worship.

In the reign of Constantine the Great, who was the first Christian emperor, the professors of that doctrine not only enjoyed the free and public exercise of their religion, but were indulged with considerable privileges. Thus honoured with imperial patronage, Christianity began to extend, in an eminent degree, her triumphs over the idolatry, of the Gentiles. The edict by which this prince permitted his subjects, of every rank and denomination, to bequeath their estates to the church, greatly increased the opulence, or rather removed the poverty of the Christian clergy, and stimulated their zeal for the conversion of the Pagans. Some years before the promulgation of this edict, in A. D. 314, a council was holden at Arles (b), for deliberating upon the concerns of the church. This is supposed to have been the first public council that took place among the Christian clergy. Three British ecclesiastics, who had been dignified with the episcopal title (c), attended on this solemn occasion, besides a priest and a deacon. From this circumstance it is evident that the church had been regularly established here by that time; but how long before it is not in the power of any one at the present day to ascertain, although, perhaps, it was not earlier than the accession of Constantine.

About this time, or a little after, the well-known heresy of Arius, an Alexandrian priest, had made some progress in disturbing the peace of the church; for it usually happens, that when religious persecution has ceased, internal animosities, arising from difference of opinion, assumes its place. His doctrine had been condemned in the council of Nice in 325, as repugnant to the catholic faith; but, in that of Ariminium, in 359, the party that favoured his heretical notions prevailed over those of the orthodox persuasion, and procured assent to a system of faith which differed in some particulars from the Nicene creed (d). Those British prelates who assisted at this synod subscribed the new creed; but, from their conduct, both at the beginning of the session, and after the dissolution of the assembly, their signatures appear to have been extorted by their fear of the Arian majority; for the bishops of the Gallic church, among whom those of Britain were included, (as this province was now a diocese under the præfect of Gaul,) not only signihundred and seventy years; and computing from the first expedition of Julius Cæsar, in the year 55 before Christ, they had a constant intercourse with the island for nearly five centuries. There are doubts, however, among historians and antiquaries, with regard to the time of their final departure from this island. Rapin, whose authority we have thought fit to follow, places it in 426 or 427; Hume, in 448: Camden, in 446, though he afterwards altered it to 422; Stillingfleet, in 418: Milton in the last year of the reign of Honorius, which was 423; and Dr. Henry, in 420.

(y) Simeon Metaphrastes, an ecclesiastical biographer of the tenth century, affirms, that St. Peter passed twenty-three years in preaching the gospel at Rome, and in Britain, and in other countries in the west. Cardinal Baronius, and other Romish writers, have endeavoured, but without success, to support Simeon's opinion respecting the conversion of the Britons by this apostle.

(z) Theodoret, a prelate of the fifth century, asserts that the Britons were converted by him; and St. Jerome agrees with that learned writer in the same opinion.

(b) Arles is a city of France, in the department of the mouths of the Rhone, in the late district of Lower Provence. It is seated on a hill at the east side of the Rhone, whose declivity is towards the north. Constantine took great delight in this place, and made it the capital of the Roman empire in Gaul. This town is very ancient, but the time of its being built is unknown: by some it is attributed to Julius Cæsar. Several councils, on the affairs of the church, were held at this place.

(c) These were, beyond doubt, the bishops of York, London, and Caerleon.

fied in the council a disapprobation of the tenets of Arius, but, on their return from the place of meeting, renounced their compliance with the decrees of so heretical a synod (e). The emperor Constantius, by whom this council had been convoked, offered to defray the expences of attendance; a proposal which was rejected by all its members, except three of the bishops who had been deputed from Britain. These prelates, being less opulent than the continental clergy, and unwilling to burthen their ecclesiastical brethren, who expressed a readiness to bear their charges, thought proper to accept the emperor's bounty (f).

The time of the first introduction of the monastic order among the clergy of this island is uncertain. The origin of conventual seclusion is attributed to a Christian of Egypt, named Antony, who was afterwards canonized for his fanatical piety. This devotee founded some monasteries about the commencement of the fourth century, in which he stationed those Christians who had already embraced a life of solitude in the wilds of Egypt under his auspices. The renunciation of the vanities of the world soon spread from the east to the west, and buildings arose in various parts of Christendom for the reception of those who were desirous of devoting themselves, as they pretended, to the more immediate and exclusive service of their Creator. Monastic fraternities seem to have been formed in Britain towards the close of the fourth century; and that of Bangor was one of the first (g). The tenants of this monastery procured their principal support from manual labour; and this was perhaps the case of many of the early monastic foundations, though, in succeeding ages, the monks lived luxuriously on the bounty of charitable zealots.

An abbot of this celebrated monastery, named Pelagius (h), contributed, by the propagation of new doctrines, to sow disunion among his clerical countrymen. He did not himself broach his heterodox sentiments in Britain; but, while he was employed on the continent in the dissemination of his heresy, Agricola, one of his disciples, communicated it to the British clergy. It made such progress in the island, as to baffle all the efforts of the orthodox churchmen for its extinction. Application was therefore made to the prelates of Gaul, to assist in the confutation and suppression of the Pelagian doctrine. Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus bishop of Troyes, were sent over, in 429, by the Gallic church, to aid their British brethren in the cause of orthodoxy. This mission, we are informed, was attended with success. The two reverend prelates preached in the churches, the highways, and the fields, with such a flow of eloquence, and strength of argument, that many of the Pelagian converts renounced their errors, the wavering clergy were confirmed in the true faith, and the orthodox found cause of triumph for having combated opinions which were now fully demonstrated to be erroneous and heretical. At a disputation held at Verulam, Germanus and his colleague Lupus are said to have completely confuted the errors of Pelagius, and the progress of Pelagianism was checked, at least, for a time, and tranquillity was restored to a divided church.

With regard to the doctrines and ceremonial observances prevalent in the British church at this period, it is sufficient to observe, that they resembled those of the other Christian churches of Europe, except that, in the celebration of the festival of Easter, the Britons followed the mode adopted by the churches of the East. The only heresies with which they had been infected were those of Arius and Pelagius; but the doctrines of the former met with fewer proselytes in the island than those of the latter.

CHAP. III.

Observations on the Progress of Learning and the Arts among the Britons, after the Invasion of the Romans.

THE Romans, when they began to provinciate a country which they had subdued, took every opportunity of propagating among their new subjects the knowledge of their own language, arts, and customs, and of introducing their own forms of government and policy. Thus they produced a speedy change in the appearance of the conquered regions, as well as in the manners and habitudes of the people. How far these observations are applicable to Britain, we shall now endeavour to make obvious.

The plantation of colonies at Camelodunum (Malden) and other places, proved highly beneficial to the Romans, not only in strengthening the subjection of the Britons, but in promoting among them the arts, and manners of the conquerors: for, although the behaviour of the first colonists did not exhibit the moderation which was best calculated to answer the intentions of the Roman goverment, and even contributed, among other provocations, to the great revolt under Boadicea, there cannot remain a doubt but that such establishments suggested to the Britons a desire for the more substantial accommodations of the Roman life; a wish of imitating that polished people, whose superior skill and refinement they could not but admire.

It is natural to suppose that the attachment of the islanders to their own language rendered them averse, for some time, to the acquisition of the Latin tongue; and the latter language was not generally studied by the British youth before the appointment of Julius Agricola to the government of the Roman possessions in Britain, A. D. 78. He was zealously actuated in his endeavours for the civilization of the provincials, and for the promotion of learning and politeness among them. He began with providing Roman instructors for the young Britons of a higher class, being aware that the example of the great is very efficacious in commanding imitation. When these pupils had acquired a competent knowledge of the language of their conquerors, they were gradually led to other branches of Roman education; and their proficiency in general learning was not contemptible.

The introduction of Christianity into the Roman province in Britain tended, among other advantages, to the improvement of the inhabitants in learning and civilization. Those who were destined to the work of the ministry found it incumbent on them to study the Scriptures, to cultivate eloquence and argumentation, and enable themselves to defend the articles of their faith against the attacks of philosophic Pagans and disputations of heretics. The bulk of the converts, at the same time, felt the humanizing influence of the religion of Jesus, by which their rude manners were softened, their licentious practices reformed, and their moral and social habits improved.

With respect to the arts of architecture, agriculture, clothing, and others which are connected with the convenience of mankind, the Britons made no inconsiderable progress in them during their subjection to Rome. A striking change took place in the towns of this island, which were soon furnished with handsome private buildings, and magnificent public ones, by the labour and ingenuity of Roman architects, who also erected many new and elegant towns in the best situations of South Britain. Agricola was the first governor who produced among the Britons a general imitation of the Roman style of building; but their great inexperience in substantial and commodious architecture obliged them, for some time, to make use of Roman architects and Roman workmen. Long observation, however, accompanied with occasional practice, enabled them to become proficients in the architectural art; and the country presented to the view an abundance of well-built towns and villages. But this art greatly declined among them before the final departure of the Romans; which was partly effected by the frequent and destructive incursions of their northern neighbours: this depressed their spirits, and relaxed their exertions.

Agriculture, indeed, flourished highly among the British provincials during the continuance of the Roman power. The cultivation of the land became general in South Britain; and the greatness of the produce demonstrated the fertility of the soil. No sooner had they cultivated a sufficient portion of ground for the subsistence of themselves and the Roman troops, than they began to raise large quantities of corn for exportation; and the legions of the continent

(e) Hilar. Fragm. p. 431.

(f) Sulpitii Severi. Hist. Sacr. lib. ii.—Du Pin, however, affirms, that the bishops of Gaul and Britain refused to accept the imperial allowance on this occasion.

(g) This abode of religious retirement was situated in Flintshire, and became so extensive as to contain apartments for upwards of two thousand monks, according to Bede and William of Malmesbury.

(h) The word Pelagius is a translation into Latin of the Welsh name Morgan, which signifies, one born or dwelling near the sea. The birth of Pelagius is attributed to North Wales; but the Scots, without sufficient ground, have claimed him as one of their countrymen. He was born in 354. This monk looked upon the doctrines, which were commonly received, "Concerning the original corruption of the human nature, and the necessity of divine grace to enlighten the understanding, tinent were, for a considerable time, supplied with the bounty of the British soil (i).

The arts of dress and external ornament underwent a great alteration in consequence of the intercourse which subsisted between the Britons and the Romans. The skins with which the inland Britons heretofore covered themselves in the winter were soon laid aside, and coarse woollen mantles succeeded in their place. In the summer, they began to wear a garment of finer manufacture, dyed of various colours in squares or chequers. Although this garment resembled the coarse woollen mantles in shape, it was softer and lighter. It was at length accompanied with a tunic or doublet, and a sort of trowsers made of variegated woollen cloth. The use of linen for the immediate covering soon followed these improvements. In the time of Agricola, the British youth of distinction shewed a desire for assuming the Roman dress, and the use of the toga was not unfrequent; but this habit never became universal. The custom of painting the body declined, as clothing increased and civilization advanced; though it continued in the northern parts at least two hundred years after it had been relinquished in the south (k).

The various manufactures which the Romans practised on the continent were soon introduced into Britain, and greatly contributed to its flourishing state. Artisans and tradesmen abounded in the British towns; and the sea-ports were replete with merchants, who carried on a considerable commerce with the states on the continent. The exports, as well as the imports, were much more numerous than they had been before the arrival of Julius Cæsar; and this great traffic was not confined to foreign bottoms, for the Britons themselves built and employed a vast number of mercantile vessels. At this period London, which had long been the metropolis of Great Britain, was one of the most flourishing commercial towns in the island.

The inhabitants of South Britain were certainly indebted to the Romans for various improvements. The endeavours of that great people softened the original ferocity of the Britons, gave them a taste for the refinements of art and science, and instructed them in the laudable pursuits of mental accomplishments. By promoting agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, they introduced the blessings of plenty and opulence in a degree before unknown to the island: by furnishing examples of architecture, both elegant and solid, they encouraged the natives to aspire to ornament as well as accommodation in their private houses, and splendour in their public structures: by making admirable roads (l), and erecting bridges wherever they were requisite, they established an easy and regular communication from the extremity of Cornwall to the rampart of Antoninus: by draining morasses, and clearing woods, they not only enlarged the space for pasturage and agriculture, but improved the temperature of the air and the health of the inhabitants. But to counterbalance these improvements, it may be remarked, that the progress of luxury, which the Romans, for political purposes, strongly encouraged among the Britons, the privation and disuse of arms, their exclusion from all share in the government of the country, and the military exile of the bravest of the natives, contributed so much to the diminution of their natural vigour, and the extinction of their ancient spirit of liberty, that they seemed to have lost even the ordinary spirit of action, and the power of defensive opposition, and were disabled, by their own degeneracy, from the proper use and enjoyment of that independency which they now received from the abdication of the Romans.

BOOK II.

FROM THE ABDICATION OF BRITAIN BY THE ROMANS TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE HEPTARCHY.

CHAPTER I.

From the Departure of the Romans to the calling in of the Saxons.

ON the final departure of the Romans, the Britons were thrown into the greatest consternation and despair; and instead of rejoicing at being freed from their tyrants, they regretted the loss of their protectors. They did not reflect on their helpless situation without a profusion of melancholy complaints; and, by thus indulging their sorrow, they increased their inability of defence. The Picts and Scots, on the contrary, rejoiced at the final retreat of the Romans, and rushed from their northern districts in confidence of an easy victory. Some of them poured through the breaches which they made in the northern wall, while others came over the friths, and over-ran the country as far as Severus's wall, carrying desolation wherever they went. They then made a bold attack on Severus's wall; but the Britons, although they had deserted the parts of which the Scots and Picts had lately taken possession, having roused themselves from their lethargy, prepared for the defence of this rampart, which was now in such a state of compleat repair, that, if the men who garrisoned its towers, and crowded its platforms, had acted with a manly spirit, the efforts of the assailants might have been frustrated. The event, however, was different; for the pusillanimous Britons made such a weak resistance, that the enemy soon gained possession of the barrier. The attack and defence exhibited a singular scene. The Picts and Scots made use of long iron hooks, with which they pulled down the Britons from the parapets, and threw them on the ground; while the defendants were, for the most part, so oppressed with cold, abstinence, and fatigue, that they were almost incapable of action, and at length retreated to the southward in great confusion. The invaders now made several breaches in the wall, and undermined its foundations in various parts. Elated with their success, they pursued the fugitives, and slew all that they overtook. They plundered the towns on the borders, and then returned within their own frontiers.

These predatory visitations were annually renewed for some years, to the impoverishment of the Britons, and the devastation of their territories. Multitudes of those who had been stripped of their property by the Picts and Scots resolved to supply their necessities by robbing their countrymen. The general anarchy which prevailed in South Britain, encouraged the continuance of this domestic rapine. This state of confusion produced a neglect of agriculture, the consequence of which was a famine; after which a pestilential disorder succeeded, and swept off a great number of persons.

The accumulation of their misfortunes induced many of the Britons, about the year, 433, to surrender to the enemy, and purify the heart, as prejudicial to the progress of holiness and virtue, and tending to lull mankind in a presumptuous and fatal security. He maintained, that these doctrines were as false as they were pernicious; that the sins of our first parents were imputed to them alone, and not to their posterity; that we derive no corruption from their fall, but are born as pure and unspotted as Adam came out of the forming hand of his Creator; that mankind therefore are capable of repentance and amendment, and of arriving to the highest degrees of piety and virtue by the use of their natural faculties and powers; that, indeed, external grace is necessary to excite their endeavours, but that they have no need of the internal succours of the divine Spirit." See Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 422, edit. 1758.

(i) Zosimus, lib. iii. acquaints us, that Julian the Apostate, before he was emperor, built in Germany a fleet of eight hundred vessels, which he sent to Britain to be laden with corn. The copious supply which these ships procured from the British market afford a strong proof of the industry of the inhabitants, who at the same time retained a sufficiency for home consumption.

(k) Camden supposes that the continuance of this custom in North Britain occasioned the tribes which inhabited that part of the island to be called Picts, i. e. painted persons, from the Latin Picti: but Dr. Macpherson imagines that they received the name of Pictich from the depredations they committed on their southern neighbours; for this word, which was easily Romanised into Picti, signifies, in the British language, thieves or plunderers. The same author is of opinion, that the confederates of the Picts were called Sculte, or wanderers, by the South Britons, whence originated the name of Scoti or Scots.

(l) Vestiges of these roads still remain, to the honour of Roman industry, and the reputation of Roman art. The principal roads were, Watling Street, Ikenild Street, Ermin Street, and the Fosse.

while others retired to the forests and mountains, where they procured a precarious subsistence from hunting. Some parties of them derived courage from despair, and sallied out of their retreats upon straggling bodies of the barbarians, with such spirit and ferocity as proved fatal to many of those plunderers. Apprehensive of these efforts of desperation, as well as fearful of the pestilence, the Picts and Scots relinquished their inroads for a few years. The Britons, now relieved from the incursions of these marauders, began to recultivate their lands, and an extraordinary abundance was the consequence of their industry, aided by a continuance of seasonable weather. Such a return of plenty banished their sorrows, and disposed their weak minds to debauchery and riot. These years of tranquillity were succeeded by a renewal of incursions from the North, which removed from the Britons the means of intemperance, and reduced them to a state of distress and poverty. In this deplorable situation they elected sovereigns in different parts of the country; but many of these were soon deposed from their new dignity, principally through the ambition of competitors, but not from any disaffection of their subjects (m).

In this distressed state the Britons applied again to Ætius, the Roman præfect of Gaul, who had signalized himself by a series of victories over the invaders of the western empire, to whom they sent a supplicatory epistle, in the year 446, entreating him, in terms of the most contemptible humiliation, to grant them some protection against the invasions of the Picts and Scots. The Britons addressed their letter "To Ætius, consul for the third time," and entitled it, "The Groans of the Britons:" which, after a short preface, proceeded in this manner; "The barbarians drive us towards the sea, and the sea forces us back upon the barbarians. We are therefore exposed to the miserable alternative of falling by the sword, or of being swallowed up by the waves." But their lamentations were futile, and procured no kind of assistance from Ætius; for he was then collecting all his forces, and raising fresh supplies, to repel the attacks of Attala, king of the Huns, who menaced the western empire with total destruction.

The Britons being now satisfied that they should never receive assistance from the Romans, became deeply depressed, and were for some time uncertain what steps to pursue in the present emergency. Their terrors were likewise augmented by an alarming rumour, which purported that the Picts and Scots had formed a resolution to enter their country with an amazing force, whereby they might exterminate the present possessors of South Britain, and fix their own residence in that division of the island. In consequence of this terrifying report, a general assembly of all who enjoyed authority among the Britons was convoked by Vortigern, who had been recently elected sovereign of South Britain, by a concurrence of those states which had before been disunited in their counsels. This prince harangued the assembly on the reduced state of the British nation, oppressed as it had long been by the inroads of a restless enemy, who had now adopted the resolution of expelling the southern natives from the island. As the Romans had exhausted the military strength of the British province by continual levies, and had left it, thus unprotected, to the insults of its neighbours, it was not in a condition, he said, to resist the attacks of so formidable and fierce a foe. Foreign assistance, he continued, was therefore become necessary, unless the Britons wished to be subjected to the risk of extirpation. If the assembly should concur in the expediency of external aid, he knew of no nation he could recommend in preference to the Saxons. He said, that these people had distinguished themselves by the success of their arms; and as they were not in an embarrassed or distressed situation like the Romans, there could be no doubt of their willingness to assist a people who would be happy in rewarding their services.

At length, after some debate, the council acquiesced in the proposition of Vortigern; and it was resolved that an embassy should be sent to the Saxons, to stipulate for their immediate assistance. The embassy accordingly set out in 449; and, according to Witichind, a Saxon historian, addressed the Saxons in the following abject terms: "Most valiant Saxons, the distressed and miserable Britons, harrassed by the perpetual incursions of their enemies, have sent us humbly to supplicate your assistance and protection. We are possessed of a country beautiful, extensive, and fertile, which we resign to your command and devotion. We formerly enjoyed peace and tranquillity under the government of the Romans; and now, confiding in your strength and courage, we seek for safety beneath the wings of your valour. If by your powerful assistance we should rise superior to our enemies, we shall willingly submit to the performance of any services which hereafter you may be pleased to impose." These servile solicitations were unfortunately crowned with success. The Saxons, who had long viewed this island with an eye of desire, were rejoiced at the invitation, which they immediately accepted, and prepared for the expedition.

(m) It is extremely probable that many petty kings, started up in different parts of South Britain, and that the new states thus formed were as independent of each other, as the various principalities had been which existed in the island before it was subjugated by the Romans. The dates of the transactions which intervened between the final departure of that people, and the arrival of the Saxons in 449, are so confused and uncertain, that it is impossible to determine, with any degree of accuracy, how long the Britons remained without kings after the former of these events, or at what time the different occurrences mentioned in this part of the history actually took place. Milton conjectures, that they did not proceed to the election of kings till after they had received the answer of Ætius; but others place it much earlier. Perhaps several ambitious men might procure their nomination to the government of some parts of the island very soon after the cessation of the Roman power in this country, while other distircts might continue in a state of anarchy to a later period.

CHAP. II.

Remarks on the Government, Religion, and Character of the Saxons.

AS the Saxons, from this period, acted a very conspicuous part in South Britain, and produced a remarkable change in the affairs of that country, the reader will naturally expect a brief account of their origin, government, and manners, before we proceed to a detail of their transactions in this island.

The Saxons were a branch of the ancient Germans, who seem to have been a part of that prolific nation known by the general name of Goths. The Saxons, properly so called, had for some time inhabited the Cimbrian Chersonesus, or peninsula of Jutland, (now part of Denmark,) and had rendered themselves formidable by their piratical excursions, to the provincial coasts of the western empire. In the lapse of time they extended their settlement to the southward, and occupied the whole range of coasts from Jutland to the mouth of the Rhine. At the time of the British embassy different tribes of Saxons possessed Holstein, great part of Westphalia, and the coasts of Friseland, Holland, and Zealand.

The people who arrived in Britain at this period, though they bore the general appellation of Saxons, were properly speaking, Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, with whom some tribes of Frisians were also intermingled. The Angles chiefly resided in the southern part of Jutland; the Jutes in the northern parts of that peninsula, and the Brisians in a part of Friseland.

As the Saxons were of German extract, their civil and religious government, manners, and customs resembled those of the Germans, as described by Tacitus (n). A great degree of liberty prevailed among them; for the fierceness of their tempers would not permit them to be passive instruments in the hands of their chieftains. Their states were independent; but, on occasions of general danger, a military union was formed, and a sovereign of the combined states elected, whose authority ceased on the return of public tranquillity.

The supreme power resided in a general council, which assembled at stated times, and regulated all affairs of moment; while matters of less importance were determined by the assembly of chieftains. Those who had a right to appear in the national council, were the chiefs, the priests, and the warriors; and no person was considered as belonging to the class of warriors, until he had been formally invested with a buckler and lance, with the consent, and in the presence of the council.

Justice was administered by chiefs appointed by this assembly, who respectively exercised their judicial functions in different districts. Each of these justiciaries had a hundred persons to assist him with their advice, and add weight to his authority (o).

The capital punishments which prevailed among these people were hanging and drowning. Traitors and deserters were punished in the former mode; cowards in the latter. Other offences were atoned by the payment of a mulct or fine, which varied according to the degree of guilt. Even the murder of a chieftain, however exalted his rank, was compensated by a fine, which was greater than that which was imposed on the murderer of an inferior person.

The Saxons made a threefold division among themselves: their nation, or rather themselves, were divided into three distinct and separate classes; viz. thanes or nobles, freemen, and slaves; and these orders were rarely connected by intermarriages, for the pride of the nobles hindered the alliance of that order with either of the other two, and the dignity of a freeman operated against his matrimonial connection with a slave. The slaves were the absolute property of their lords, who failed not to employ them in the most humble occupations. The freemen acted as farmers of the lands of the nobles, or engaged in some branch of mercantile or mechanic profession; but their habitual fondness for war, and their aversion to agriculture and traffic, rendered very unfrequent any employment of that nature.

The Saxons were polytheists, that is to say, they worshipped more gods than one; and their principal deities were Odin or Woden, Thor, Frea, Seater, the Sun, Mona or the Moon, and Tuisco (p). Although in the time of Tacitus the Saxons considered it as a degradation of celestial dignity to worship the gods within temples, or from supposed resemblances of them in idols or statues, they at length adopted the general custom of many other nations, and not only erected magnificent temples, but decorated them with the images of their objects of veneration (q). Tacitus informs us that they offered human sacrifices to Woden and their principal deities in times of national calamity; and although the victims were, for the most part, criminals or slaves, yet persons of the most exalted rank were sometimes sacrificed, when the exigency of the state was uncommonly critical. On ordinary occasions, the victims were quadrupeds.

In their religious solemnities, they were accustomed to sing hymns, which were probably composed by their priests. Of the peculiar privileges of this order of men we are not informed; but they seem, from all accounts, to have been in less estimation, and to have had much less influence over the people, than the Druids of Gaul or Britain. Priestesses officiated in the temples of the female divinities; and these sacerdotal females were treated with greater regard and submission than the priests (r).

The Saxons are said to have believed in the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and the distribution of rewards and punishments in a future life. Their idea of paradise was adapted to those inclinations by which they were most strongly influenced. They apprehended, that if their valour in the field, and their general conduct in life, proved deserving of the favour of Woden or Odin, they should be admitted into his hall after their decease, where the day would be passed in warlike diversions, and the night in feasting and carousing, particularly in quaffing ale or mead presented to them by beautiful virgins, and contained in the sculls of their enemies who had fallen in battle by their hands. On the other hand, their place of future punishment presented ideas of unceasing anguish, terror, and famine (s).

The precepts which were most forcibly inculcated by their priests were the three following, viz. to worship the gods with prayer, sacrifice, and thanksgiving; to do no wrong; and to behave with intrepidity in battle. They placed great confidence in divination, which they practised in various modes. Besides the augury derived from the flight or the singing of the feathered tribe, they followed a method of prediction peculiar to the natives of ancient Germany; which was, to divine futurity from the neighing of white horses. These quadrupeds were treated with peculiar attention; and the presages drawn from them were honoured with the implicit belief of all ranks of people. Another mode of prognostication was by cutting several slips from a fruit tree, and making notches or marks on them: these being shaken in a white cloth, the priest (or, on private occasions, the master of the family,) took up each slip thrice, and foretold good or evil, according to the marks which appeared upwards. The events of a war was presaged by a formal duel between a captive of the hostile nation and a warrior of their own state, each with the weapons used by his tribe.

These people had a peculiar veneration for spells and incantations, and placed great confidence in the predictions of pretended sorceresses, whom they supposed to have communications with familiar spirits, and to learn the will of the gods from such intercourse. The answer given by the most celebrated of these women were deemed oracular, not only by the bulk of the people, but even by the leaders of administration; and Tacitus, a Roman historian of great veracity, speaks of a prophetess named Velleda, whom many of the German nations adored as a dees (t).

The manners of the Saxons were tinctured with all the ferocity which might be expected in a warlike, turbulent, and illiterate nation. From the close of the third century to the first formation of their settlement in Britain, the majority of the Saxons exercised the profession of pirates: they are even said to have degraded that illiberal employment by the cruelties which they exercised in their predatory expeditions. They were remarkably bold and fearless of (p) The first and principal object of adoration among the Saxons was the idol of the Sun. This idol was placed in a temple, and there adored and sacrificed to; for they believed that the Sun in the firmament corresponded and co-operated with, or in this idol. To the day set apart for the adoration of this deity, they gave the name of Sunsday, whence our name for the first day of the week, Sunday. This idol is described as a half naked man, set upon a pillar; his face, as it were, brightened with gleams of fire, and holding, with both his arms stretched out, a burning wheel before his breast; the wheel being to signify the course which he runs round the world; and his brightness the light and heat wherewith he warms and cherishes the animal and vegetable world.

The next was the Moon, which they worshipped on the second day of the week, called by them Monas daeg, that is, Monday. The form of this idol is very extraordinary; for though made a woman, it is habited with a short coat, like a man, and a hood, with two long ears. Her holding a moon before her breast may probably be to express what she is; but the reason of her chapion appearing with long ears, short coat, and piked shoes, history is silent about.

Tuisco, another of their favourite deities, was worshipped as the first father, and ruler of the Germans and Scythians. Tuisco was considered their conductor, lord, and law-giver; and the day on which he was worshipped was called Tuiscos daeg, or Tuesday. This idol is represented, standing on a pedestal, as an old, venerable sage, clothed in a garment of skin, holding a sceptre in one hand, and the other spread more open, whether to denote his clemency, or his dictating to his subjects is not ascertained.

Woden or Oden was esteemed and honoured as their god of battle, and seems to resemble the Roman Mars. This character was that of a victorious prince or captain, they therefore prayed and sacrificed to him after his death, that by his aid they might obtain victory over their enemies, which, when obtained, they attributed to him, and sacrificed such prisoners as they had taken in battle. The name Woden signifies fierce, or furious, and the day peculiarly appropriated to his service was called Wodens daeg, or Wednesday. Many encomiums were bestowed on this deity. Woden is represented in a bold and martial posture, clad in armour, with a broad sword uplifted.

The next in order was their idol Thor, who was not only deified and sacrificed to by the ancient Pagan Saxons, but by all the Teutonic tribes. This great respected god, being of more estimation than many of the like sort, was majestically placed in a large and spacious hall; there seated as if reposing himself on a bed of state. Thor is represented with a crown of gold on his head, adorned with a circle in front, above and below, wherein were set twelve bright, burnished, golden stars; and with a kingly sceptre in his right hand. The deluded Pagans believed that Thor was a god of astonishing power and might; that he governed in the air, and, when displeased, caused thunder and lightning, tempest, excessive rain, &c. but that by being rendered propitious by their sacrifices, he blessed them with seasonable weather, and plenty of corn and fruits, as well as kept them from evil, and affliction of every kind. The day on which he was worshipped was called Thors daeg, (as it still is by the Danes and Swedes,) whence our Thursday.

The next idol in rank was Friga or Frea, who is depicted as an hermaphrodite, holding in her right hand a drawn sword, and in her left a bow, signifying thereby, that women, as well as men, should, in times of necessity, be ready to fight. This divinity was honoured by some as a god, and by others as a goddess, but chiefly the latter; for she was considered as the giver of love and peace, riches and plenty. The day on which the Saxons celebrated her praises, was called Frigas daeg, whence we have termed the day Friday.

The last, to complete the days of the week, was Seater, by some supposed to be Saturnus. He is represented on a pillar, whereon is placed a perch, (on the sharp prickly back of which he stood,) of a lean visage, with long hair, and a long beard, bareheaded and barefooted, and wearing a long coat girded with linen. In his left hand he held up a wheel, and in his right hand a pail of water, wherein were flowers and fruits. His standing on the sharp fins of this fish, signified the Saxons should pass, without harm, in the most dangerous and difficult places; by the wheel was betokened their unity and concord; by the girdle was signified their freedom; by the pail of water, with flowers and fruits, was declared, that by kind and seasonable showers he would nourish the earth for such productions. The appellation given to the day of his celebration is still retained, viz. Seaters daeg, by us called Saturday.

danger, prompt to engage in difficult or hazardous enterprizes, active and dexterous in combat, patient of labour and fatigue.

They were much addicted to excessive drinking, which they considered as in no wise disgraceful; but this circumstance was the occasion of frequent quarrels, which too often terminated in bloodshed: as they usually appeared armed at their entertainments, it was an easy transition from contrariety of opinion, to the exercise of their weapons. Their hospitality was one of the best traits in their character; for they treated strangers with all the cordiality and friendship of intimate association. They were frank in their manners, credulous, and unsuspicious. Their attachment to their chieftains was strong and sincere; and their respect for the female sex gave indication of a delicacy which we could wish had been more generally diffused over their conduct.

They were extremely fond of the destructive vice of gaming; and it was no uncommon circumstance among them for a man to lose gradually, in games of chance, his whole property, and then, as the last desperate effort, put his person and liberty to the hazard of the die. In these final attempts the loser would patiently suffer himself to be bound by his fortunate adversary, and carried away as a slave. Those, says Tacitus, who had thus forfeited their liberty were generally sold by the winner, who wished to free himself from the shame of a victory so disgraceful.

But to their honour it must be recorded, they cultivated the virtues of chastity and connubial fidelity. Their amorous intercourse did not commence till both sexes had attained a maturity of years and vigour. Adultery was severely punished among them, particularly in the person of the woman. She was deprived of her hair by her husband, stripped of all her garments, in the presence of her relations, ejected from the house, and scourged by him from one end of the town or village to the other. After this publication of her shame, she lingered out the remainder of her life in disgrace and contempt.

The Saxons were entirely unacquainted with the sciences, and ignorant even of the elements of literature. They had no knowledge of the polite arts, and were far from being conversant in the useful ones. They paid little attention to agriculture or to architecture. The arts which were most practised among them, were those of clothing, and the manufacture of military weapons. The vessels which they made use of in their piratical excursions, were, in general, long galleys, calculated by the lightness of their structure for quickness of passage. With these they had frequently harassed the very people, who now solicited their aid against the invaders from the northern parts of the island, whom they found themselves unable to repel.

CHAP. III.

Hengist and Horsa, two Saxon Chieftains, arrive in Britain with a Body of Forces—They join the Britons, and rout the Scots and Picts—Reinforced by a large Body of their Countrymen—Hengist and Horsa commence Hostilities against their British Allies—Hengist establishes the Kingdom of Kent—Vortigern dethroned, and succeeded by Ambrosius—Several Saxon Leaders establish Kingdoms in South Britain—The Natives driven into Wales, Cornwall, and Cumberland—Reflections on the Revolution produced by the Anglo-Saxons.

THE Britons were far from exercising any degree of foresight concerning those whom they invited to their assistance; for these very persons soon became their most cruel oppressors. They appear to have thought only of Saxon valour, but did not reflect on the barbarity with which it was generally accompanied. They could have no reason to expect honour or fidelity from auxiliaries, whose general character was that of pirates and robbers, and who, whatever appearance of friendship or alliance they might at first assume, would, in all probability, take the first opportunity of throwing off the mask, and conclude with determined hostility against their credulous allies.

Three vessels with Saxon warriors on board, arrived in Kent soon after the invitation, and landed at Ebbesfleet in the Isle of Thanet, in 449, which island was allotted for their residence. The leaders of this band, (which it is supposed did not exceed sixteen hundred men,) were Hengist and Horsa, sons of Witigisil, who were distinguished by the nobility of their birth, as well as by their military talents. These were received by Vortigern with complacency and joy.

In the mean time the Scots and Picts had advanced as far southward as Stamford in Lincolnshire, and were ravaging the country without mercy: but their progress was speedily checked by the two Saxon brothers, who joined the forces which Vortigern had raised, and marched against the North Britons, whom they defeated with considerable slaughter, and compelled to retire to the northward. Vortigern and his subjects rejoiced at this victory, which they regarded as a sure presage of the complete expulsion of their northern enemies; and as a reward for their services Vortigern presented them with some lands in Lincolnshire, where they built Thongcaster. The Britons, however were dissatisfied at the liberality of Vortigern, and loudly murmured against him.

Hengist and his brother now thought of establishing a Saxon settlement in this island, and Hengist, to further his views, proposed to Vortigern to send for more Saxon forces to secure himself against his subjects. This proposal, meeting with the entire approbation of Vortigern, a reinforcement of five thousand Saxons was sent for, which arrived in seventeen ships, in 450, with Escus and Rowena. These forces made an immediate junction with the troops of Hengist and Horsa; and at this period the intentions of the Saxons began to unfold themselves.

With these adventurers Vortigern concluded an agreement, which imported that they should receive a certain stipend, and a regular allowance of provisions, on condition of their acting against the Picts and Scots. It does not, however, appear that Hengist employed these forces against those northern barbarians, but Vortigern made use of them to render himself more absolute.

Hengist having discovered the bent of Vortigern's inclination, gave him an invitation to partake of an entertainment at Thongcaster, at which Hengist's daughter, Rowena, was to be present. She is represented as a pattern of loveliness; and her charms were destined by her father to make a conquest of the British monarch. At table Hengist ordered his daugter to present his royal guest with a cup of wine. She obeyed, and in the elegance of her attitude, displayed such inimitable grace, as gave irresistible force to her beauty, and made the strongest impression on the heart of Vortigern, who refused to taste the wine till the cup had been touched by the lips of Rowena. The lovely cup-bearer complied with his request; and, for her affability, was rewarded by the amorous Briton with a fervent kiss, the effect of which completed her conquest. Vortigern, though already married, demanded Rowena for his wife; and Hengist having raised as many difficulties as he thought necessary to enhance the value of his compliance, at length yielded to the request, on condition that Vortigern should cede to him and his followers the county of Kent; which Vortigern, with the utmost readiness complied with; in order therefore to gratify his desires, he divorced his wife and married Rowena.

The next step which Hengist thought fit to take, was to inspire Vortigern with jealouy about Ambrosius Aurelianus; and, in order to strengthen himself against that chieftain, advised him to send for more Saxon forces. The credulous monarch followed his advice, and a fresh body of troops sailed from Germany in forty ships, under the command of Octa and Ebusa (u), who, after having ravaged the Orkney Islands, made descents on the eastern coasts of Scotland. After quelling the opposition they met with from the Picts, they took possession of Northumberland. Although these Saxons did not proceed so far southward as to co-operate with those who had before arrived in the island, they proved eminently serviceable to the designs of Hengist, by acting as a check on the Picts and their confederates, and promoting that alliance which this enterprizing and sagacious chief was desirous of concluding with these old enemies of the southern Britons before he declared war against the unfortunate nation which he had engaged to protect.

Hengist now sent continually for Saxon reinforcements, and when he thought himself sufficiently strong to execute the plan which he had projected, he complained, in 454, that the Britons had not strictly adhered to their contract, the subsidy being in arrear, and the provisions not regularly furnished. He threatened them with compulsive measures, unless they immediately complied with his demand. The Britons discerned the aim of the Saxon chief, and were convinced that submission to his claims would tend to augment his insolence, without protracting the execution of his design.

In the present state of affairs Vortimer, the eldest son of Vortigern, endeavoured to rouse the courage, and inflame the resentment of the Britons, against the encroachments of the Saxons. He urged them to prepare for war, as the intentions of the foreigners were now become manifest. Hengist and Horsa, on the other hand, were not idle in the prosecution of their schemes. Having entered into an alliance with the Picts, they commenced hostilities in the southern parts of the island, and ravaged it with uncommon fury and barbarity. The Britons, enraged at the treachery of the Saxons, immediately enlisted under the banners of Vortimer, who had lately been associated in the government with his father. The war between the Britons and the Saxons commenced in 455, and continued, with little intermission for a long series of years.

The accounts which have been handed down to us of the circumstances of this war, are various in different authors; and the difficulty is increased by the confusion of dates. From this mass of perplexity, we shall endeavour to elicit as distinct and authentic a narrative as the imperfect evidence will afford.

The first campaign was distinguished by a general engagement between the army of Vortigern, and that of Hengist and Horsa. In this battle, which was fought at Eglesford (now Anglesford) in Kent, the Saxons lost Horsa, who was slain in the field, and the Britons lost Catigern, the brother of Vortimer, who is said to have fallen by the hands of Horsa.

Another battle was fought in 457, near Crecanford (now Crayford) in Kent, wherein Vortimer was entirely defeated. The islanders are said to have lost four thousand men on this destructive day, as well as some of their bravest chiefs. The victor prosecuted his success by ravaging the neighbouring districts with all the implacable ferocity of a barbarian warrior. He marked his progress with blood and desolation. The old and the young, the strong and the weak, females as well as males, clergy as well as laity, were involved in indiscriminate massacre. Such was the consternation which this cruel treatment produced, that many of the Britons fled into the woods, and others into the mountainous parts of the island; while vast numbers thought proper to quit their native land, and got to Armorica, where they were received in a friendly manner by the descendants of their countrymen, who had fled thither from the persecutions of the Romans (v). Pleased with the success of his forces, Hengist declared himself king of Kent (w); and the warriors who had conquered under his auspices, acquiesced in this assumption of the regal title. They imposed, however, such restrictions on the new king as tended to preserve the freedom of the subject from the violence of tyranny: they allowed him the exercise of a limited authority, not the power of a despot or an emperor.

The Britons seem to have enjoyed a respite from the miseries of war for several years after the battle of Crayford, i. e. from 457 to 463. Vortimer died before the battle just mentioned, and Vortigern was restored to the throne; but we are unacquainted with the particulars of his conduct after his restoration. It is certain that he did not head the British army in the late engagement at Crayford; nor do we find that he made any attempts to recover his country from its reduced state. After he had been re-established in his sovereignty, he is said to have been invited by Hengist to a banquet, under pretence of accommodating, by treaty, all differences between the Britons and Saxons. Vortigern having accepted the invitation, the two kings met in form, according to the British historians, each attended by the flower of his nobility. In the course of the entertainment, the Saxons, on a preconcerted signal, drew their daggers, and furiously attacking their unsuspecting guests, slew the whole number of them, amounting to three hundred nobles. Vortigern himself was detained prisoner by Hengist, who refused to release him till he had surrendered to his treacherous host a large tract of country, comprehending what afterwards formed the counties of Sussex, Essex, and Middlesex.

The occasional accession of Saxon force which Hengist received in the interval of peace that followed his acquisition of Kent, encouraged the Kentish king to renew the war with great spirit. He had now, in 463, a very able competitor in the person of Ambrosius, who had come from Bretagne with some forces, to the assistance of his oppressed countrymen. The Britons flocked to his banner with a renewal of hope, and a confidence in his valour and capacity. He soon distinguished himself against the Saxons, over whom he obtained some advantages, and even penetrated to the extremity of Hengist's kingdom, if Wipped's-fleet was really situated in the Isle of Thanet; for, on a spot which now received that name from the fall of Wipped, a Saxon chief, a battle was fought between Hengist and the Britons in 465, when twelve principal officers were slain on the side of the latter, and a complete victory attended the arms of the Saxon prince. We are unacquainted with the progress of the war between the day of this engagement, and another which is said to have happened seven or eight years afterwards.

We find that Vortigern, by his neglect of the moral duties of a man, and the political concerns of a king, appeared so flagrant in the eyes of his subjects, as to call for a public mark of their resentment. A great council was convoked, and cognisance was taken of the mal-administration of Vortigern. The result of this deliberation was, that this prince was solemnly deposed, and Ambrosius elevated to the sovereignty of South Britain. How long Vortigern lived after his deposition cannot be precisely determined. He retired into Wales, where he is said to have spent the remainder of his days in solitude and contempt.

In the few years of respite which the Britons enjoyed, from 465 to 473, after the battle of Wipped's-fleet, Ambrosius appears to have been employed in endeavouring to heal the dissensions of the British tribes, in rebuilding the ruined towns, and in retrieving the affairs both of the church and state. He restored Pacentius, the only son of Vortigern, to the possession of his paternal estates, and to that political authority over the Silures, which he claimed in his father's right, and of which he (Ambrosius) had before deprived him for his seditious practices.

The next engagement of importance after that at Wipped's-fleet between the armies of Ambrosius and the Saxons, which did not take place till 473, is said to have been so unfortunate to the Britons, that their affairs were thrown back into that disorder from which their sovereign had lately rescued them. The victory gained by Hengist on this occasion gave him an opportunity of enlarging his British dominions by the conquest of adjoining territories.

Being fearful of a co-operation between the Northumbrian Saxons and their countrymen in Kent, Ambrosius made an alliance with the Scots, that he might employ them not only against the Saxons of the north, but against their Pictish allies. After the formation of this league, no event of importance occurred till the arrival of Ælla, a Saxon chieftain, who, encouraged by the success of Hengist, set sail from Germany with a small army of adventurers, in the hope of procuring a settlement in the fertile territories of South Britain. Accompanied by his three sons, Baldulph, Colgrin, and Cissa, he landed at a port in the present county of Sussex, in 477, but not before he had been obliged to contend with a body of the natives. He found great difficulty in establishing a kingdom in Britain; for the islanders opposed him with courage and obstinacy. After several years of casual conflict, with occasional intervals of peace, he fought a bloody battle at a place called, in the Saxon chronicle, Mearcredesburn, in 485. The victory was doubtful: it was fought with equal intrepidity on both sides, and the effects of it considerably weakened each of the armies. Ælla attempted nothing of consequence after this battle, till he was reinforced by other Saxon tribes that he invited from Germany.

Hengist appears to have enjoyed his kingdom in peace after his last victory; for the Britons, perceiving the impracticability of dislodging him, forbore to molest him. He established his royal residence at Canterbury, which had been a flourishing town in the Roman times. He died in 488, with the reputation of an eminent warrior and an able politician; a character, however, which was sullied by perfidy and cruelty. At the time of his decease, his kingdom comprehended not only the county of Kent, but Essex, (v) This latter migration of Britons to Armorica, added to the numbers already settled there, procured that part of France the appellation of Bretagne, or Britanny, which came into use about this time.

(w) According to the Saxon Annals, Hengist assumed this title in 455; but the date we have adopted, appears to be preferable. Matthew of Westminster says, that when Kent was voluntarily surrendered to the Saxons by Vortigern, Horsa was proclaimed by his followers king of that territory. Other historians, however, do not concur in this assertion, which exclusive of the strong doubt respecting the donation of Kent by the British monarch, militates against the general opinion that Hengist was the first Saxon king in this island.

Middlesex,

Middlesex, and a part of Surrey. His son Esca succeeded him in his dominions.

The acquisitions which Ælla gradually made, bordered on the kingdom of Kent. So soon as this chief received reinforcements from Germany, he prosecuted the war with renovated spirit, and invested the town and fortress of Andred-ceaster, in 490. The siege was long and obstinate. At length Ælla divided his forces into two bodies, with one of which he attacked and defeated the British army which assisted the besieged, while the siege was continued by the other division. He then ordered his men to storm the place; and this vigorous assault was successful. The Saxon conqueror derogated from the glory of his triumph by the inhumanity with which it was followed; for he ordered a general massacre of the inhabitants, as well as the garrison, and the total destruction of the town and its fortifications. His commands were strictly executed; and thus was paved the way for the establishment of another Saxon kingdom in Britain, in 491; called, from its situation, the kingdom of the South Saxons, or Sussex, comprehending that county and the greater part of Surrey.

The next Saxon chief that made his appearance on the coast of Britain was Cerdic, who was accompanied by his son Cenric, and who brought with him a sufficient number of followers to occupy five ships. He was attacked on his landing, in 495, by the Britons, whom he with difficulty obliged to retire. His progress was opposed for many years; and not one of the Saxon tribes more forcibly experienced the valour of the natives. Ambrosius, assisted in the command of the British forces by prince Arthur, harassed the troops of Cerdic with such success, that he was under the necessity of sending for fresh supplies, besides the occasional aid he received from the Saxon kings of Kent and Sussex.

In consequence of the invitation of Cerdic, Porta, a Saxon chieftain, came to this island in 501, with his two sons, and a body of his countrymen, who were embarked in two vessels of unusual magnitude. They landed at Portsmouth, and sustained an immediate attack from the Britons, who rushed in a disorderly manner upon these invaders, but were soon routed by the steady valour of Porta, who proceeded to form a junction with Cerdic.

To exhibit a particular and connected detail of the progress of Cerdic and his colleagues, and the various engagements he was, without doubt, obliged to maintain with the natives, would, for want of genuine records, be a vain attempt; and to occupy this dark part of the British history with the fictions of romance and the tales of improbability, would be an insult on the undertanding and the penetration of the public. Having no clue but that of mere conjecture to separate truth from fable, we must either decline the task of cleansing this Augean stable, or suffer unsupported conclusions to take place of historic verity.

For the first seven years after the arrival of Porta, we have no authentic information either of the progress of the Saxons, or the transactions of the Britons. At the close of that interval, a general engagement happened between the army of Cerdic, reinforced by the troops of Porta, and auxiliaries from the kingdoms of Kent and Sussex, and a numerous British force assembled under the banners of Natan-leod, as he is called in the Saxon chronicle, but who seems to have been no other than Ambrosius. The British prince attacked the right wing of the army, commanded by Cerdic, in 508, with such vigour, that the Saxon chief was repulsed with great loss, and eagerly pursued by the Britons. In the mean time, his son Cenric, who headed the other Saxon corps, was successful against that body of the Britons which he encountered; and perceiving the confusion that prevailed among the pursuers of his father, he hastened to his relief, and fell upon the Britons in flank. This circumstance gave Cerdic time to rally; and the two divisions of the Saxon army now attacking the Britons in concert, the latter were completely routed. In this action the British general was slain, after he had fought with great gallantry; and five thousand of the British troops shared the same fate (x).

The illustrious Arthur, whose origin is involved in obscurity, is supposed to have succeeded Ambrosius in the supreme command of the confederated Britons. He is said to have defeated the Saxons in twelve battles; but perhaps neither of these were superior to skirmishes. Be this as it may, it is certain that Cerdic persisted in his efforts to obtain a permanent settlement in Britain. His endeavours were promoted by a further reinforcement from his own country, conducted by his maternal nephews Stufe and Withgar. This supply of Saxons came over in three ships in 514, and found a British corps drawn up near the coast in hostile disposition. A conflict ensued, which terminated to the disadvantage of the natives; and the victors marched up the country to join Cerdic.

In 519, about five years after the landing of Cerdic's nephews, he discomfited the Britons in a great battle; but, as the approach of night hindered pursuit, the vanquished effected a retreat, without much addition to the loss they had sustained in the engagement. After this victory Cerdic assumed the regal title, and erected the kingdom of Wessex, extending at that time from the western frontiers of the kingdom of the South Saxons in Somersetshire. Cerdic was crowned at Winchester.

In 520, Cerdic, eager to pursue his success, invested Caer-Badon (now Bath), which was even then a town of great strength. Arthur, aware of the importance of this place, used every effort to keep it from falling into the hands of the Saxon. He attacked the besiegers with impetuosity, and the engagement was desperate. Towards the close of the day, the troops of Cerdic, having raised the siege, posted themselves on Badon-hill, with intent to renew the fight in the morning. The British monarch, resolving to improve his advantage, made a furious assault on the Saxons as soon as day appeared; and, after an obstinate conflict, in which great numbers fell on both sides, the victory preponderated in favour of the Britons, who dislodged the enemy from their station, and totally routed them. The West Saxon king was so humbled by this engagement, that he gave the Britons no molestation for several years. At length, having recruited his strength by fresh supplies from Germany, he renewed the war, that he might extend the limits of his kingdom. The next battle which he fought was at Cerdic's-laeg (now Chardsley) in Buckinghamshire (y), in 527; and it was here that he bore off the palm of victory, since the Britons gave him little or no disturbance afterwards.

In the same year various Saxon leaders brought with them considerable numbers of adventurers, who landed on the eastern coasts of this island, where they gradually made themselves masters of different tracts of country; but none of their chiefs who arrived at this period, or their successors in the conquests which they gained, assumed the regal appellation till many years had elapsed from their invasion of Britain.

But while these new adventurers were prosecuting their encroachments on the possessions of the Britons, the active Cerdic was employed in the extension of his dominions. Thinking that the Isle of Wight would form an useful addition to his territories, he landed an army there in 530, and, with little difficulty, annexed it to the West Saxon kingdom. To this island, he afterwards invited a vast number of Jutes. About the same time he invited a considerable number of families from Germany, to augment the population of his British realm. These colonists he dispersed throughout his new territories. He fixed upon Caer-Guent (now Winchester) for his metropolis, where, as above-said, he was crowned. At the time of his death, the dominions over which he reigned included the present counties of Dorset, Wilts, Hants, Berks, a part of Buckinghamshire, and a part of Somersetshire (z). He was succeeded by his son (x) The spot where this battle was fought derived, from the victory of Cerdic, the name of Cerdic's-ford, and is supposed to have been in the neighbourhood of Charford in Hampshire.

(y) This is the opinion of the antiquary Somner; but, if we consider that the Britons had no success against Cerdic after this battle, it is scarcely probable that it took place in Buckinghamshire; for he would doubtless have retained a part of that county within the boundaries of his kingdom. But, on the other hand, it may be said, that, as Wessex included the county of Berks, it might also comprehend a part of the adjoining shire of Buckingham; for, when we speak of certain counties forming any of the kingdoms of the Saxon Heptarchy, we must not be understood to appropriate to each shire the exact space which it occupied in the regular division of English counties. In mentioning the extent of these kingdoms, we can only give a general idea of the limits, not being informed of the particular line of boundary by the writers of those times.

(z) Rapin says, that Cornwall, Berkshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, and Dorsetshire, were ceded to him in 530.

We may here remark, that from this Saxon prince, Cerdic, the kings of England, down to Edward the Confessor, derived their descent on the male side; and, in the female line, his present majesty George the Third, may deduce his origin from the same stock. Cerdic, like the other founders of the Anglo-Saxon heptarchy, claimed the honour of being descended from Woden or Odin, the deified hero of the German and Scandinavian nations.

Cenric,

Cenric, who did not, however, inherit the whole of his father's dominions, the Isle of Wight having been conferred by Cerdic on his nephews Stufe and Withgar.

To return to king Arthur, it will be sufficient to inform the reader, that several of the ancient historians have filled up the latter part of his life with the miseries of civil war and domestic dissension; but we cannot venture to give the particulars, without better authority than that of legendary fabulists. His death is attributed to the wounds he received in a combat with his nephew Modred, in which both were slain (a). Arthur was buried, according to Taliessin (b), the Welsh bard, and others, at Glastonbury (c).

On the death of the great prince Arthur, the British states did not elect a successor in the general command of their united forces. They now began to slacken their exertions, and seemed to relapse into that lethargy and torpor which had disgraced their deportment on the final secession of the Romans. The constant influx, indeed, of warlike strangers, co-operating in the same plan of hostility with the natives of this country, now firmly established in the island by foreign arms, might have reduced a more courageous and politic nation to a degree of despair If perchance they defeated the Saxons, and a great slaughter ensued among those invaders, a fresh body of them quickly supplied the loss thus produced; and the minds of the Britons could not but be depressed by seeing their enemies spring with recruited vigour from every blow, while they themselves were destitute of such a resource, and, exclusive of the diminution of their force by the carnage of the martial field, sustained a more alarming decrease by the frequent migrations of their countrymen, who were eager to exchange the horrors of a ruinous war for the delightful scenes of peace and tranquillity.

In the year 547 the Northumbrian Saxons, who had been frequently involved in hostilities with the Scots, received a very strong reinforcement of their countrymen, under the conduct of Ida, an Anglo, who landed at Flamborough in Yorkshire. This accession of force gave them a decided superiority over their enemies; Ida completed the reduction of the present county of Northumberland, and the south-eastern part of Scotland, from the Tweed to the Forth, and took upon himself the title of king of Bernicia, over which he reigned with great reputation.

About the same period, or within a few years afterwards, Alla, another Saxon general, established the kingdom of Deïra, including the country situated between the æstuary of the Humber and the river Tyne. This kingdom, before the close of the sixth century, was united to that of Bernicia, under the general appellation of the kingdom of Northumberland.

Of the several Saxon chiefs who by this time had established separate kingdoms in Britain, one was usually considered as the head of that political confederacy which the sovereigns of these distinct states thought proper to maintain in a hostile country, in imitation of the practice adopted by that people on the continent. Hengist was the first prince who was regarded as the head of the Saxon confederacy in this island; and Ælla, king of the South Saxons, or Sussex, succeeded him in that dignity. The next was Cerdic; and Cenric followed his illustrious father. Cenric lived in peace with the natives for many years, and applied himself to the improvement of his kingdom in the civil arts.

In his declining years, however, the Britons endeavoured to recover a part of the dominions he had wrested from them. They penetrated into Wiltshire, as far as Old Sarum, where an engagement took place between the Britons and the forces of Cenric in 552, in which the former were repulsed with great slaughter. Four years afterwards, in 556, a numerous army of Britons marched against the West Saxons, and a furious engagement ensued between them and the forces of Wessex (d); and though the Saxons were generally superior to the Britons in close fight, this seems to have been a drawn battle. The Britons, however, gave Cenric no further disturbance.

In the year 560 Cenric was succeeded by his son Ceaulin in the supremacy of the Saxon confederacy. His courage was great, and he exceeded his father and his grandfather in his views of ambition and enterprize. His great warlike preparations excited the apprehensions of the Britons, and roused the jealousy of the other Saxon potentates. Ethelbert, king of Kent, was as ambitious as himself, but less experienced. He aspired to the supreme direction of the confederacy; and being filled with this idea, he assembled an army, and marched towards the territories of Ceaulin. The king of Wessex, unwilling to disappoint the impatience of Ethelbert, advanced, in 567, with his brother Cutha against the hostile army; and a battle was the consequence of the meeting. The Kentish prince was defeated with the loss of two of his principal officers, and a considerable number of warriors of inferior rank (e). He was a second time routed by Ceaulin, and constrained to yield the superior power to that monarch.

The next event of importance was an engagement between the West Saxons and the Britons, in 568, in which the latter were discomfited. This victory was followed by the capture of four of the British towns, in 571, viz. Leighton in Bedfordshire, Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire, Bensington, and Eynsham in Oxfordshire (f).

The kingdom of the East Angles was founded in 573, under Uffa. It contained the present counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge. It was almost about the same period that Eichenwin assumed the title of king of the East Saxons or Essex, and reigned over the county of that name, Middlesex, and a part of Hertfordshire.

The ambition of Ceaulin, however, was not yet satisfied. He was not content with possessing a more flourishing kingdom than any Saxon prince that then reigned in Britain, but resolved to increase it at the expence of the harassed islanders. He therefore marched into Gloucestershire, in 577, and gained a compleat victory over three of the native princes, who all fell in battle (g). He pursued his success by the reduction of three towns of note, namely, Cirencester, Gloucester, and Bath. These exploits drove many of the Britons to the mountainous parts of the island west of the Severn, where they united with their countrymen.

Many of the British princes, roused by the progress of Ceaulin, laid aside their internal dissensions, and assembled an army, the command of which was given to Mael-Gwinneth, prince of Anglesey, in 583. This general is said to have been reinforced by a powerful body of Scottish auxiliaries, on the renewal of the league between the South Britons and the Scots; and, according to the same narrators, the Picts and Northumbrian Saxons ranged themselves on the side of Ceaulin (h). Mael-Gwinneth and his allies, (a) This was the third engagement which Arthur had had with Modred, for the recovery of his dominions, which, in the absence of Arthur, Modred had seized upon. He is likewise said to have debauched Arthur's queen, then to have publicly married her, and afterwards to have been crowned at London.

(b) Who sung the praises of Arthur in a poem called Llywarch-hen.

(c) In Stow's Chronicle we are informed, that about six centuries afterwards, in the reign of Henry II. that king passing through Wales, and hearing the songs of the bards which were descriptive of the burial place of Arthur, was possessed with an ardent desire to discover the truth of their descriptions; and accordingly, in the year 1189, he issued an order to search for the body of Arthur. After digging to the depth of seven feet, a broad grave stone appeared, in the lower surface of which was fixed a leaden cross, with this inscription: "Hic jacet sepultus Inclitus Rex ARTHURUS, in Insulâ Avallonia." Some feet deeper in the ground, a wooden coffin was discovered, which contained the skeleton of a man of very large dimensions; and Giraldus Cambrensis, who was present, says, he counted ten wounds on the skull, all of which had been healed up except one, that remained still open, and was supposed to have been the immediate cause of his death. At the same time the coffin of his second wife Guinever was opened, when her golden tresses, plaited in a very curious manner, appeared bright and entire; but, on being touched, they mouldered into dust. The two skeletons were removed into the new church, and there buried in a marble tomb; and the leaden cross with the inscription was preserved in the treasury of Glastonbury till the suppression of the monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII.

Arthur was indisputably a great general; and though his actions have given rise to numberless fables, and served to embellish the motley volumes of romance, yet most of them were not unworthy to decorate the page of historical narration. His skill and courage were great, his morals were unblemished, and his generosity was unbounded. He is said to have instituted the order of "The Knights of the Round Table;" and though this institution has been generally regarded as altogether chimerical, we are told by Cassiodorus, that Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, actually instituted an order of a similar nature in Italy, in the same century.

(d) According to the Saxon Chronicle, this battle was fought at Baranbyrig, concerning the situations of which antiquarians doubt. Some place it in Wiltshire, while others, with less probability, assert, that it was at Banbury in Oxfordshire.

(e) This battle was fought at Wibbandune (now Wimbledon) in Surrey.

(f) This battle was fought at Bedicanford (now Bedford). Saxon Chronicle.

(g) Some authors place the erection of the East Saxon kingdom much earlier; but it is improbable, that such a circumstance could have taken place before the reign of Octa or Emeric in the kingdom of Kent, who were princes of a very pacific and unambitious turn. Above half the kingdom of the East Saxons was originally a part of the kingdom of Kent, which was governed by a lieutenant under the Kentish monarch. It is therefore probable that Erchenwin acted as a viceroy to one of these pacific princes, and that he took advantage of his master's peaceable disposition to form his delegated government into a separate royalty.

(h) Deorham, near Puckle-church, was the place where this conflict happened.

in 584, attacked an advanced party of the enemy, commanded by a son of the West Saxon king, whom they slew with his whole detachment. But Ceaulin at the head of the main body, avenged the death of his son by a total defeat of his adversaries (i).

While Ceaulin was propagating the terror of the Saxon arms, a numerous fleet approached the eastern coast, and poured into Britain a powerful body of Angles, who, eager to share in the spoils of the islanders, marched towards the interior under the conduct of Crida, and, being supported by their countrymen, were successful against the wretched natives. Their success was so great, that in 585 they erected a seventh kingdom, which comprehended the midland counties of England. This new kingdom was called Mercia, because it extended to the marches or borders of most of the other kingdoms of Saxon establishment, and likewise to the frontiers of Wales.

But the natives, notwithstanding their losses and defeats, were resolved to attempt the chastisement of the Saxons, particularly of Ceaulin, whose ambition and haughtiness had kindled the jealousy of their contemporary Saxon princes, who were secretly desirous of checking his pride, and crushing his superiority. They knew the aspiring temper of the king of Kent, who, though unsuccessful against Ceaulin before, would gladly embrace an opportunity of attacking him. The decease of Cissa, king of Sussex, who died without issue, stimulated the avidity of Ceaulin, who took immediate possession of that kingdom; which gave great dissatisfaction to the other Saxon kings, and Ethelbert was exceedingly active in fomenting the general displeasure, and a confederacy was formed against the king of the West Saxons. The Britons, desirous of entering into the association, were permitted to join the Saxon confederates with their army; and the allies entered the dominions of Ceaulin in 591, and obtained a complete victory over that prince in the neighbourhood of Wodensburg in Wiltshire. This misfortune was accompanied with one still more alarming; for a considerable part of his subjects rose in rebellion against him, under the conduct of his own nephew Ceolric. The malcontents drove the unhappy monarch into exile, and he died in poverty in 592, the year following the loss of his crown.

The natives of South Britain being now expelled from that territory, except Wales, Cumberland, and Cornwall, where the remains of an oppressed nation still maintained themselves, we proceed to the separate history of the seven kingdoms founded by the Saxons in this country. But some reflections on the causes and consequences of this great revolution will properly precede the narrative of the transactions which distinguished the establishment of the Heptarchy.

When we reflect on the wretched and imbecile state of the Britons at the time of the departure of the Romans, we shall at first be disposed to wonder at the length of time which intervened between the commencement of Saxon hostilities under Hengist and Horsa, and the completion of the Anglo-Saxon Heptarchy; a space of a hundred and thirty years (from the year 455 to the erection of the kingdom of Mercia in 588). It might have been expected, that on the first view of the helpless situation of the natives about the beginning of this period, that the resistance of such a degenerate, unwarlike, and divided nation, against the hostile attempts of such fierce and rapacious tribes, long accustomed to the exercise of arms, would have been feeble in the extreme. But, on a more deliberate review of the subject, there was reason to imagine, that the general indignation which must have inflamed their minds against their perfidious allies, and the despair of obtaining relief or deliverance, would excite the courage and animate the efforts of a people so unjustly attacked, and so egregiously deceived.

The motives which induced the Saxon chiefs to establish their residence in South Britain are obvious. They found their native districts were stocked through the prolific effusions of the northern hive; they were greedy of plunder; and expected to find an ample booty in a country which the Romans had left in a state of opulence and plenty: they knew it to be a more fertile and pleasant region than their own; and, from the weak opposition made by the Britons to the occasional descents of Frank and Saxon pirates, and the irruptions of the Picts and Scots, they concluded that an establishment would be easy, in a province deserted by its Roman protectors. A concurrence of such favourable circumstances prompted the frequent invasions of Britain by the Saxon adventurers. But the natives were not so weak and pusillanimous as the Saxons supposed they were; therefore the greatest cruelty towards the islanders was exercised by the Saxons in their military operations.

Had the natives of South Britain entered with sincerity into a general union when they first suspected the intentions of Hengist and his brother Horsa, they might perhaps have expelled those perfidious chiefs and their followers; but, at the period we are treating of, fatal dissensions prevailed among the petty principalities which had been established after the abdication of the Romans. It is true, that a sovereign had been elected to preside over a confederacy of these states, but the union was imperfect, for the reguli refused submission to his authority. The ill consequences of disunion were aggravated by the incapacity and contemptible character of the sovereign who ostensibly guided the helm at the time of Hengist's arrival: his government, instead of checking, promoted the growth of dissention; and his connivance at the junction of fresh troops to the army of that chieftain, argued a passiveness of deportment that ill became the ruler of a nation in a crisis of danger and emergency. Thus by the want of union among the Britons, by their frequent migrations to Armorica, and by their being driven into Wales, by which their strength rapidly declined, while that of the Saxons was constantly recruited from the continent, all hopes of expelling the intruders vanished from the minds of the natives.

The success of the Saxon adventurers in Britain produced an important change in that part of the island which is now called England, and which received this appellation from its German conquerors, the majority of whom were Angles. The natives were, for the most part, either destroyed or expelled from those regions which composed the heptarchy: the polity, religion, manners, and language, which had lately prevailed in the conquered territories, had retired with their late possessors into other districts; and a new scene appeared in these respects, borrowed from the coasts and forests of Germany. The government here introduced by the Saxons bore nearly the same form as that under which they lived on the continent: the religion of Christ was superseded by the assiduities of Paganism; but the eagerness of the popes to extend Christianity among the nations of Europe, soon caused it to get a footing among the Saxons: and the laws, customs, and habits of life, which had influenced the practice of the original inhabitants, gave way to the imported novelties of the new possessors of the country.

The Britons being now chiefly confined to Wales, their history ceases to form a part of the history of England, except in a secondary or collateral view, when their affairs happen to be connected with those of the English nation.

(i) This battle, by some historians, is said to have taken place in Northumberland; but Bishop Gibson's conjecture appears nearer the truth: he says, with the Saxon Chronicle, that it was fought at Fethanleag, that is, Frethern in Gloucestershire.

BOOK III.

THE HISTORY OF THE KINGDOMS OF THE HEPTARCHY.

CHAPTER I.

Of the Kingdom of KENT.

HENGIST, the first Saxon king in Britain, was the founder of the kingdom of Kent, but as we have already spoken of the most memorable transactions of his life and reign, we shall pass on to Esca, his son and successor, who ascended the throne in 488. He seems not to have possessed the military genius of his father, who first made way for the entrance of the Saxon arms into Britain, but was content to possess in tranquillity the kingdom of Kent, which he left in 512 to his son Octa, in whose time the East Saxons established their monarchy, and dismembered the provinces of Essex and Middlesex from that of Kent. His death, after a reign of twenty-two years, made room for his son Hermenric, in 534, who performed nothing memorable during a reign of upwards of thirty years, except associating with him his son Ethelbert in the government, that he might secure the succession in his family, and prevent such revolutions as are incident to a turbulent and barbarous monarchy. The reign of Ethelbert revived the reputation of his family, which had languished for some generations. The inactivity of his predecessors, and the situation of his country, secured from all hostility with the Britons, seem to have much enfeebled the warlike genius of the Kentish Saxons; and Ethelbert, in his first attempt to aggrandize his country, and distinguish his own name, was unsuccessful. He was twice defeated by Ceaulin, king of Wessex; and obliged to yield the superiority in the heptarchy to that ambitious monarch, who reduced the kingdom of Sussex to subjection, and excited jealousy in all the other princes. An association was formed against him; and Ethelbert, intrusted with the command of the allies, gave him battle, and obtained a decisive victory, in 591, by which he gained the supremacy of the heptarchy. Ceaulin died soon after; and Ethelbert reduced all the princes, except the king of Northumberland, to a strict dependance upon him; and even established himself by force on the throne of Mercia, the most extensive of the Saxon kingdoms. Apprehensive, however, of a dangerous league against him, like that by which he himself had been enabled to overthrow Ceaulin, he had the prudence to resign the kingdom of Mercia to Wibba, the rightful heir, the son of Crida, who had first founded that monarchy. But governed still by ambition more than justice, he gave Wibba possession of the crown on such conditions, as rendered him little better than a tributary prince under the Kentish sovereign.

The most important event which distinguished the reign of Ethelbert, was the introduction of Christianity among the English Saxons, in 597. But as this subject properly belongs to the History of the Church, it will be treated of in the close of this book. Ethelbert enacted, with the consent of the states of his kingdom, a body of laws (k), the first written laws promulgated by any of the northern conquerors; and his reign was in every respect glorious to himself, and beneficial to his people. He governed the kingdom of Kent fifty years; and dying in 616, left the succession to his son, Eadbald, the offspring of his first wife Bertha. This prince, seduced by a passion for his mother-in-law, deserted for some time the Christian faith, which permitted not these incestuous marriages: his whole people immediately returned with him to idolatry. Laurentius, the successor of Augustine in the archbishopric of Canterbury, found the Christian worship wholly abandoned, and was prepared to return to France, in order to escape the mortification of preaching the gospel without fruit to the infidels. Mellitus and Justus, who had been consecrated bishops of London and Rochester, had already departed the kingdom; when Laurentius, before he should entirely abandon his dignity, made one effort to reclaim the king. He appeared before that prince; and throwing off his vestments, showed his body all torn with bruises and stripes, which he had received. Eadbald, wondering that any man should have dared to treat in that manner a person of this rank, was told by Laurentius, that he had received his chastisement from St. Peter, the prince of the apostles, who had appeared to him in a vision, and severely reproving him for his intention to desert his charge, had inflicted on him these visible marks of his displeasure. Whether Eadbald was struck with the miracle, or influenced by some other motive, he divorced himself from his mother-in-law, in 618, and returned to the profession of Christianity: his whole people returned with him. Eadbald reached not the fame or authority of his father, and died in 640, after a reign of twenty-five years; leaving two sons, Erminfrid and Ercombert.

Ercombert, though the younger son, by Emma, a French princess, found means to mount the throne. He is celebrated by Bede for two exploits, for establishing the fast of Lent in his kingdom, and for utterly extirpating idolatry; which, notwithstanding the prevalence of Christianity, had hitherto been tolerated by the two preceding monarchs. He reigned twenty-four years; and left the crown to Egbert his son, in 664, who reigned nine years, and died in 673. This prince is renowned for his encouragement of learning; but infamous for putting to death his two cousin-germans, sons of Erminfrid, his uncle.

The bloody precaution of Egbert could not fix the crown on the head of his son Edric. Lothaire, brother of the deceased prince, took possession of the kingdom; and, in order to secure the power in his family, he associated with him Richard, his son, in the administration of the government. Edric, the dispossessed prince, had recourse to Edilwach, king of Sussex, for assistance; and being supported by that prince, fought a battle with his uncle, who was defeated and slain in 684. Richard fled into Germany, and afterwards died in Lucca, a city of Tuscany.

Lothaire reigned eleven years; Edric his successor, only two. Edric's short reign was exceedingly tumultuous, and his death violent, but history is silent as to the cause of it. Upon his death, which happened in 686, Widred, his brother, obtained possession of the crown: but as the succession had been of late so much disjointed by revolutions and usurpations, faction began to prevail among the nobility; who invited Ceadwalla, king of Wessex, with his brother Mollo, to attack the kingdom. These invaders committed great devastations in Kent; but the death of Mollo, who was slain in a skirmish (l), gave a short breathing-time to that kingdom. Widred restored the affairs of Kent; and, after a reign of thirty-two years, left the crown to his posterity.

Widred's son Eadbert succeeded him in 725, but during his reign the kingdom of Kent was not distinguished by any important transaction, it being now reduced to such a state of insignificance, as neither to awaken the jealousy, nor allure the cupidity, of the other Anglo-Saxon princes.

Ethelbert, another son of Widred, succeeded to the kingdom of Kent in 748: he reigned about twelve years in peace, surviving his own son Ardulf, whom he had associated in the government.

After Ethelbert's death, in 760, Alric, the youngest son of Widred, succeeded to the throne. In the long interval of tranquillity which the kingdom of Kent had enjoyed since the devastations of Ceadwalla, its sovereigns had endeavoured to repair the mischiefs which it then suffered; so that it now assumed a different aspect, and became an object worthy of the ambition of its neighbours. Offa, king of Mercia, desirous of annexing it to his territories, attacked Alric, and defeated him with great carnage, about 774; but he was diverted from pursuing his success by a sudden invasion of Mercia from Wales (m). The duration of Alric's reign is said to have extended to thirty-four years.

His

(k) This code is still extant in the Saxon tongue, and contains not only civil but ecclesiastical laws. It is, however, nothing more than a multifarious gradation of fines.

(l) Such is the account given by Hume, which he borrowed from Higden, Polychron. lib. v. But the Saxon Chronicle, William of Malmesbury, and other historians, assert, that he was consumed, with twelve attendants, in a house to which he had fled, and to which his enemies set fire.

(m) The Saxons gave the name of Wealon or Weales to the country between the Severn and the Irish Sea, and the appellation of Weallas to it;

His son Alcmund had been associated with him in the royal sway; but that prince died before his father, who, by this privation, became the last of the family of Hengist.

On the death of Alric the crown of Kent was disputed by the factious leaders of the state; and the successful candidate was one Eadbert, surnamed Pren, who began to reign in 794, but his reign was very short and unfortunate: for, in 796, Cenulf, king of Mercia, invaded his dominions, which he ravaged with the utmost fury. Eadbert, with all the forces he could muster, gave battle to the intruder, by whom he was defeated and carried prisoner into Mercia. According to the Saxon annalists, he was deprived both of his hands and eyes by command of his inhuman conqueror.

The victorious Mercian conferred the Kentish crown on Cuthred, a person of his own kindred, who held it on his tributary. Cuthred reigned nine years, and was succeeded, in 805, with the consent of Cenulf, by his son Baldred, who also reigned as a vassal of the Mercian monarch. His reign, which lasted eighteen years, was concluded by the submission of Kent to the arms of Egbert, king of Wessex, who, by the medium of his son Ethelwulf, totally defeated the troops of Baldred, and annexed the Kentish kingdom to his own dominions, in 823. The vanquished king fled from the field of battle, and the reduction of Kent was followed by the subjugation of the other Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, which Egbert successively brought under his yoke, so as to unite the petty states of the heptarchy into one powerful kingdom.

The duration of the Kentish kingdom amounted to three hundred and sixty-six years, viz. from 457, when Hengist assumed the regal title, to 823, when its last king was vanquished and dethroned by Egbert.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kingdom of Sussex.

THE founder of this small kingdom was Ælla, who, after carrying on a war with the Britons about fourteen years, took the title of king of the South Saxons in 491. He was active and courageous, but it does not appear that he extended his conquests after he became a king. On the death of Hengist he was regarded as the head of the British Saxons. He reigned twenty-three years, and was succeeded by his son Cissa, in 514, who, if he was brought over by his father, as he is said to have been, must have lived at least to the age of one hundred and thirteen years. The reign of Cissa was more distinguished by its long duration, than by any remarkable transactions that occurred in the course of it. He ruled over the South Saxons, in peace and obscurity, for seventy-six years. He built the city of Chichester, which he denominated Cissan-ceaster, i. e. the fortress of Cissa; at this place he fixed his royal seat, and endeavoured to render it populous and flourishing. He lived in a kind of dependence on his powerful neighbour Cerdic, whom he had frequently assisted with auxiliary forces. He died without issue in 590, and his kingdom was invaded and seized by the ambitious Ceaulin, king of Wessex, who placed his nephew Ceolric on the throne of Sussex in 591. Ceolric afterwards succeeded Ceaulin as king of Wessex.

Ceolric was succeeded in the kingdom of Sussex by his brother Ceolwulf in 607; but as the South Saxons did not quietly submit to the loss of their independence, they took up arms and hazarded an engagement with this prince, in which both parties suffered greatly; but the West Saxons had the advantage, and the revolt was suppressed. After an interval of some years, they made another effort to release themselves from their dependence on Wessex. They embraced the opportunity which the distractions of that country afforded them, when Penda, king of Mercia, had expelled Cenowalch, the West Saxon monarch, from his dominions, in 645, and retained them in his own hands. On this occasion they conferred the title of king on a nobleman, named Adelwalch, in 646, whom Penda did not attempt to deprive of his dignity, which he remained in possession of, till Wulfer, who succeeded Penda in his turbulent spirit, as well as in his throne, invaded Sussex with an army, and overcame Adelwalch in an engagement, whom he made prisoner, and subjected his kingdom to the Mercian yoke in 661. Adelwalch, however, was treated with favour and indulgence: he was converted to Christianity in 664, and Wulfer himself answered for him at the baptismal font. Soon after this he recovered his liberty, with which he received a donation of territory, comprehending the Isle of Wight and a part of Hampshire, then lately subdued by the arms of Mercia. It is probable he was also at the same time restored to the throne of Sussex, but this is uncertain. It is true, however, that he did regain the crown of Sussex, that he reigned peaceably for some years, and that he was afterwards defeated and slain by Ceadwalla, in 685, who became king of Wessex. This was effected by a small number of troops; but it should be recollected that Adelwalch had some time before sent two of his best officers, with an army, into Kent, to assist Edric in dethroning his uncle Lothaire, and that such a diminution of the force of so small a kingdom as that of Sussex must have greatly weakened the efforts of its sovereign.

While the victorious Ceadwalla was prosecuting his success in this kingdom, Berthun and Authun, the two commanders of the South Saxon forces who supported the cause of Edric, returned in triumph from their Kentish expedition. They soon put a stop to his ravages, but being raised to the throne of Wessex, he reduced the kingdom of Sussex to a province of his dominions.

The insignificance of this petty kingdom, and the imperfection of the records of this period, have produced a chasm in the history of Sussex, from the last invasion of Ceadwalla to the thirty-fourth year of the reign of Ina, king of Wessex. In that year (722) the South Saxons rose in arms, with a view of retrieving their independence; but Ina quickly reduced the insurgents to submission. In 725 they again revolted, under the conduct of one Albert, and were again defeated by the arms of the West Saxon monarch, their leader being slain in the engagement.

During the reign of Sigebert in Wessex, they again flew to arms, and elected Osmond king in 754, who ruled over them several years; but Cenulf, the successor of Sigebert, reduced them again to obedience; and Egbert, the last sovereign of Wessex, inherited from Brithric, the successor of Cenulf the firm possession of the South Saxon territories, before he commenced the execution of his grand scheme for reducing under his dominion the whole of the Saxon Heptarchy.

CHAP. III.

Of the Kingdom of Essex.

THERE are no certain accounts of the time when Erchenwin founded this petty kingdom, the principal part of which had belonged to the dominions of Hengist and his immediate successors Esea and Octa. But the events of Erchenwin's reign have not been transmitted to us. He died in peace, and was succeeded by his son Sleda, about 587, who espoused the daughter of Hermenric, king of Kent. The year of his death is not known; but he was succeeded by Sebert, son of the preceding prince. Sebert was the first Christian king of the East Saxons; and in his reign, about the year 610, the first church that was ever built in London, rose in honour of St. Paul, by the direction of his uncle Ethelbert, king of Kent, to whom he was tributary. Not long after, in 612, another Christian church was erected on the site of the present abbey-church of Westminster (n), by order of Sebert, who, after a reign distinguished by no other works than those of piety, left the crown in 616, to his three sons Sexred, Seward, and Sigebert, who reigned in conjunction. These princes re-established Paganism, and expelled from their dominions Mellitus, the first bishop of London. They afterwards engaged in a war with the West Saxons, which terminated in the death of the three brothers, who are said to have been all killed in the same battle in 623.

Sigebert, surnamed the Little, the son of Seward, succeeded his father and uncles; but no transactions of his its inhabitants, not, as some authors have erroneously supposed, because they were strangers, (a meaning which the word will undoubtedly bear,) but on account of their Gallic origin. They also termed the south-western extremity of England Cornweales, the latter part of which word is obviously of the same import with Weales above-mentioned, and the former part of the word plainly intimates the formation of that district, it being shaped somewhat like a horn.

(n) This church is said to have been erected on the ruins of a Roman temple, sacred to Apollo, and that of St. Paul on the site of a temple of Diana. Camden.

reign are recorded. He was succeeded by Sigebert, who derived from his virtues the epithet of Good. Under the auspices of this prince the Christian religion revived in Essex. The Northumbrian king Oswy, had the merit of converting this prince from the errors of Paganism; and a priest of the name of Cedda, who accompanied Sigebert from the court of Oswy to the East Saxon metropolis about the year 654, exerted his endeavours with great success in promoting Christianity. The death of Sigebert, who certainly merited a better fate, was produced by the hand of violence. The circumstances which attended it are worthy of mention. Cedda, who had been raised to the see of London, had excommunicated a nobleman for impurity, and notwithstanding this sentence, by which all conversation with the delinquent was prohibited, the king repaired to his house to partake of a banquet to which he had been invited. The prelate met his royal master returning from the habitation of the excommunicated person. Enraged at Sigebert's neglect of the prohibition, the arrogant priest said, "Because thou hast not abstained from the house of that excommunicate, in that house thou shalt die." This prediction was soon afterwards accomplished; and perhaps the conscientious Cedda, was indirectly concerned in the murder of his sovereign. The agents who inflicted the deadly wound (which the bishop set forth as the vengeance of Heaven on the profane king) were two of Sigebert's relations, one of whom was the excommunicated nobleman, and the second his brother.

Swithelm, brother of the murdered king, ascended the vacant throne, in 661; but as no particulars of his reign are handed down to us, we pass on to his successors.

Sighere and Seba, who jointly ruled the kingdom of Essex in 664. In this reign a pestilential disorder broke out in the southern parts of the island, and spread gradually towards the north; and the East Saxons being particularly afflicted with it, Sighere absurdly imagined that it was sent as a punishment from the gods of the Saxons, on account of their forsaking the religion of their progenitors. Anxious to avert the resentment of the angry deities, he relapsed into Paganism, and many of his people imitated his example. His colleague, however, did not apostatize, and his influence hindered Paganism from gaining the ascendancy in this kingdom: at length Sighere was reconverted, and Christianity again triumphed over the errors of Pagan superstition. Sighere died in 683, and Seba swayed the sceptre alone, till 694, when, in his declining age, he embraced the monastic life.

On Seba's abdication, his crown had sufficient charms to draw his son Sigheard from a monastery to which he had retired. This prince reigned conjointly with his brother Sonfred; they died at no great distance of time from each other, and were succeeded by Offa, son of Sighere, about 705, who likewise, on the persuasion of his wife, a Mercian princess, adopted a life of religious seclusion in 709. The next king of Essex was Selred, descended from Sigebert the Good, whose reign was extended to thirty-four years, though we are not acquainted with the events with which it was attended, or of the particulars of that violence which is said to have closed it in 747. He was the last prince of the family of Erchenwin. Three other persons are recorded to have successively filled the throne of Essex from the death of Selred, namely, Swithred, Sigeric, and Sigered, who were vassals to the kings of Mercia. At length, in 824, this kingdom submitted to the power of the fortunate Egbert.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Kingdom of NORTHUMBERLAND.

THE regal title over that extensive territory which lies between the Forth and the Humber, was not assumed by any of the Saxon chiefs till the arrival of Ida, in 547, who founded the kingdom of Bernicia, which was soon followed by the erection of that of Diera. With respect to Ida, we have reason to believe, that he filled the throne of Bernicia with distinguished credit to himself, and advantage to his subjects. He died in 560, the thirteenth year after his landing on the shores of Britain. Nothing is recorded of his son Adda, who succeeded him on the throne, nor of Clappa, Freothulf, Theodoric, and Ethelfrid, who successively ruled the kingdom of Bernicia for thirty years after the death of Ida.

During the reigns of all these kings Ælla still governed the neighbouring kingdom of Diera, of which he was the founder. By marrying his daughter Acca to Ethelfrid, the son and co-adjutor of Ethelric, he was the unintentional promoter of the union of the two kingdoms in the person of his son-in-law, to the prejudice of his own son Edwin's right to the Dierian succession. Ethelric, who was a son of the illustrious Ida, died after a short reign; surviving Ælla only two years, and was succeeded by Ethelfrid, in 590, who by the expulsion of Edwin, the infant son of Ælla, usurped the territories to which that prince had a superior claim. He thus united into one monarchy all the Anglo-Saxon possessions to the north of the Humber; and the names of Diera and Bernicia were sunk for a time in the general denomination of Northumberland. He was a prince of great courage, capacity, and ambition, and was the only Saxon monarch who disdained and refused subserviency to the authoritative demands of Ethelbert king of Kent. He spread the terror of the Saxon arms to the neighbouring people; and obtained a signal victory over Aidan, king of Scotland in 603; but his victory was dearly purchased, for he lost his brother Theobald, with all the troops which that prince commanded: he, however, extended his dominions in the north.

Ethelfrid afterwards waged war with the Britons, from whom he wrested some territories bordering on North Wales. In the progress of his conquests, he advanced to Chester, then a considerable town, to which he laid siege. The Britons marched out with all their forces to engage him; and they were attended by a body of one thousand two hundred and fifty monks from the monastery of Bangor, who stood at a small distance from the field of battle, in order to encourage the combatants by their presence and exhortations. Ethelfrid enquiring the purpose of this unusual appearance, was told, that these priests had come to pray against him: "Then are they as much our enemies," said he, "as those who intend to fight against us:" And he immediately sent a detachment, who fell upon them, and did such execution, that only fifty escaped with their lives. The Britons, astonished at this event, received a total defeat: Chester was obliged to surrender: and Ethelfrid, pursuing his victory, made himself master of Bangor, and entirely demolished the monastery; a building so extensive, that there was a mile's distance from one gate of it to another; and it contained two thousand one hundred monks, who are said to have been there maintained by their own labour.

Notwithstanding Ethelfrid's success in war, he lived in inquietude on account of young Edwin, whom he had unjustly dispossessed of the crown of Diera. This prince, now grown to man's estate, wandered from place to place, in continual danger from the attempts of Ethelfrid; and received at last protection in the court of Redwald, king of the East Angles in 615; where his engaging deportment procured him general esteem and affection. Redwald, however, was strongly solicited by the king of Northumberland to kill or deliver up his guest: rich presents were promised him if he would comply; and war denounced against him in case of his refusal. After rejecting several messages of this kind, his generosity began to yield to the motives of interest: and he retained the last ambassador, till he should come to a resolution in a case of such importance. Edwin, informed of his friend's perplexity, was yet determined at all hazards to remain in East-Anglia; and thought, that if the protection of that court failed him, it were better to die, than prolong a life so much exposed to the persecutions of his powerful rival. This confidence in Redwald's honour and friendship, with his other accomplishments, engaged the queen on his side; and she effectually represented to her husband the infamy of delivering up to certain destruction their royal guest, who had fled to them for protection against his cruel and jealous enemies. Redwald embracing more generous resolutions, thought it safest to prevent Ethelfrid, before that prince was aware of his intention, and to attack him while he was yet unprepared for defence. He marched suddenly with an army into the kingdom of Northumberland, and fought a battle with Ethelfrid in 617; in which that monarch was defeated and killed, after avenging himself by the death of Regner, son of Redwald. His own sons, Eanfrid, Oswald, and Oswy, yet infants, were carried into Scotland; and Edwin obtained possession of the crown of Northumberland.

Edwin commenced his administration with the true spirit of a patriot king. He enacted the wisest laws for securing the peace of the community, and established admirable regulations gulations for promoting the prosperity of this people. The police which he introduced was so perfect, that acts of violence and rapine, which had been so frequent in the reign of his predecessor, were, in his time, almost unknown to the practice of the Northumbrians.

Edwin was the greatest prince of the Heptarchy in that age, and distinguished himself, by his influence over the other kingdoms, as well as by the strict execution of justice in his own dominions. He reclaimed his subjects from the licentious life to which they had been accustomed; and it was a common saying, that during this reign a woman or child might openly carry every where a purse of gold, without any danger of violence or robbery. There is a remarkable instance, transmitted to us, of the affection born him by his servants. Cuichelme, king of Wessex, was his enemy; but finding himself unable to maintain open war against so courageous and powerful a prince, he determined to use treachery against him, and he employed one Eumer for that criminal purpose. The assassin having obtained admittance, by pretending to deliver a message from Cuichelme, drew his dagger, and rushed upon the king. Lilla, an officer of his army, seeing his master's danger, and having no other means of defence, interposed with his own body between the king and Eumer's dagger, which was pushed with such violence, that, after piercing Lilla, it even wounded Edwin: but before the assassin could renew his blow, he was dispatched by the king's attendants.

The East-Angles conspired against Redwald, their king; and having put him to death, they offered their crown to Edwin, of whose valour and capacity they had had experience, while he resided among them. But Edwin, from a sense of gratitude towards his benefactor, obliged them to submit to Earpwold, the son of Redwald; and that prince preserved his authority, under the protection of the Northumbrian monarch.

Edwin, after his accession to the crown, married Ethelburga, the daughter of Ethelbert, king of Kent. This princess, emulating the glory of her mother Bertha, who had been the instrument for converting her husband and his people to Christianity, carried Paulinus, a learned bishop, along with her; and besides stipulating a toleration for the exercise of her own religion, which was readily granted her, she used every reason to persuade the king to embrace it. Edwin hesitated on the proposal; but promised to examine the foundations of that doctrine; and declared, that if he found them satisfactory, he was willing to be converted. Accordingly he held several conferences with Paullinus; canvassed the arguments propounded with the wisest of his counsellors; retired frequently from company, in order to revolve alone that important question; and, after a serious and long enquiry, declared in favour of the Christian religion: the people soon after imitated his example. Besides the authority and influence of the king, they were moved by another striking example. Coifi, the high-priest, being converted after a public conference with Paullinus, led the way in destroying the images, which he had so long worshipped, and was forward in making this atonement for his past idolatry.

This able prince perished with his son, Osfrid, in a great battle which he fought against Penda, king of Mercia, and Cadwallon, king of North Wales. That event, which happened in the forty-eighth year of Edwin's age and seventeenth of his reign, divided the monarchy of Northumberland, which that prince had united in his person. Eanfrid, the son of Ethelfrid, returned with his brothers, Oswald and Oswy, from Scotland, and took possession of Bernicia, his paternal kingdom: Osric, Edwin's cousin-german, established himself in Deïra, the inheritance of his family; but to which the sons of Edwin had a preferable title. Eanfrid, the elder surviving son, fled to Penda, by whom he was treacherously slain. The younger son, Vuscfræa, with Yffi, the grandson of Edwin, by Osfrid, sought protection in Kent, and not finding themselves in safety there, retired into France to king Dagobert, where they died.

Osric, king of Deïra, and Eanfrid of Bernicia, returned to paganism; and the whole people seem to have returned with them; since Paullinus, who was the first archbishop of York, and who had converted them, thought proper to retire with Ethelburga, the queen dowager into Kent. Both these Northumbrian kings perished soon after, the first in battle against Cadwallon, the Briton; the second, by the treachery of that prince. Oswald, the brother of Eanfrid, of the race of Bernicia, united again the kingdom of Northumberland in the year 634, and restored the Christian religion in his dominions. He gained a compleat victory over Cadwallon, after an obstinate and well-disputed contest in 635; the last vigorous effort which the Britons made against the Saxons.

He died in battle against Penda, king of Mercia, in 642, and was succeeded by his brother Oswy; who established himself in the government of the whole Northumbrian kingdom, by putting to death Oswin, the son of Osric, the last king of the race of Deïra. His son Egfrid succeeded him in 670; who perished in battle against the Picts, without leaving any children, because Adelthrid, his wife, refused to violate her vow of chastity. Alfred, his natural brother, acquired possession of the kingdom, which he governed for nineteen years; and left it to Osred, his son, a boy of eight years of age, in 704. This prince, after a reign of eleven years, was murdered by Kenred his kinsman, who, after enjoying the crown only a year, perished by a like fate. Osric, and after him Ceolwulph the son of Kenred, next mounted the throne, which the latter relinquished in the year 738, in favour of Eadbert his cousin-german, who, imitating his predecessor, abdicated the crown, and retired into a monastery. Oswulf, son of Eadbert, was slain in a sedition, a year after his accession to the crown, in 759; and Mollo, who was not of the royal family, seized the crown. He perished by the treachery of Ailred, a prince of the blood; who, having succeeded in his design upon the throne, was soon after expelled by his subjects. Ethelred (o), his successor, the son of Mollo, underwent a like fate. Celwold, the next king, the brother of Ailred, was deposed and slain by the people, and his place was filled by Osred, his nephew, who, after a short reign of a year, made way for Ethelbert, another son of Mollo, whose death was equally tragical with that of almost all his predecessors. After Ethelbert's death an universal anarchy prevailed in Northumberland; and the people having, by so many fatal revolutions, lost all attachment to their government and princes, were well prepared for subjection to a foreign yoke; which Egbert, king of Wessex, finally imposed upon them, in 827.

CHAP. V.

Of the Kingdom of East-Anglia.

THE reign of Uffa, the Saxon chief who erected the kingdom of East Anglia in 573 is so lost in obscurity, that we cannot communicate any of the transactions of his reign. He was succeeded in 578 by his son Titil; from whom the crown passed to Redwald, his son, in 599, a prince who acquired a high reputation among the kings of the Heptarchy. Educated in the arts of government under the auspices of Ethelbert, king of Kent, he became an eminent and illustrious prince. He received baptism at the court of that monarch; but he does not appear to have been zealous in his profession of Christianity; for the persuasions of his Pagan queen induced him to revert his former religion; but he offered no violence to the consciences of his subjects. It was this king who succoured the fugitive Edwin, which we have already mentioned, whom he placed on the Northumbrian throne. He was, after the subjugation of Northumberland, elevated to the rank of chief of the Saxon confederacy, in 617. At his death, in 624, already noticed, his crown was offered to Edwin, but he refused it, and persuaded the East-Angles to acknowledge Earpwald, the son of Redwald, as their king. He was assassinated by Riobert, a Pagan nobleman in 633, the same year in which Edwin was slain in battle.

After an interregnum of three years, Sigebert, uterine brother of Earpwald, returned from France, whither he had fied from the jealousy of Redwald his father-in-law, and was placed on the throne of East-Anglia, 636. He restored the influence of the Christian faith among his subjects, most of whom had apostatized on the death of Earpwald. Having imbibed, during his exile, a taste for literature, he was eager to disseminate among his people the advantages of learning, and therefore established schools for their instruction. After he had thus provided for the intellectual improvement of the East-Angles, he quitted his throne for a life of religious retirement.

(o) Towards the close of the reign of this prince, in 793, the Danes made a descent on Lindisfarne, pillaged the monastery of that island, massacred some of its inmates, and carried others to their ships as prisoners. The plunder collected by them in this predatory expedition allured them to a repetition of their piratical ravages in the subsequent year; but their second descent on the Northumbrian territories did not terminate so fortunately as the first. After they had plundered the monastery of Waremouth, the inhabitants rose in arms against them, killed one of their captains, and drove them to their vessels; and a storm which then arose wrecked several of their ships, so that many of the pirates were drowned, and those that were forced back on the coast suffered decapitation or other modes of death from the hands of the enraged Northumbrians.

About 642, Egric, one of Sigebert's kindred, was raised to the throne, which he did not long enjoy in peace. He had the misfortune to be a neighbour to Penda the Mercian, whose appetite for war was insatiable. That monarch invaded his dominions, and so harrassed his subjects, that they requested Sigebert to leave his retreat, and take the field as a general. Though he was prevailed upon to repair to the camp, he did not attempt to sustain that military character which the East-Angles supposed he would. He was so far from exerting the functions of a warrior, that he appeared in the field bearing a wand instead of a warlike weapon; and a battle ensuing, he was slain with his royal kinsman, and the East-Anglian troops underwent a total defeat in 644.

Annas, a prince of the blood, was preferred to the vacant throne. He afforded refuge to Cenowalch, when that prince had been expelled from his kingdom of Wessex by Penda. The royal exile, after receiving baptism at the court of his protector, found means to recover his dominions; and it is probable that Annas furnished him with some assistance for that purpose. On this account Penda marched an army into the territories of Annas, slew that prince and his eldest son in battle, and cut off a great part of the East-Anglian forces, in 654.

Ethelhere, the brother and successor of Annas, made his submissions to Penda, and joined that king in the invasion of Northumberland, where they both perished in the field, in the year 655. Ethelhere was succeeded in the throne by Ethelwald, the only surviving brother of Annas. This prince obscurely reigned for nine years, and was succeeded by his nephew Aldulf, in 664. After Adulf the throne was filled by Elfwald, Switheard, Beorna, and Ethelred, who reigned successively in equal obscurity. On the death of the last of these princes, his son Ethelbert, a prince of considerable merit, wore the crown of East-Anglia. He made propositions of marriage to Elfrida, one of the daughters of Offa, king of Mercia, who invited him to his court at Hereford, for the solemnization of the nuptials, and then ordered him to be privately beheaded, in 792; an act of treachery that will ever stigmatize the memory of Offa, who immediately after the assassination seized upon the dominions of the murdered Ethelbert. From this period to the union of the Heptarchy East-Anglia formed a province of Mercia.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Kingdom of MERCIA.

MERCIA was the most spacious of all the kingdoms of the Heptarchy, except, perhaps, that of Northumberland in its most enlarged state. Crida was the fortunate chief who erected it into a monarchy in 585; but we are not acquainted with the particular progress of his arms in acquiring so extensive a tract, though there is every reason to believe he met with but little opposition, the minds of the Britons being completely bowed down by the time of his arrival.

On the death of Crida, in 593, Ethelbert, the ambitious and powerful king of Kent, seized on his dominions, and maintained himself three years in his usurpation, when he placed Wibba, in 596, who was the son of Crida, on the throne. He extended the western boundaries of his kingdom at the expence of the Britons. After his death his kinsman Ceorl was placed on the throne, by the influence of the Kentish monarch, in 615. Wibba indeed left a son of the name of Penda, who was about forty years of age; but being of a turbulent disposition, Ethelbert thought fit to displace him, and set the crown on the head of Ceorl; who made no attempt to release himself from the Kentish yoke during the life of Ethelbert, but after that prince's death he rendered himself independent of all control, except that which belonged to the chief of the heptarchical union; a station then filled by the East-Anglian Redwald. Having reigned ten years, his death, in 625, made way for the accession of Penda, who was then fifty years old; but his temerity and restless disposition were found nowise abated by time, experience, or reflection. He engaged in continual hostilities against all the neighbouring states; and, by his injustice and violence, rendered himself equally odious to his own subjects and to strangers. Sigebert, Egric, and Annas, three kings of East-Anglia, perished successively in battle against him; as did also Edwin and Oswald, the two greatest princes that had reigned over Northumberland. At last, Oswy, brother to Oswald, having defeated and slain him in a decisive battle, freed the world from this sanguinary tyrant. Peada, his son, mounted the throne of Mercia in 655, and lived under the protection of Oswy, whose daughter Alchfleda he had espoused. This princess was educated in the Christian faith, and she employed her influence with success, in converting her husband and his subjects to that religion. Thus the fair sex have had the merit of introducing the Christian doctrine into all the most considerable kingdoms of the Saxon Heptarchy. Peada died a violent death. His son, Wulfhere, succeeded to the government in 659, and after having reduced to dependence the kingdoms of Essex and East-Anglia, he left the crown to his brother Ethelred, who, though a lover of peace, showed himself not unfit for military enterprizes. Besides making a successful expedition into Kent, he repulsed Egfrid, king of Northumberland, who had invaded his dominions; and he slew in battle Elfwin, the brother of that prince. Desirous, however, of composing all animosities with Egfrid, he paid him a sum of money as a compensation for the loss of his brother. After a prosperous reign of thirty years, he resigned the crown to Cenred, son of Wulfhere, in 702, and retired into the monastery of Bardney in Lincolnshire. Cenred returned the present of the crown to Ceolred, the son of Ethelred, in 709; and making a pilgrimage to Rome, passed his life there in penance and devotion. The place of Ceolred was supplied by Ethelbald, in 716, who was great-grand nephew to Penda, by Alwy, his brother; and this prince, being slain in a mutiny, was succeeded by Offa, who was a degree more remote from Penda, by Eawa, another brother.

This prince, who mounted the throne in 755, had some great qualities, and was successful in his warlike enterprizes against Lothaire, king of Kent, and Kenwulph, king of Wessex. He defeated the former in a bloody battle at Otford upon the Darent, and reduced the kingdom to a state of dependence: he gained a victory over the latter at Bensington in Oxfordshire; and conquering that county, together with that of Gloucester, annexed both to his dominions. But all these successes were stained by his treacherous murder of Ethelbert (p), king of the East-Angles, and his violent seizing of that kingdom. The perfidious prince, desirous of re-establishing his character in the world, and perhaps of appeasing the remorses of his own conscience, paid great court to the clergy, and practised all the monkish devotion so much esteemed in that ignorant and superstitious age. He gave the tenth of his goods to the church; bestowed rich donations on the cathedral of Hereford, and even made a pilgrimage to Rome, where his great power and riches could not fail of procuring him the papal absolution. The better to ingratiate himself with the sovereign pontiff, he engaged to pay him a yearly donation for the support of an English college at Rome, and in order to raise the sum, he imposed the tax of a penny on each house possessed of thirty pence a year. This imposition, being afterwards levied on all England, was commonly denominated Peter's pence; and though conferred at first as a gift, was afterwards claimed as a tribute by the Roman pontiff. Carrying his hypocrisy still farther, Offa, feigning to be directed by a vision from heaven discovered at Verulam the reliques of St. Alban, the martyr, and endowed a magnificent monastery in that place. Moved by all these acts of piety, Malmesbury, one of the best of the old English historians, declares himself at a loss to determine whether the merits or crimes of this prince preponderated. Offa died, after a reign of thirty-nine years, in 796 (q).

Offa,

(p) We have mentioned the circumstances attending the death of this prince above, chap. v.

(q) This prince was become so considerable in the Heptarchy, that the emperor Charlemagne entered into an alliance and friendship with him;

Offa, in order to protect his country from Wales, drew a rampart or ditch of a hundred miles in length, from Basinwerke in Flintshire, to the south sea near Bristol. See Speed's Description of Wales. This place is still called Offa's Dike.

Egfrith succeeded to his father, Offa, but survived him only five months; when he made way for Cenulf, a descendant of the royal family. This prince waged war against Kent; and taking Egbert, the king, prisoner, he cut off his hands, and put out his eyes; leaving Cuthred, his own brother, in possession of the crown of that kingdom. Cenulf was killed, in 819, in an insurrection of the East-Anglians, whose crown his predecessor, Offa, had usurped. He left his son, Cenelm, a minor; who was murdered the same year by his sister, Quendrida, who had entertained the ambitious view of assuming the government. But she was supplanted by her uncle, Ceolwulf; who, two years after, in 821, was dethroned by Beornulf. The reign of this usurper, who was not of the royal family, was short and unfortunate: he was defeated by the West-Saxons, and killed by his own subjects, the East-Angles, in 824. Ludican, his successor, underwent the same fate; and Withlaff, who mounted this unstable throne, and found every thing in the utmost confusion, could not withstand the fortune of Egbert, who united all the Saxon kingdoms into one great monarchy.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Kingdom of WESSEX.

THE kingdom of Wessex, which finally swallowed up all the other Saxon states, met with great resistance on its first establishment: and the Britons, who were now enured to arms, yielded not tamely their possessions to those invaders. Cerdic, the founder of the monarchy, and his son, Cenric, fought many successful and some unsuccessful battles against the natives; and the martial spirit, common to all the Saxons, was, by means of these hostilities, carried to the greatest height among this tribe. Ceaulin, who was the son and successor of Cenric, and who began his reign in 560, was still more ambitious and enterprising than his predecessors; and, by waging continual war against the Britons, he added a great part of the counties of Devon and Somerset to his other dominions. Carried along by the tide of success, he invaded the other Saxon states in his neighbourhood, and becoming terrible to all, he provoked a general confederacy against him. This alliance proved successful under the conduct of Ethelbert, king of Kent; and Ceaulin, who had lost the affections of his own subjects by his violent disposition, and had now fallen into contempt from his misfortunes, was expelled the throne, and died in exile and misery. Cuichelme and Cuthwin, his sons, governed jointly the kingdom, till the expulsion of the latter in 591, and the death of the former in 593, made way for Ceolric, to whom succeeded Ceolwulf in 593, by whose death, which happened in 611, Cinigisil inherited the crown. This prince embraced Christianity, through the persuasion of Oswald, king of Northumberland, who had married his daughter, and who had attained a great ascendant in the Heptarchy. Cenowalch succeeded to the monarchy in 643, and dying in 672, left the succession so much disputed, that Sexburga, his widow, a woman of spirit, kept possession of the government till her death, which happened two years after. Escwin then peaceably acquired the crown; and, after a short reign of two years, made way for Centwin, who governed nine years. Ceodwalla, his successor, mounted not the throne, in 685, without opposition; but proved a great prince, according to the ideas of those times; that is, he was enterprising, warlike, and successful. He entirely subdued the kingdom of Sussex, and annexed it to his own dominions, in 686. He made inroads into Kent; but met with resistance from Widred, the king, who proved successful against Mollo, brother to Ceodwalla, and slew him in a skirmish. Ceodwalla, at last, tired with wars and bloodshed, was seized with a fit of devotion; bestowed several endowments on the church, and made a pilgrimage to Rome, where he received baptism, and died in 689. Ina, his successor, inherited the military virtues of Ceodwalla, and added to them the more valuable ones of justice, policy, and prudence. He made war upon the Britons in Somerset; and having finally subdued that province, he treated the vanquished with a humanity hitherto unknown to the Saxon conquerors. He allowed the proprietors to retain possession of their lands, encouraged marriages and alliances between them and his ancient subjects, and gave them the privilege of being governed by the same laws. These laws he augmented and ascertained; and though he was disturbed by some insurrections at home, his long reign of thirty-seven years may be regarded as one of the most glorious and most prosperous of the Heptarchy. In the decline of his age he made a pilgrimage to Rome; and after his return, shut himself up in a cloister, where he died.

Ina having no children of his own, and lying much under the influence of Ethelburga, his queen, left by will the succession to Ethelard, her brother, who was his remote kinsman; but this destination did not take place without some difficulty. Oswald, a prince more nearly allied to the crown, took arms against Ethelard; but he being suppressed, and dying soon after, the title of Ethelard was not any farther disputed; and in the year 741, he was succeeded by his cousin Cuthred. The reign of this prince was distinguished by a great victory which he obtained, by means of Ethelhun, his general, over Ethelbald, king of Mercia. His death in 754, made way for Sigebert, his kinsman, who rendered himself so odious to his subjects by his cruelties, and attempts to establish a despotic dominion over them, that they rose in an insurrection, and dethroned him, crowning Cenulf in his stead, in 755. The exiled prince found a refuge with duke Cumbra, governor of Hampshire; who, that he might add new obligations to Sigebert, gave him many salutary counsels for his future conduct, accompanied with some reprehensions for the past. But these were so much resented by the ungrateful prince, that he conspired against the life of his protector, and treacherously murdered him. After this infamous action, he was forsaken by all the world; and wandering about in the wilds and forests, was at last discovered by a servant of Cumbra's, who instantly took revenge upon him for the murder of his master.

Cenulf, who had obtained the crown on the expulsion of Sigebert, was fortunate in many expeditions against the Britons of Cornwall; but afterwards lost some reputation by his ill success against Offa, king of Mercia, who wrested from him those portions of the counties of Oxford and Gloucester which had for some time belonged to the West-Saxon kingdom. Cynehard also, brother to the deposed Sigebert, gave him disturbance; and though expelled the kingdom, he hovered on the frontiers, and watched an opportunity for attacking his rival. The king had an intrigue with a young woman who lived at Merton in Surrey, whither having secretly retired, he was on a sudden invironed, in the night-time, by Cynehard and his followers, and after making a vigorous resistance, was murdered, with all his attendants. The nobility and people of the neighbourhood, rising next day in arms, took revenge on Cynehard for the slaughter of their king, and put every one to the sword who had been engaged in that criminal enterprize. This event happened in 784.

Brithric next obtained possession of the government, though remotely descended from the royal family; but he enjoyed not that dignity without inquietude. Eoppa, nephew to king Ina, by his brother Ingild, who died before that prince, had begot Eta, father to Alchmond, from whom sprung Egbert, a young man of the most promising hopes, who gave great jealousy to Brithric, the reigning prince, both because he seemed by his birth better entitled to the crown, and because he had acquired, to an eminent degree, the affections of the people. Egbert, sensible of his danger from the suspicions of Brithric, secretly withdrew into France; where he was well received by Charlemagne. By living in the court, and serving in the armies of that prince, him; a circumstance which did honour to Offa; as distant princes at that time had usually little communication with each other. That emperor being a great lover of learning and learned men, in an age very barren of that ornament, Offa, at his desire, sent him over Alcuin, a clergyman much celebrated for his knowledge, who received great honours from Charlemagne, and even became his preceptor in the sciences. The chief reason why he had at first desired the company of Alcuin, was, that he might oppose his learning to the heresy of Felix, bishop of Urgil in Catalonia; who maintained, that Jesus Christ, considered in his human nature, could, more properly, be denominated the adoptive, than the natural, son of God. This heresy was condemned in the council of Francfort, held in 794, and consisting of three hundred bishops. Such were the questions which were agitated in that age, and which employed the attention not only of cloistered scholars, but of the wisest and greatest princes.

he acquired those accomplishments, which afterwards enabled him to make such a shining figure on the throne. And familiarizing himself to the manners of the French, who, as Malmesbury observes, were eminent both for valour and civility above all the western nations, he learned to polish the rudeness and barbarity of the Saxon character: his early misfortunes thus proved of singular advantage to him.

It was not long ere Egbert had opportunities of displaying his natural and acquired talents. Brithric, king of Wessex, had married Eadburga, natural daughter of Offa, king of Mercia, a profligate woman, equally infamous for cruelty and for incontinence. Having great influence over her husband, she often instigated him to destroy such of the nobility as were noxious to her; and where this expedient failed, she scrupled not being herself active in traiterous attempts against them. She had mixed a cup of poison for a young nobleman, who had acquired her husband's friendship, and had on that account become the object of her jealousy: but, unfortunately, the king drank of the cup along with his favourite, and soon after expired, in 800. This tragical incident, joined to her other crimes, rendered Eadburga, so odious, that she was obliged to fly into France (r); whence Egbert was at the same time recalled by the nobility, in order to ascend the throne of his ancestors, which he did in 801.

In the kingdoms of the Heptarchy, an exact rule of succession was either unknown or not strictly observed; and thence the reigning prince was continually agitated with jealousy against all the princes of the blood, whom he still considered as rivals, and whose death alone could give him entire security in his possession of the throne. From this fatal cause, together with the admiration of the monastic life, and the opinion of merit attending the preservation of chastity even in a married state, the royal families had been entirely extinguished in all the kingdoms except that of Wessex; and the emulations, suspicions, and conspiracies, which had formerly been confined to the princes of the blood alone, were now diffused among all the nobility in the several Saxon states. Egbert was the sole descendant of those first conquerors who subdued Britain, and who enhanced their authority by claiming a pedigree from Woden, the supreme divinity of their ancestors. But that prince, though invited by this favourable circumstance to make attempts on the neighbouring Saxons, gave them for some time no disturbance, and rather chose to turn his arms against the Britons in Cornwall, whom he defeated in several battles. He was recalled from the conquest of that country by an invasion made upon his dominions by Beornulf, king of Mercia.

The Mercians, before the accession of Egbert, had very nearly attained the absolute sovereignty in the Heptarchy: They had reduced the East-Angles under subjection, and established tributary princes in the kingdoms of Kent and Essex. Northumberland was involved in anarchy; and no state of any consequence remained but that of Wessex, which, much inferior in extent to Mercia, was supported solely by the great qualities of its sovereign. Egbert led his army against the invaders; and encountering them at Ellandum in Wiltshire, obtained a complete victory, and by the great slaughter which he made of them in their flight, gave a mortal blow to the power of the Mercians. Whilst he himself, in prosecution of his victory, entered their country on the side of Oxfordshire, and threatened the heart of their dominions; he sent an army into Kent, commanded by Ethelwulph, his eldest son; and expelling Baldred, the tributary king, soon made himself master of that country. The kingdom of Essex was conquered with equal facility; and the East-Angles, from their hatred to the Mercian government, which had been established over them by treachery and violence, and probably exercised with tyranny, immediately rose in arms, and craved the protection of Egbert. Beornulf, the Mercian king, who marched against them, was defeated and slain; and two years after, Ludican, his successor, met with the same fate. These insurrections and calamities facilitated the enterprises of Egbert, who advanced into the centre of the Mercian territories, and made easy conquests over a dispirited and divided people. In order to engage them more easily to submission, he allowed Withlaf, their countryman, to retain the title of king, whilst he himself exercised the real powers of sovereignty. The anarchy which prevailed in Northumberland, tempted him to carry still farther his victorious arms; and the inhabitants, unable to resist his power, and desirous of possessing some established form of government, were forward, on his first appearance, to send deputies, who met him in form at a place called Dore in Yorkshire, submitted to his authority, and swore allegiance to him as their sovereign. Egbert, however, still allowed to Northumberland, as he had done to Mercia and East-Anglia, the power of electing a king, who paid him tribute, and was dependent on him.

Thus were united all the kingdoms of the Heptarchy in one great state, near four hundred years after the first arrival of the Saxons in Britain; and the fortunate arms and prudent policy of Egbert at last effected, what had been so often attempted in vain by so many princes. Kent, Northumberland, and Mercia, which had successively aspired to general dominion, were now incorporated in his empire; and the other subordinate kingdoms seemed willingly to share the same fate. His territories were nearly of the same extent with what is now properly called England; and a favourable prospect was afforded to the Anglo-Saxons, of establishing a civilized monarchy, possessed of tranquillity within itself, and secure against foreign invasion. This great event happened in the year 827.

It requires but a small degree of reflection to point out the causes that co-operated to the dissolution of the government of the Heptarchy. The principal source seems to have been the degeneracy of the Saxon spirit, which became very visible in the last century of the Heptarchy. It is a remark of Bede, one of the most intelligent of the Anglo-Saxon historians, that the decline of the martial courage among his countrymen had so manifestly shown itself in his time, as to threaten consequences fatal to their tranquillity and independence. The diminution of their warlike spirit was partly the effect of that indolence which seized them after their conversion to Christianity, and partly to the peaceful establishment which they enjoyed after a series of war and tumult. In addition to this neglect of military attainments, which weakened the efforts of the states of the Heptarchy, and promoted their subjection to the controul of one sovereign, who, in a few years of peace, had prepared his subjects for conflicts by improvements in discipline and military tactics, we may observe, that the divisions which took place in most of the kingdoms on the extinction of the male line of their royal families, the contests for the succession, and the jealousies which filled the mind of the reigning prince, which suspected the attempts of such nobles as conceived themselves equally entitled to the crown with himself, produced frequent disturbances among the people, and at length prompted them to an easy surrender of their liberty and independence to a prince, who, like Egbert, was almost the sole remaining descendant in Britain of the family of Woden, to whom all the Saxons looked up with habitual reverence and esteem.

Another cause, which contributed largely to the union of the Heptarchy, was the profusion of many of the kings to the ecclesiastical establishment, which diminished their ability of rewarding the services of the field, of maintaining the dignity of their royal station, and of preserving that influence which is requisite for a kingly form of government.

Another, and a principal cause of this union, was the superstitious inclination which manifested itself for the retirement of a cloister. The clergy of the times prompted the kings and nobles to this dereliction of worldly affairs, which they recommended as the certain means of procuring a remission of sins. No fewer than eight kings of the Heptarchy (s) exchanged their royal robes for the monastic habit; and this example was imitated by a considerable number of the nobility. The continuance of such a practice must have conduced to the enervation of those states among which it most prevailed, as it deprived them of the active service of many who would otherwise have been able defenders of their countries' liberties. It may be farther remarked, that the great inequality of the seven kingdoms in power and magnitude accelerated their final union.

In assigning the probable causes of the establishment of (r) She went to the court of Charlemagne, who having cherished a friendly correspondence with her father, appointed her to the government of a wealthy abbey. She soon forfeited this comfortable situation by her incontinence, which so disgusted the emperor, that he insisted on her departure. She then led the life of a vagabond, and at length died in Pavia in misery and depression, affording a lesson to the readers of history, that no elevation of rank will shield from contempt and misfortune those who abandon the dignity of their character, and devote themselves to a series of profligacy and iniquity.

(s) These were, Sigebert, king of the East Angles, in 642; Seba, king of the East Saxons, in 694; Ethelred, king of Mercia, in 704; Cenred his successor, and Offa, king of the East Saxons, in 709; Ina, king of Wessex, in 728; Ceolwulf and Eadbert, kings of Northumberland, in 738 and 758.

a monarchy in place of the heptarchial government, it may not be impertinent to add, that the appointment of a head to the Anglo-Saxon confederacy seems to have contributed in some measure to the dissolution of that Heptarchy which it was formed to cement: for so many of them had perverted the original purposes of this institution, by transforming it into an engine of despotism, the passion of the people for independence gradually declined, so as to prepare them for submission to an acknowledged master, in the place of one who, though invested with an imperfect kind of superiority over the other kings of the Heptarchy, affected to consider himself as authorized in the exertion of unlimited supremacy.

CHAP. VIII.

The History of the British Church from the final Departure of the Romans till the Expulsion of the Britons from the greater Part of the Country now called England, by the Formation of the Saxon Heptarchy.

GERMANUS bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus bishop of Troyes, were indefatigable in their endeavours to exterminate the heresy of Pelagius from the minds of the British Christians; but it does not appear that it was so effectually overcome as those venerable prelates had imagined. The advocates of Pelagianism, after an interval of silence, renewed with astonishing zeal the propagation of their heretical dogmas; and although the learned arguments of the two prelates had appeared so cogent to the greater part of their auditors, their tendency was afterwards counteracted by the sophistry of the Pelagian leaders. That alarm, therefore, which had subsided on the apparent success of the disputation at Verulam, now revived in the minds of the orthodox churchmen, who again had recourse to the expedient of sending over to Gaul for spiritual succour (t). Germanus answered this application by repairing a second time to Britain, about the year 445, and was accompanied by Severus bishop of Treves. The pretended miracles which these prelates wrought, joined to their preaching and exhortations, reclaimed many from the devious paths of heterodoxy; but being unwilling to place their sole confidence on the virtue of their miracles, or in the efficacy of argument, they thought proper to employ one of the engines of the church, and put in force an edict of the emperor Valentinian III. which condemns heretics to exile. The people having delivered up to them the most strenuous abettors of Pelagianism, the two bishops, enraged at their obstinacy, ordered them to be banished to the continent.

It having occurred to Germanus that the best way to counteract the revival and spreading of this heresy, would be to establish schools for the purpose of religious education in several parts of the country, gave directions to his disciples in Britain, the principal of whom were Dubrikius and Iltutus. These ecclesiastics followed the advice of the prelate, and erected schools in different parts of South Britain, which they themselves superintended. Two of these seminaries were situated on the river Wye, one at Heutland, and the other at Mochus. Another school was set up in the county of Glamorgan, under the immediate care of Iltutus, at a place which received from him the name of Llan-Iltud. These schools produced many learned men, who afterwards attained distinguished stations in the churches of Gaul and Britain (u).

The history of the British church, however, at this period is very imperfect; for all the information we have concerning it consist of detached fragments, gleaned from a mass of various intelligence.

We are informed by Bede, that those respectable prelates, who governed this church after the departure of Germanus, by their indefatigable exertions preserved it from the infection of heresy. That bishop, before his return to Auxérra, had established the Gallic liturgy in the churches of Britain; and, as the form of it was different from the ritual of the Romish church, the introduction of it seemed to argue an independence on the see of Rome: but in what particular it differed from that of Rome we are not able to ascertain, except that it ordained a different time for the celebration of the festival of Easter.

The clergy of Britain held synods at various times for adjusting the more important affairs of the church. In one of these councils, held in 512, Dubricius was translated from the bishopric of Llandaff, which he had long filled with great reputation, to the archiepiscopal see of Caerleon; and Theliaus was promoted to the see vacated by his translation. Another council was afterwards holden (in 519) for deliberating on the most efficacious means of rooting out the remains of Pelagianism; but we are not acquainted with the decrees of this synod for that laudable purpose. The famous St. David, whom the Welsh hold in such reverential estimation, acted as president of this assembly (v).

Besides the above councils several others of a less general nature were occasionally holden: and it may not be improper briefly to mention the transactions of several of these, as they exhibit strong features of the characters both of the British princes and the clergy of those times. Oudoceus, who succeeded Theliaus in the see of Llandaff, convoked three synods of the clergy of that diocese. In the first of these meetings in 560, cognizance was taken of the delinquency of Mauricus, a petty prince of Glamorganshire, who had treacherously murdered Cynetu, another British prince. Regardless of the rank and power of the offender, the council passed a sentence of excommunication against him, and subjected his principality to an interdict. These censures remained in force for two years, and were then removed by Oudoceus on the three following conditions; viz. that the murderer should occasionally fast, employ himself in frequent prayer, and become a liberal distributor of alms. Mauricus, to testify his repentance, immediately bestowed four manors on the church of Llandaff, by which he effectually purchased the future favour of the bishop and his whole diocese (w).

In another ecclesiastical assembly holden by Oudoceus, the case of Morcant, a prince who had assassinated his uncle, came under consideration. An oath it appears had been taken by each of these princes, purporting, that if either of them should destroy or treacherously use the other, the delinquent should, instead of commuting the punishment of his crime for gold or silver, abdicate his principality, and pass the remainder of his days in pilgrimage. When Morcant had committed the atrocious deed above mentioned, he repented of his oath, and applied to the church of Llandaff for a commutation of the penalties of abdication and pilgrimage. Oudoceus and his clergy consented to absolve him from his oath on the same conditions that were annexed to the removal of the interdict in the case of Mauricus. Morcant also followed the example of that prince, by gratifying the church with a considerable donation, which the pious ecclesiastics regarded as an ample atonement for the most heinous crimes, and as a sufficient proof of the penitence of any criminal (x).

The third synod in which Oudoceus presided excommunicated Guidnorth, a British prince, who had stained his hands with fraternal blood. The criminal remained about three years under this sentence, which in those days was extremely severe, as the excommunicated person was deemed an outcast, and subjected to the contempt of his subjects, who avoided him as an impious reprobate. After suffering so long under the miseries of this interdict, he requested Oudoceus to grant him absolution for his crime, of which he professed a sincere contrition and unfeigned repentance. The bishop, however, was unwilling to receive the prince into favour, and therefore sent him on a pilgrimage to the archbishop of Dol in Bretagne. Guidnorth, by returning from this expiatory excursion before the time allotted by the prelate, excited his displeasure so much, that he actually refused to remove the excommunication. On the death of Oudoceus, which happened soon after, Bertheguin, his successor in the bishopric, restored Guidnorth to all the rights of society, in consideration of three manors which that prince conferred on the church of Llandaff.

The earliest British historian Gildas has given us a very unfavourable representation of the characters of his clerical countrymen at this period. He describes them as destitute of learning, virtue, and piety, haughty and insolent to the poor, servile and obsequious to the rich; regardless of the spiritual interest of their flock, and intent only on their own preferment; wallowing in gluttony, ebriety, and incontinence; and deviating from every path of morality. The censures of this author must, however, be received with caution, since he appears to have been addicted to a complaint, and to have written under the influence of a gloomy disposition, inflamed to such a degree of uneasiness and resentment at the success and barbarity of the Saxons, that he viewed every object, as it were, with a prejudiced eye. Candor will induce us to except from the reprehension of Gildas a few of the ecclesiastics of that age, who, at a time when the majority of their clerical brethren were less cultivated by learning, or dignified by virtue, than the nature of their employment required, and when a general relaxation of morals pervaded the laity, maintained the respectability of their station, and merited the fame of learned, upright, and religious persons.

So inconsiderable is our knowledge of the events of that period which elapsed between the departure of the Romans and the retreat of the Britons into Wales, particularly in the affairs of the church, that we are under the necessity of here concluding the ecclesiastical history of this people: but, as the learning of that time was confined to the clergy, some account of those South-Britons who made the greatest figure in literature and science, is far from being incompatible with the subject of this chapter.

Merlin, the celebrated fatidical bard, is supposed to have flourished about the middle of the fifth century. He was a native of South-Wales, and distinguished himself by his skill in mathematics and natural philosophy, which gave occasion to the undiscerning vulgar to consider him as a magician and a prophet (y).

Dubricius and Iltutus have been already mentioned. These two ecclesiastics were men of great learning and ability, and were particularly eminent in the didactic line. Dubricius, in the decline of life, in 516, retired into a monastery in the isle of Bardsey, where he died at a very advanced age in 522.

Samson, archbishop of Dol in Bretagne, was an elève either of Dubricius or Iltutus, and was a prelate of great piety and erudition. Some historians speak of two successive archbishops of Dol, of the name of Samson: but there seems not to be sufficient authority for such an assertion.

St. David, the tutelar saint of Wales, was archbishop of Caerleon, whence he removed the archiepiscopal see to Menevia in Pembrokeshire, which was afterwards denominated St. David's from him. He adorned the sixth century by his learning and eloquence, as well as by the purity of his life. He is said to have been related to king Arthur.

Gildas, whose labours have been occasionally referred to in the prosecution of this work, studied under Iltutus, and was first a member of the monastery of Glastonbury, and afterwards of that of Bangor in Flintshire. Though he was styled Gildas the Wise by his admiring cotemporaries, an enlightened reader of his history of Britain would not be inclined to form a very favourable opinion of the sense or learning of the writer. His life has been written by Caradon of Llanscarvon. He died about the year 570.

St. Petroe, who was a native of Cornwall, studied theology in Ireland; and, after his return to Britain, taught that science with great success at a monastery on the banks of the Severn.

St. Asaph, who derived his birth from North-Wales, was the disciple of Kentigern, a Pictism ecclesiastic, who fixed his residence in Flintshire about the middle of the sixth century, and erected a cathedral as well as monastery at Llan. Elwys Asaph, who became his successor not only in the government of the monastery, but also in the bishopric of Llan-Elwy, gave his own name to this place, and died in high fame for his knowledge and virtue, towards the close of the century in question (z).

In this outline of ecclesiastical affairs, and this concise list of the literary ornaments of the dark period of which we are treating, the reader must have perceived that little mention has been made of the government of the church in that part of South Britain called England, or of those persons who made the most shining figure in that country. This omission is the consequence of the total want of records respecting the transactions of the church in these parts, the calamities of a very ruinous war having either occasioned the destruction of the literary monuments of the times, or prevented the clergy (the only persons who then attempted to transmit events to posterity) from having any leisure for the tranquil pursuits of learning. By one or the other of these causes we are deprived of any knowledge of the affairs of the church at this period, in any part of South-Britain, except Wales and its borders, where the natives, and those Britons who fled thither from other districts for protection, were exempt from the desolating fury of the arms of the Saxon chieftains.

CHAP. IX.

The Affairs of the Church from the Æra of the Anglo-Saxon Conversion to the Subjugation of the Heptarchy by Egbert.

THE Saxon tribes who invaded and settled in the isle of Britain continued to exercise that system of idolatrous worship which had been sanctioned by the practice of their ancestors from the arrival of Hengist till the close of the sixth century. Their aversion to the name of Christians seems to have encreased the animosity of these Pagans against the islanders, who, on their part, could not but feel an increase of resentment and indignation against those fierce idolaters, whose perfidy, in the first instance of their hostility, was greatly aggravated by their inhuman and barbarous treatment of the Christian clergy, and their destruction of the sacred seats of religious adoration.

It must, however, be admitted, that when these invaders had established themselves in the peaceable possession of their newly acquired territories, they began to relax in their inveteracy against the professors of Christianity, and to entertain more favourable ideas of a doctrine which had already made considerable progress among the northern conquerors of the continental parts of Europe, to whom they were attached by the ties of one common origin. If the war between the Britons and the Saxons had been prosecuted with less fury, and those natives who submitted to the latter had been considered in a more respectable light than that of slaves, it is probable that a conversion of the conquerors might have been gradually affected even by the vanquished party. But as the mutual animosity of these two nations continued for such a length of time, the Saxons were far from being disposed to receive a new faith from the Britons; and, on the other hand, the islanders were unwilling to impart the valuable doctrine of redemption to a people who had acted as their most inveterate foes.

The introduction of Christianity among the Anglo-Saxons is said to have been owing to the following circumstance: An Italian clergyman, named Gregory, who was afterwards elevated to the papal see, observed one day, about 577, in the market place of Rome some handsome youths exposed for sale. Being struck with their appearance, he enquired what nation they belonged to. In answer to his interrogations, he was informed that they were Angles from the kingdom of Deïra, that the name of their sovereign was Alla; and that they were immersed in the darkness of idolatry (a). He immediately conceived a desire of converting this unenlightened people, and made application to pope Benedict, whose permission he obtained for undertaking a voyage to England, with a view to instruct the Anglo-Saxons in the doctrines of Christianity. He was on the point of embarking on his expedition, when the citizens of Rome remonstrated with his holiness, begging him to put a stop to Gregory's intention. Benedict complied with their request, and the zealous priest was obliged to resume his functions at Rome. At length Gregory was raised to the pontificate in the year 590; and as his eagerness for the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons continued unabated, he selected forty monks, and ordered them to repair to this island in 596, under the direction of Augustine, who was also of the monastic order. These

(a) Vid. Bed. lib. ii. cap. i.—Gregory's taste for punning may be estimated by the remarks which he is said to have made on this occasion. When he heard that they were Angles, he replied, that the name was very apposite, as they had the appearance of angels. The name of Deïra suggested to him another allusion, importing that they and their countrymen should be saved de ira, or from the wrath of God; and on learning the appellation of their king (Alla), he exclaimed "Allelujah! They must be taught to sing the praise of God."

ecclesiastics did not, however, enter on their journey with good will; or perhaps their fears of danger overcame their Christian ardour. A serious deliberation on the employment assigned them by the pope, induced them to repent of having undertaken such an expedition; and they unanimously agreed to send a petition to their spiritual father, representing the probable difficulties and perils of the mission, and entreating him to recall them from the enterprize. Augustine, who returned to Rome to represent the affair to the pope, was encouraged by Gregory to disregard the dangers of the mission, and was entrusted with the conveyance of a letter to his monkish associates, in which his holiness exhorted them to use their efforts for meriting a future salvation by persisting in so glorious a task. Gregory, at the same time, furnished letters of recommendation to Theodebert and Theodoric, kings of the Franks, to Brunchaud their grandmother, who officiated as regent during their minority, and to Etherius, archbishop of Arles.

Thus animated the missionaries resumed their journey; and when they arrived at the court of the Franks, Brunchaud received them in a friendly manner, and supplied them with interpreters. Having provided themselves with proper necessaries, Augustine and his companions embarked at one of the ports of Gaul, and landed in the isle of Thanet in 597.

At the time of the arrival of these missionaries Ethelbert was king of Kent. That prince had, several years before, married Bertha, a French princess, to whom, by agreement, he allowed the free exercise of the Christian religion. The church of St. Martin, in the suburbs of Canterbury, had been appropriated by Ethelbert to the religious use of his queen, whose influence over her consort had diminished his attachment to paganism, while the purity of Luidhard's (b) life operated as a silent recommendation of the Christian faith to the king and his subjects. This state of affairs was therefore favourable to the designs of Gregory; for many of the Kentish Saxons, and particularly their sovereign, were prepared for renouncing the absurdities of the pagan worship.

Immediately after his debarkation, Augustine sent one of his interpreters to the king of Kent, intimating that he had come from Rome to instruct him and his people on a subject which concerned their most essential interests, and their welfare in a future state. Hereupon Ethelbert ordered the strangers to be supplied with necessaries, and promised them a speedy audience. A few days afterwards he went into the isle of Thanet, and admitted the monks to a conference in the open air. Augustine having harangued the king (by the medium of an interpreter) on the merits of Christianity, Ethelbert replied, that as an established religion ought not to be slightly renounced, in favour of an unknown system, he could not think of making any change in his creed, till he should have amply considered what he had then heard; but said, that the missionaries should be treated with hospitality, and that they should have full permission to disseminate their doctrines among his subjects. With this declaration he put an end to the conference, and assigned to Augustine and his associates a residence in his metropolis. After this the monks entered Canterbury with all the formalities of a religious procession: they commenced their evangelical labours with strong hopes of success, founded on the friendly reception afforded them by the king. Their expectations were abundantly answered; for the self-denying strictness of their lives, the fervency of their prayers, and the apparent sincerity of their exhortations, co-operating with the opinion which the people entertained of the good will of their sovereign towards the religion of his queen, induced considerable numbers to offer themselves for baptism. At length Ethelbert himself declared his intention of adopting the doctrines of Christianity; a circumstance which foreboded, in the mind of Augustine, a general conversion of the Kentish-Saxons. The king was baptized in 598, within a year after the landing of the missionaries; and his example produced a copious supply of new Christians.

Before his departure from Rome, Augustine received a promise from the pope, that if he were successful in converting the Britons, he should be raised to a high dignity in the church. As he had been prosperous in the work, he returned to Gaul, and proceeded without delay to Arles, where he procured his consecration as archbishop and primate of the English nation, in 601. Shortly afterwards Augustine dispatched Laurence and Peter, two of his fellow missionaries, to Rome, that they might communicate to the pope the pleasing intelligence of the fruit he had lately gathered in the vineyard of Christ, and receive answers to a variety of questions respecting the future constitution of the infant church he had been planting.

Gregory was highly gratified when he was informed of the amazing progress which Christianity had made among the Anglo-Saxons, and gladly replied to the interrogatories of Augustine. He sent a letter to Ethelbert and his queen, accompanied with valuable presents; nominated several new missionaries to assist the apostle of the English; gave them recommendatory epistles to some of the French princes and prelates; and rewarded the zeal of Augustine with the metropolitan distinction of the pall, with which he sent a number of sacramental and other ecclesiastical utensils, besides vestments, reliques, and ritual and devotional books. Exclusive of his answers to the questions of Augustine, he gave various injunctions to the new prelate for the direction of his future proceedings. Among other points, he advised him to accommodate the Christian ceremonies to the Pagan rites, wherever it could be done without encroaching on the essentials of Christianity; for such concessions, he apprehended, would tend to facilitate the reception of the latter faith, by making the transition from Paganism appear the less violent or offensive to the feelings of those who had acquired, by long practice, a reverence for the Gentile system. He exhorted him not to demolish, but to consecrate for Christian use, the Heathen temples; and, after removing the idols, to erect new altars, and decorate them with reliques. As he knew that the Anglo-Saxons were accustomed to sacrifice oxen and other animals, and conclude the solemnity with feasting and merriment, he expressed a willingness to allow them some indulgence in these habits; and authorized the English metropolitan to permit the converts, on particular Christian anniversaries, to kill their cattle in the vicinity of the church, recreate their bodies with plentiful but not immoderate feastings, and relax their minds with innocent mirth. With these exhortations, Gregory transmitted to Augustine a plan for the establishment of the English church, regulating the number of prelates, and fixing two metropolitan sees, one at London, the other at York; though, till the death of Augustine, Canterbury was, at his request, to enjoy the honour of the primacy; and in the sequel the archbishops of London and York were to be respectively deemed primates according to priority of consecration.

When Lawrence and Peter, loaded with dispatches and clerical apparatus returned to Augustine they found him actively employed in the formation of that church over which he had been appointed to preside. Melitus, Paulinus, Ruganus, and Justus, who, with several other ecclesiastics, came over to extend the success of the mission, were well received by the new archbishop of Canterbury, who soon pointed out proper objects for their spiritual attention.

In the time of the Romans a church had been built and devoted to the purposes of Christianity at Canterbury; and, in 602, Augustine fixed upon this place for his cathedral. Having put it in a state of compleat repair, and supplied it with every requisite, he gave it the name of Christ Church, and built a neighbouring mansion for himself and his successors. He also, with the assistance of Ethelbert, founded a church and monastery to the eastward of Canterbury, of which the above-mentioned Peter was the first abbot. Ethelbert became so zealously attached to Augustine and his religion, that he left his capital to the care of the archbishop and the missionaries, and retired to a palace of his own building at Reculver (c).

Augustine having been directed by pope Gregory, to embrace, under his metropolitan jurisdiction, the bishops and other clergy of the British church, he prevailed upon them to meet him in council. When they were met, he harangued them, with an air of superiority, on the expediency of their conforming to the custom of the Romish church, in the time of celebrating Easter, and in the mode of administering the baptismal rite: but as they were not convinced by his arguments, he had recourse to the efficacy of a miracle, which he pretended to perform on a Saxon who appeared to be blind, and whom he restored to sight after the British prelates had made fruitless attempts for that purpose. Though this pious farce seemed to have some effect on a few of the British clergy, yet it did not procure their assent to Augustine's propositions. They did not, however, give a determinate answer to the archbishop; but postponed their decision till a second meeting with the Romish ecclesiastics. This council, which was held in 603, was more numerous on the part of the Britons than the former (d). Augustine renewed his exhortations in a manner that bordered on arrogance and haughtiness. He not only required their adoption of the Romish ordinances respecting Easter and baptism, but that they should acknowledge his metropolitan authority, and the pope's supremacy, and co-operate with him in the conversion of the Saxons: if they would comply, he said, in these particulars, he would not object to their variance in other points. Dinoth, abbot of Bangor, replied, in the name of the British clergy, that they owed no other obedience to the pope than what was due from one Christian to another in the spirit of brotherly love and philanthrophy; and that with respect to the discipline and ritual of their church they were subject to the directions of the bishop of Caerleon. Augustine, finding his counsels thus rejected, was filled with rage and resentment, and exclaimed in a menacing tone, "Since you refuse to accept terms of peace and unity from your brethren, you shall have war from your enemies; and since you will not concur with us in preaching the word of life to your Saxon neighbours, you shall receive your death from their hands." Ethelfrid's massacre of a great number of the British ecclesiastics before the battle of Chester, as related in the history of the kingdom of Northumberland (e), has been considered by some of our historians as the consequence of Augustine's virulent enmity; for he has been accused of having, by the medium of Ethelbert, instigated Ethelfrid to make war upon the Britons, murder their clergy, and destroy their principal seminary of religious education, the monastery of Bangor.

Augustine's mortification at his ill success in endeavouring to establish the pope's authority over the British church did not relax his eagerness for the settlement of that of the Anglo-Saxons. Having a great esteem for Lawrence, one of his coadjutors, he consecrated him as his successor in the see of Canterbury, and, with the consent of Ethelbert, founded an episcopal see at Rochester, of which he appointed Justus the first bishop in 604. At the same time he commissioned Mellitus to repair, in the quality of bishop, into the East Saxon kingdom, where the influence of Ethelbert was so powerful, that there was little doubt of reaping in that quarter a plenteous harvest of conversion. Soon after these consecrations he paid the debt of nature, in 605; and Lawrence immediately assumed the primacy, notwithstanding the direction of pope Gregory, that the dignity of primate should be detached from the see of Canterbury on the death of Augustine.

While Lawrence was employed in the completion of the church of Kent, Mellitus was equally active in the kingdom of Essex, where he baptized Sebert and a great number of his subjects. A church being erected by Ethelbert in London, on the spot where the present cathedral of St. Paul is situated, Mellitus became bishop of this see in 610. After the affairs of the church had continued in a prosperous train in these two kingdoms, the deaths of their respective sovereigns, Ethelbert and Sebert, occasioned a sudden change, very adverse to the interests of Christianity; for not only Eadbald, the successor of Ethelbert in Kent, but also the three sons of Sebert, who jointly reigned over the East Saxons, superseded the religion of Christ by the restoration of Paganism about 616.

The three kings of Essex, who had never received baptism, were desirous of finding some pretext for expelling Mellitus from their dominions. Entering his cathedral, they ordered him to give them some of the sacramental bread; and when he signified a refusal, they insisted upon his departure from their kingdom. He immediately retired into Kent, whence, after consulting with Lawrence and Justus, on the unfortunate situation of their infant church, he embarked with the latter in 617 for France. Lawrence, who would otherwise have followed them, found means to reclaim Eadbald, who returned with the bulk of his people to the profession of Christianity. After this circumstance the two fugitive prelates were recalled, and Justus was restored by this prince to his bishopric; but his influence was insufficient to procure the re-establishment of Mellitus in the see of London, the East Saxons still adhering to their renunciation of the Christian faith.

Archbishop Lawrence (f) did not survive Ethelbert above three years; and Mellitus, who was celebrated for his miracles by the monastic historians, succeeded him in 619. When the see of Canterbury had been filled by Mellitus about five years, he was succeeded by Justus in 624. To this person pope Boniface V. sent the pall, as an acknowledgement of his metropolitan dignity.

During the ecclesiastical government of this prelate the knowledge of the Gospel was propagated in the kingdom of Northumberland; an event which was principally occasioned by the marriage of its sovereign with a Christian princess. Ethelburga, who gave her hand to the great Edwin in 625, endeavoured, by all the arts of persuasion, to convert that monarch from his Pagan principles. Her exhortations, though seconded by the spiritual advice of Paulinus, who had been promoted to the episcopal dignity by archbishop Justus before he attended Ethelburga into Northumberland, were for some time ineffectual; but at length Edwin was induced, by deliberate reflection, to acknowledge, in 627, the cogency of the prelate's arguments. This conversion was followed by that of the majority of his subjects, twelve thousand of whom (if we can credit the account of Nennius in his History of the Britons) were baptized in one day by Paulinus in the river Swale in Yorkshire.

Encouraged by his success in the Northumbrian dominions, Paulinus passed to the southward of the Humber, and converted many of the inhabitants of Lindsey, particularly Blecca, the governor of Lincoln, in 628. A part of this county seems to have belonged at that time to the East-Angles, whose king Eorpwald was a vassel to Edwin, and was baptized at his request in 632; but Christianity, though allowed in this kingdom, was not universal while Eorpwald managed the reins of government.

Honorius I. who then sat in the papal chair, executed the intentions of his predecessor Gregory, and sent a pall to Paulinus, who had become bishop of York. This prelate being thus invested with the dignity of a metropolitan, consecrated a priest named Honorius (who had been a disciple of Gregory) archbishop of Canterbury, on the death of Justus, in 633.

Osric and Eanfrid, who divided the dominions of Edwin, having restored Paganism in their respective kingdoms, the Northumbrian church, which suffered greatly during the devastations committed by the conquerors of Edwin, was almost annihilated. Thereupon Paulinus fled with Ethelburga into Kent, where Eadbald made him compensation for his loss of the prelacy of York, by conferring on him the vacant see of Rochester, in 634. The affairs of the Northumbrian church, however, were soon retrieved by the accession of Oswald, in 635, who added to his military and political talents a sincere regard for the interests of Christianity. Having been educated in Scotland, he invited some of the clergy of that nation to reconvert his apostate subjects, and to endeavour the conversion of those who had never renounced the absurdities of Paganism. Having been successful, Aidan (who came from Scotland with other monks) requested Oswald to remove the episcopal see from York to Lindisfarne, or Holy Land; which he did, and made Aidan the first bishop of that see.

Oswald was also instrumental, by his influence and example, in the conversion of the West Saxons, to whose court he repaired with a view to espouse the daughter of Cinigisil, one of their joint kings. The West-Saxon king, aware of the advantages of a connection with so powerful a prince, (d) Seven British bishops are said to have been present at this synod; an assertion which, notwithstanding the reduced and circumscribed state of the church of the South Britons at this period, may be deemed credible, if we suppose either that some of these were itinerant prelates, destitute of a particular diocese, or that their dioceses were very small. It is indeed well known that the fury of Saxon hostilities had greatly diminished the number, narrowed the limits, and obscured the lustre, of the church of South Britain at this period.

(f) This prelate was as much inclined as his predecessor in the see of Canterbury to bring the Britons to a conformity with the church of Rome. He wrote pastoral letters to the Welsh clergy, as well as to those of Scotland; warmly soliciting them, but without success, to adopt the Romish usages, particularly in the grand point respecting the time of solemnizing Easter. The difference was merely this: on whatever day the full of the moon took place at the vernal equinox, the Romanists celebrated the Sunday following as Easter day; whereas the British Christians kept it on the very day when the moon was at the full, if it proved to be of a Sunday. This trivial circumstance produced no small degree of animosity between the Welsh and Scots on the one hand, and Romanists and Saxons on the other. The partizans of Rome called this practice of their adversaries the quarto-deciman schism, because they celebrated the Paschal festival on the fourteenth day of the moon, when it was Sunday.

a prince, was eager to effect the marriage of his daughter to Oswald; and, as he knew that his royal guest was a zealous Christian, he was desirous of conciliating the attachment of that monarch by receiving baptism himself, and encouraging the propagation of the gospel in his dominions. Oswald, pleased at the religious compliance of his future father-in-law, appeared as his sponser at the font: and then hastened into Northumberland with his West-Saxon bride, to attend to the peculiar concerns of his own kingdom, which he governed with high reputation. Cuichelm following the example of his colleague Cinigisil, a general conversion was accomplished in the kingdom of Wessex, in 636, by the ministry of Berinus, (an Italian, who had been honoured with the episcopal distinction by Honorius,) who was permitted to establish his see at Dorchester.

About the same time, the East-Angles, among whom there had been a relapse after the assassination of Earpwald, felt the beneficial influence of a Christian sovereign, in the person of Sigebert, who, with the assistance of Felix, a Burgundian priest, and Fursæus, a Scot, reclaimed the apostates, and converted the unenlightened. A bishop's see was fixed at Donmor (now Dunwich) in Suffolk, and the zealous Felix was appointed to occupy it.

Towards the middle of the seventh century, a religious change was effected in the Mercian kingdom. Peada, the son of Penda, desirous of a matrimonial connection with the daughter of Oswy king of Bernicia, whom he could not procure without acceding to the express stipulation of his embracing the Christian doctrines, submitted to this proviso, with little hesitation, and received baptism at the court of Oswy, with all his retinue. He was accompanied in his return to Mercia by four Christian priests, who were suffered by his pagan father to communicate their tenets to his subjects. Their endeavours were at first confined to the county of Leicester, which had been erected into a principality in favour of Penda; but in process of time, their labours were beneficially extended over the whole Mercian kingdom. Diuma, the principal of these four ecclesiastics, was consecrated bishop of the Mercians by Finan, who had succeeded Aidan in the see of Landisfarne, in 656. After Oswy had subdued the Mercian territories, he erected a cathedral for Diuma at Litchfield.

This prince, by converting Sigebert the East-Saxon, known by the appellation of Sigebert the Good, promoted the restoration of Christianity among the subjects of the new converts, who was attended to London, which was his metropolis, by Cedda, a Northumbrian clergyman. This priest, being nominated to the bishopric of London, which had remained vacant since the expulsion of Mellitus, re-established the affairs of the church in the kingdom of the East-Saxons, and erected several structures for religious worship. He distinguished himself by his abstinence and the austerity of his life; but this did not compensate for the concern he had in the murder of Sigebert his sovereign.

The kingdom of Sussex did not receive the benefit of conversion till after the six other states of the Heptarchy had been enlightened with Christian knowledge. Adelwalch, who had reigned over this petty state, had been converted by Wulfer, who had carried him prisoner into Mercia. After his return to his kingdom, he endeavoured to prevail on his people to renounce the errors of paganism; but, though his persuasions were aided by those of Dieol, a Scottish monk, and a few other ecclesiastics, who formed a fraternity at Bosenham, no success resulted from these attempts, till Wilfred, the deposed bishop of York, took refuge among the South-Saxons, in 680. Adelwalch, received the exiled prelate with great marks of favour, and requested him to preach the Christian doctrine among his subjects. Wilfred readily consented, and his labours in the vineyard were rendered particularly successful by his dexterity in teaching the common people the art of fishing in the sea with nets, at a time when a dreadful famine raged among them. After he had contributed, by his instructions in this respect, to the supply of their corporeal necessities, they listened with more attention to his spiritual advice, and were baptized in great numbers by him and his clerical companions. The king rewarded the zeal of Wilfred and his associates, by a donation of the peninsula of Selsey, at the south-western extremity of Sussex. Here he established an episcopal see in his own favour, and also founded a monastery. While he filled this see, he received from Ceadwalla the West-Saxon, who had subdued the isle of Wight, the grant of a fourth part of that island, the inhabitants of which he converted by the medium of his nephew Berwinin, in 686.

During these transactions, Kent, the first Christian kingdom of the Heptarchy, had been governed in spiritual affairs by Honorius and Deuodedit or Deodatus, on whose death the see of Canterbury continued vacant for four years, in the reign of Egbert, the son of Ereombert. Egbert, in a conference with Oswy the Northumbrian, who was then at the head of the Saxon confederacy, fixed upon Wighart, a Kentish priest, for the vacant prelacy; and it was resolved by the two princes, that this ecclesiastic should be sent to Rome, to be consecrated archbishop according to the Romish forms; for Oswy, some time before (in a public assembly at Whitby in Yorkshire, in 664, where, among other points, the grand dispute respecting the time of the celebration of Easter had been agitated by Northumbrian and Scottish priests on the one hand, and the Romanists and their disciples on the other) had been prevailed upon to renounce the Scottish ritual, and adopt the forms and usages of the church of Rome. Hence arose his eagerness for Wighart's being dispatched to Rome for consecration. This priest, soon after his arrival at the Romish capital, caught the infection of a pestilence which then diffused its ravages in that city, and fell a victim to the contagion. Pope Vitalian immediately assumed the right of supplying the vacancy in the English church; and having consecrated Theodore, a native of Asia Minor, in 668, sent him to England as archbishop of Canterbury. But, as it was not improbable that the new prelate might introduce into this country some of the forms of the Greek church, Adrian, an abbot by whom the archbishopric had been refused, was desired by his holiness to accompany Theodore, and watch his proceedings.

Theodore commenced his metropolitan function by visiting all the churches of the Heptarchy; and wherever he observed the practice of any rites different from those of Rome, he ordered them to be superseded by the Romish usages. To promote an uniformity of worship among the English churches, he convoked at Hereford, in 673, a synod of the bishops and principal clergy, before whom he produced ten canons, sanctioned by the observance of the Romish church. To these the whole assembly subscribed, and bound themselves to the enforcement of them in their respective dioceses and parishes. The first of these canons prescribed the celebration of Easter on the Sunday after the fourteenth day of the moon in the first month, agreeable to the established practice of the Romanists, and contrary to the mode which the Welch and Scots had long followed (g).

After an interval of seven years, Theodore held another synod, at the request of the pope, who wished to know the opinion of the Anglo-Saxon church on the prevailing heresy of the Monothelites, who, according to the import of the name, affirmed that Christ had only one will, notwithstanding the difference between the divine and human nature; for that, as those two natures were united in our Saviour so as to form one person, he had not a different will for each. This heretical doctrine was unanimously condemned by the English synod now assembled; and the faith and tenets which had been authorised by the five first general councils, were amply confirmed (h).

Some years before these councils, Theodore had exercised his metropolitan power in the deposition of Chad or Cedda bishop of York, who had been informally consecrated; though the primate afterwards made some amends for this severity, by promoting Chad to the see of Litchfield. Winfrid, the successor of Chad in the bishopric of Litchfield, was also punished by Theodore with deprivation for his freedom in expostulating with the haughty metropolitan on his assumption of too great an authority over the other prelates of the English church.

Theodore gave several proofs of his inclination for increasing the number of English bishops. Bisi, bishop of the East-Angles, being oppressed by the infirmities of age, expressed his wish to abdicate his episcopal function; in consequence of which the primate nominated two bishops for the government of the East-Anglian church, in the (g) The other canons adopted by this synod, contained regulations for the behaviour of bishops as well as inferior clergy, ordinances respecting matrimony and divorce, and a resolution that an ecclesiastical council be assembled once a year, on the calends of August, at a place called Cloveshoo, supposed by some to be Cliff (near Rochester) in Kent, and by others Abingdon in Berkshire. *Vid. room of the debilitated Bisi; one at Dunwich, where the see had hitherto been, and the other at Elmham in Norfolk. Not long after, about 687, he divided the Northumbrian diocese into three parts, with the concurrence of king Egfrid, as well as of a synod which he convoked for the discussion of that point; and consecrated Rosa and Eta to act as bishops in that northern kingdom, in conjunction with Wilfrid, who had hitherto, as bishop of York, retained under his immediate government the whole extent both of Bernicia and Deira. Wilfrid, enraged at this diminution of his jurisdiction and emoluments, hastened to the palace of Egfrid, and accused him with the archbishop of having conducted themselves like two robbers, in depriving him of so great a part of the estates, which had been appropriated by preceding kings to the Northumbrian church. The king, without suffering himself to be betrayed into an unmanly warmth at this specimen of priestly arrogance, replied, that he had acted, as he thought, for the benefit of his kingdom, and was resolved to adhere to the alterations he had made, and which he, as a sovereign, was authorised to make in the ecclesiastical government of his own dominions, in concert with the metropolitan of the English church. Wilfrid then declared, that he would appeal to the pope from the injustice of Egfrid and Theodore; an idea which was considered as so absurd and extraordinary by the king and his courtiers, that they could not refrain from expressing their sentiments of such an appeal by loud fits of laughter; which the bishop answered by threatening the whole court with the vengeance of the supreme pontiff, who would make them pay dearly for their present merriment. This turbulent and resentful prelate actually undertook a journey to Rome, to procure redress of his holiness for the contraction of his spiritual authority and episcopal revenues. He was attended in his expedition by a great number of monks, who admired his courage and abilities. His departure was regarded as an abdication of his bishopric; and Bosa and Eta, who would otherwise have shared the Northumbrian diocese with him, now ruled it with several other bishops. Eta's see was fixed at Lindisfarne, and that of Bosa at York: a third prelate was established at Hexham in the county of Northumberland, and a fourth at Abercorn, near the frith of Forth, then belonging to Bernicia. Another bishop is said to have been appointed for the district of Lindsey in Lincolnshire, which Egfrid had won from the Mercians; but Eadfred, who was raised to this bishopric, lost it in the following year, Lindsey being then recovered by Ethelred king of Mercia.

Wilfred, after passing some time in Friselarid, where he converted many of the people to the Christian faith, arrived at Rome, and immediately presented a petition to pope Agatha, who having received from archbishop Theodore a statement of the dispute between him and Wilfred, called a council at Rome in 680 to consider of this business. The result of the meeting was, that Wilfred should be reinstated in the see of York: that the bishops who had lately been chosen for the Northumbrian kingdom should be ejected; and that Wilfred should receive such episcopal coadjutors as should, by an English synod, be deemed worthy of that trust. Possessed of this decree, the haughty exile returned to England, and took the first opportunity of presenting it to Egfrid. This prince, after having formally proposed it to the consideration of a meeting of clergy and laity, expressed a total disregard of an order which, he said, had been procured by the arts of corruption; and, not content with this rejection of the papal decree, commanded that the bearer of it should be imprisoned. When Wilfred had remained in confinement for about a twelvemonth, he was released at the mediation of Ebba, the king's aunt, on condition of his submitting to a sentence of banishment from the kingdom of Northumberland. The remainder of this prelate's active life may be summed up in a few words. During his exile, he had the chief merit of converting the South-Saxons, as we have already seen; acted for some years as bishop of Selsey in Sussex, was in high favour with the West-Saxon king Ceadual, and, at the request of Ethelred the Mercian, and archbishop Theodore, was permitted by Alfred, the successor of Egfrid, to return into the Northumbrian territories, where he was gratified with the bishopric of York in 687, to which the government of the abbey of Rippon was added; but his ambition of power and wealth rendered him so clamorous, that Alfred, though he had been a pupil to Wilfrid, at last thought proper to expel him from his kingdom, whence he repaired to the court of Ethelfred, who preferred him to the see of Leicester, one of the four bishoprics into which the Mercian diocese had been lately divided. His refractory spirit still continued to interrupt his tranquillity, as well as that of the king his protector; and the prince who had banished him; for he not only disgusted Ethelred by the effusions of his arrogance and discontent, but increased the resentment of Alfred by his incessant endeavours for recovery of his rank and revenues in the Northumbrian kingdom. Brithwald, who had by this time succeeded Theodore (i) in the primacy, was prompted by Alfred to convoke a synod in 701, to which he summoned Wilfrid to answer for his conduct. Being accused of crimes that merited a sentence of deposition and degradation, he vindicated himself with great eloquence and fortitude, boasted of the success of his pious efforts for the good of religion and the church, asserted the incompetence of the synod to proceed to his condemnation, and expressed his resolution of submitting his cause to the only judicature to which (he said) he was legally amenable, that of the pope and his consistorial clergy. Being deposed and excommunicated by this council, he again repaired to Rome, where he procured from pope John VI. a decree for his complete restoration, which, however, was not regarded for some time, till at length, during the minority of Alfred's son Osred, Brithwald held a council in 705 on the banks of the Nidd in Yorkshire, the result of which was, the promotion of Widfred to the see of Hexham, and his restoration to the abbacy of Rippon. Some years afterwards, in 709, he ended in peace a busy and tumultuous life, in the course of which he had displayed a considerable portion of learning, eloquence, and talent; great haughtiness, arrogance, and contumacity; a strong attachment to pomp and splendour of appearance; and, to gratify his private resentment, had endeavoured to sap the foundations of the independence of the English church, by appealing to the Romish pontiff against the determinations of an English synod, and the authority of his natural sovereign.

The presidency of Brithwald over the English church was extended to the long duration of near forty years. He was the first archbishop of Canterbury of Saxon birth; for Wighart, who was also an Anglo-Saxon, though named to that dignity, died before his consecration. After the death of Wilfred, great tranquillity prevailed in the church, during the remainder of Brithwald's government, and for many succeeding years.

Tatwin, a Mercian monk, followed Brithwald in the see of Canterbury, in 730; and, not long after, Egbert, an ecclesiastic of great merit, was promoted to the bishopric of York about the year 732 by his cousin Ceolwulk, king of Northumberland. This prelate found means to procure the restoration of that metropolitan dignity which the bishops of this see had ceased to enjoy since the retreat of Paulinus into Kent, and which Gregory the Great had intended they should regularly possess. Having received a pall from Rome, he exercised the metropolitical power over the Anglo-Saxon bishops to the north of the Humber. He distinguished himself by founding a library at York, which comprehended the best collection of books then in England. He held his archbishopric during the whole reign of his brother Eadbert, who succeeded Ceolwulf in the sovereignty of Northumberland (k).

The death of archbishop Tatwin in 735 made way for Nothelm, after whom Cuthbert, bishop of Hereford, was translated to the see of Canterbury, in 741. This primate, at the request of Boniface archbishop of Mentz, summoned a council at Cloveshoo, in 747, consisting of the bishops and clergy of the south of the Humber, to consider of the best means of rectifying the abuses of ecclesiastical government, and reforming the lives both of the clergy and laity. Ethelbald king of Mercia was present at

(i) It ought not to be omitted, that Theodore introduced into the English church a more regular form of government than had before prevailed; established a tax upon every town and village in the Heptarchy, for the maintenance of the parochial clergy; and encouraged the erection of the churches, ordaining that the patronage of them should remain to the founders and their heirs.

(k) About the time of Egbert's advancement to the see of York, the number of prelates who governed the English church amounted to six teen, whose sees were as follow: Canterbury and Rochester, in the kingdom of Kent; London, in that of the East Saxons: Hereford, Leicester, Worcester, Litchfield, and Sydneucester (or Linsey), in Mercia; Dunwich and Elmham, in East Anglia; Winchester and Sherborn, in the West Saxon kingdom; and York, Lindisfarne, and Hexham, in that of Northumberland, besides Whitherne in Galloway, then under subjection to the Northumbrian monarch. *Vid. this this synod, with many of the nobles of his realm. Of the thirty canons enacted on this occasion, the greater part were borrowed from the edicts of a synod which Boniface had lately holden at Mentz; but, though the German council had professed a perfect subjection to the church of Rome, and had unequivocally recognised the supremacy of the pope, as the vicar of St. Peter, the assembly of Cloveshoo, unwilling to follow their brethren of Mentz in this particular, judiciously omitted all mention of a dependence to which they did not conceive the pope to be entitled, and contented themselves with substituting, in lieu of the German canon on that head, a general declaration of sincere affection toward all the members of the Christian church, however divided by local distance (l).

Cuthbert, who presided seventeen years in the archiepiscopal chair, was succeeded in 759, after a year's vacancy, by Bregurin, a native of Germany, who died before he had ruled the church above three years. The next archbishop of Canterbury was Janebert or Lambert, abbot of St. Augustine's monastery, who was elected by the canons of Christchurch in that city in 762. These electors were not induced by his merit to make choice of him, but by a desire of preventing the effects of his appeal to the pope against them, for having buried the last two archbishops in the cathedral, contrary to the right which the monks of St. Augustine claimed by prescription, of interring the prelates of this see in their monastery. Lambert having procured his election by a promise of desisting from his appeal, was confirmed in his metropolitan rank by the present of a pall from his holiness. While he filled the see which he had thus obtained by a fortunate incident, the extent of his jurisdiction was considerably diminished by the power, ambition, and resentment, of Offa, the Mercian king, who was not only displeased at the subjection of any of the bishops in his dominions at the see of another kingdom, but was personally exasperated at the conduct of Lambert, for having been concerned (as Offa supposed) in the attempts of several of the English princes to instigate Charlemagne to an invasion of Mercia. Influenced by these suggestions, he entered into a negotiation with pope Adrian, for the erection of the see of Litchfield into an archbishopric. Notwithstanding all the opposition which Lambert gave to this measure, the interest of Offa ultimately gained the victory at the court of Rome. Adrian, who is said to have been won by the valuable presents of the Mercian monarch, transmitted to him an order in 786 for the establishment of an archiepiscopal see at Litchfield, to which all the Mercian bishops were to be suffragans, as well as those of East-Anglia; so that there were now three metropolitans in England, namely, the archbishops of Canterbury, York, and Litchfield, the province of the first being now so reduced as to be inferior in extent of country, and number of suffragans, to that of Litchfield, and hardly superior in these respects to the province of York. About the same time the pope commissioned Gregory bishop of Ostia, and Theophylact bishop of Todi, to visit the different churches of England, as legates of the papal see. They first waited on archbishop Lambert, with whom they perhaps conferred on the proposed diminution of his province, by the elevation of the bishop of Litchfield to the rank of a metropolitan. From Kent they proceeded into Mercia, where they separated, Gregory continuing his journey to the court of Elfward king of Northumberland. Here a council was called, and twenty canons, proposed by Gregory, received the sanction of Elfwald and his peers both spiritual and temporal. The same canons were agreed to in a council convoked by Offa at a place called Caalchythe, where archbishop Lambert was present.

Near the close of this century, the English prelates gave a proof of their superiority to those of Rome in purity of worship; for, at a time when the Romish clergy had adopted the decrees of the second council of Nice in 787, which, among other points, authorised not only the use but the adoration of images, representations of scriptural history, figures of saints, &c. both in painting and sculpture, had been constantly used among the English Christians; but they had not yet deviated into the idolatrous practice of adoring these works of art, considering them only as incentives to devotion by reminding them of that Omnipotent Being to whom alone adoration is due.

(l) Several years before this synod, a council had assembled at the same place, by the direction of king Ethelbald and archbishop Cuthbert, and had followed an example given by Withred king of Kent, for securing from all invasion and encroachment the possessions of the church and the endowments of monasteries, and exempting estates of this description from all imposts and services, except those which related to the erection of bridges and castles. Spelman.

Hegbert, bishop of Litchfield, who had become archbishop of that see, did not long survive the increase of his spiritual honours. His successor was Adulf, who, after exercising for several years the functions of a metropolitan, was divested of that dignity by pope Leo III. with the consent of his sovereign Cenulf. In 803 a synod convened by Athelhard, the successor of Lambert in the archbishopric of Canterbury, confirmed the papal decree for restoring to this see those dioceses which had been dismembered from it by the policy of Offa and the interested complaisance of Adrian.

The next point of importance in the ecclesiastical history of the Heptarchy, was the convocation of a council at Cealchythe by Walfred archbishop of Canterbury, at which Cenulf and his nobles assisted, in 810. One of the canons of this council was particularly aimed at the Scots, whom it prohibited from acting as clergymen within the province of Canterbury. The reason alledged by the canons for this exclusion, was, that it was uncertain by whom, or in what manner, they were ordained, and it was expedient to refuse the sacred ministrations from such nations as had no metropolitan among them, and paid little regard to others orders.

From this period to the union of the Heptarchy, no genuine transactions of moment occur in the history of the English church. We shall therefore close the present section with a brief account of those ecclesiastics who were most distinguished by the acquisition of learning and science during the continuance of the heptarchical government.

Aldhelm was one of the first who endeavoured to redeem his country from the reproach of ignorance. He was nearly related to Ina, king of Wessex, by whom he was promoted to the bishopric of Sherborn, about the end of the seventh century. He was the first Anglo-Saxon who wrote in the Latin tongue, whether in prose or verse. He acquired such reputation as a poet, that his metrical compositions were long admired by his countrymen. He was master of all the learning of the times. A treatise written by him against the British mode of fixing the celebration of Easter, is said to have had some effect in bringing over many of the Britons to the Romish custom in this particular. His literary merit has been warmly commended by two of the best of our old historians, Bede and William of Malmsbury. Before he became bishop of Sherborn, he had presided for about thirty years over an abbey which he had founded on the site of a small monastic foundation erected at Malmsbury by a Scot named Maildulphus. He died in 709.

During the time that Aldhelm flourished, literature began to be more cultivated by the English than before; and Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, merits the praises of posterity for having contributed to the encouragement of learned and scientific pursuits. He had brought over with him from the continent a good number of Greek and Latin books, as well as some able professors of the sciences then in vogue. He considerably improved the school which Augustine had established in his monastery at Canterbury; and he himself read lectures on divinity, medicine, and other departments of knowledge. Adrian the abbot, one of his companions, taught in this academy, and was deservedly celebrated as an instructor of youth. The branches of learning then studied in England besides those which have been specified, were, the Greek and Latin tongues, poetry, logic, rhetoric, the Roman law, arithmetic, astronomy, and music.

Wilbrood, the first bishop of Utrecht, was a learned English priest. He made a voyage to the hither Frisia (now a part of the Dutch territories), and was instrumental in the conversion of many of the inhabitants. Pope Sergius I. to encourage his efforts for the dissemination of evangelical truth, consecrated him bishop of the Frisians, before the expiration of the seventh century. Benedict Biscop, who founded the abbey of Weremouth, near Durham, in 674, and that of Zarrow some years after, was a man of considerable learning, and eager to promote it in others. He undertook several journeys to Rome, that he might purchase books, paintings, statues, &c. for the use and ornament of his monasteries. In the school annexed to the former of these foundations (for the greater part of the monasteries, if not all, were provided with schools, the celebrated Bede, who derived from his piety and erudition the epithet of Venerable, received the earlier part of his education. He was instructed at different times by the founder of this abbey, by Ceadfrid, his successor in the government of it, and John of Beverley, by whom, at that time bishop of Hexham, he was ordained. His literary eminence was so distinguished, that pope Sergius I. wrote to Ceolfrid, requesting him to send Bede to Rome, that his holiness might consult him on some important points relative to the administration of the church. We find that Bede did not comply with the pope's wish, but continued to live a recluse life in the Northumbrian kingdom, employing himself with indefatigable diligence in the performance of the clerical office, in the communication of knowledge to youth, in private study, and in the composition of a great number of works. He not only wrote on theological subjects, his more immediate province, but also on grammar, arithmetic, astronomy, natural philosophy, history, and music. His ecclesiastical history of the English nation, though it exhibits a strong tincture of that superstitious credulity which was so prevalent in his time, is an ingenious and learned work, if we contrast it with the general ignorance of the age in which he wrote. His death happened in 735, in the monastery of Zarrow, at the time of his grand climactric.

Bede speaks of an English poet who flourished in his time, named Caedmon, a monk of Wehitby. He did not possess much learning; but was endued with such a talent for poetry, that he was universally admired among his cotemporaries.

Heddi or Eddius, a monk of Canterbury, was patronised by the famous bishop of Wilfred, whose life he wrote in a style not destitute of elegance. He was eminent for his skill in church music; and died about the year 720.

Acca, the successor of Wilfred in the see of Hexham, wrote some theological treatises; and was skilled in the science of church music, which was then extremely fashionable.

Winfred, an English monk, who assumed the name of Boniface, acquired great fame by his learning and pious zeal. Being desirous of preaching the gospel among the gentiles, he left his country for that purpose, and was employed for many years in the conversion of the Germanic tribes. Pope Gregory II. honoured him with the episcopal dignity; and Gregory III. appointed him archbishop of Mentz, and legate of the papal see for Germany. He erected several bishoprics in that country, of which he was styled the apostle. He at length owed his death to his zeal in the cause of Christianity; for he was assasinated by some pagans in the Frisian territories, in 754, in the eighty-fourth year of his age. Many of his letters have been printed.

Alcuin, a native of the Northumbrian kingdom, was one of the most learned men of his time. Educated at York, under the auspices of archbishop Egbert, he had the benefit of the valuable library which that prelate had collected. He is said to have been abbot of St. Augustine's, Canterbury. Being sent by Offa the Mercian to Charlemagne, he was prevailed upon by that prince to settle in the French court. Here he acquired so great a share of favour, that he was consulted by his royal patron in affairs of great importance; and this illustrious monarch condescended to become the pupil of an English ecclesiastic, in logic, rhetoric, theology, and mathematics. By his influence with Charles, Alcuin had an opportunity of promoting the cause of literature, and the cultivation of the arts and sciences, in so effectual a manner, as to restore, in some degree, that lustre which had illumined Gaul in the flourishing times of Roman sway. After residing some years at the court of this prince, he was permitted, on his earnest solicitation, to retire from public life to St. Martin's abbey at Tours, one of the monasteries which Charles had conferred on him. Few instances occur of so unabated a continuance of princely favour and friendship, as that which was testified by Charlemagne for Alcuin, who merited this regard by the purity and integrity of his life and manners, by preserving a dignity of character untainted by servility, and uniting the flowers of politeness with the matured fruits of a cultivated understanding. He wrote some theological pieces, in one of which he reprobated the practice of paying adoration to images; and, in another, supported the orthodox faith against the heresy of Felix, bishop of Urgel, who had broached an opinion, importing that Christ, with reference to his human nature, was the adopted rather than the natural son of God. He also produced some historical tracts and poems. He died at Tours, in 804.

Besides the churchmen whom we have mentioned as excelling in literature, there were some laymen during the Heptarchy who were reputed to possess no inconsiderable share of learning. The persons here alluded to were of high rank: Sigebert, king of East-Anglia; Oswald, king of Northumberland; and Alfred, one of his successors. Ina, the West-Saxon, and Offa, the Mercian, were not only celebrated as legislators, but as patrons of learning; though we do not find that they personally excelled in any particular branch of literature; neither are any pieces said to be written by any of them known to be extant.

BOOK IV.

FROM THE COMPLETE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE ENGLISH MONARCHY TO THE NORMAN CONQUEST.

CHAPTER I.

From the Accession of Egbert, as Monarch of England, to the Death of Alfred the Great.

EGBERT.

THE final dissolution of the Heptarchy in 827 seemed to promise a cessation not only of those internal commotions, kindled by a disputed succession, which had frequently agitated the different kingdoms, but also of those external hostilities which had so often prevailed between jealous and ambitious sovereigns. The excellent character of Egbert, and the fame of his courage and abilities, appeared to prognosticate a continuance of that submission which he now experienced from the Anglo-Saxon communities; and the people might reasonably expect to be rewarded for their acquiescence in his new dignity, by an extension to the whole kingdom of England of the same upright and laudable administration which had long secured to him the affection and esteem of his peculiar subjects of Wessex. The concentration of the English power under one head afforded ground for hope, that the new kingdom would flourish in arts, riches, and civilization, in a degree which the disunion of seven states had hitherto prevented; that union and concord would succeed to division and animosity; and that the general respectability of the nation would command that regard from foreign powers, which the comparative insignificance of the individual states of the Heptarchy had been unable to procure.

Soon after the submission of the kingdom of Northumberland, by which Egbert completed in his own person the sovereignty of England, he returned to Winchester, where he dazzled his people with the splendor of a coronation; a measure which was sanctioned by the consent of a great council. He then issued a proclamation, enjoining the application of the general name of England to the dominions that lately formed the Heptarchy.

The hopes of a durable tranquillity, which had begun to flatter the minds of the English nation, were checked in the bud. The restless and rapacious Danes threatened them with a constant succession of hostile descents, and predatory invasions. A body of these pirates landed on the isle of Sheppey, plundered it, and made good a retreat to their ships in 832. In the succeeding year, thirty-five Danish vessels stopped on the coast of Dorsetshire, and poured forth a numerous corps of northern warriors at Charmouth. Egbert, as soon as he was informed of their appearance on the coast, hastily marched with an army to repel the invaders; and a battle commenced with great fury. Though the king disordered the enemy at the first onset, they at length pressed him so warmly, that in all probability, notwithstanding his utmost efforts, his troops would have met with a total defeat, if the approach of night had not separated the combatants. Both armies sustained great loss; and Egbert, in particular, lost two of his principal officers, besides two of his prelates, who had made a temporary exchange of their spiritual warfare for the more destructive weapons of military service. The Danes kept the field for some time, and then retired to their vessels. The smallness of Egbert's force was the cause of his ill success on this occasion; but the event taught him to be more provident in future, while the specimen he had given the intruders of his martial spirit convinced them that their attempts on his dominions would not be bloodless.

The sagacity of Egbert must have pointed out to him the great utility of a maritime force for the security of the realm against invasion. He must have lamented the utter decline of that naval eminence which the Saxons had formerly enjoyed; and there is little doubt that he endeavoured, during the remainder of his reign, to prepare a sufficient navy for the defence of his coasts. But a length of time was requisite for the restoration of maritime power; and this great work was reserved for the enterprising and universal genius of his grandson Alfred the Great.

While Egbert was devising the most efficacious means for preserving the safety of his dominions, the Danes were meditating a more formidable invasion. They formed a league with some tribes of Cornish Britons, who, being averse to the yoke of their ancient enemies the Saxons, revolted from Egbert, and joined a Danish army which landed in that part of England, in 835. The king, with a greater force than that which he had conducted to the field of Charmouth, advanced to meet the confederates, and punished their attempts with a signal defeat, which was attended with an extraordinary slaughter of the vanquished (m).

No other memorable action distinguished the reign of this prince, who resigned his breath in the following year, and was interred at Winchester, where he had usually resided. His character seems to have been that of an active, brave, and enterprising warrior, an able statesman, and a beneficent sovereign. His ambition was restrained within the limits of prudence, which rendered him, in the end, more securely successful. Foreseeing the effects of that indolence and timidity, which, among the majority of the English, had superseded the warlike spirit of their Saxon ancestors, he remarked to his son Ethelwulf, on his deathbed, that he might think it a great happiness, if his kingdom were not ruined by that inactivity and sloth which had so generally infected the manners of the people (n).

HAD neither the abilities nor the vigour of his father; and was better qualified for governing a convent than a kingdom. He began his reign, in 836, with making a partition of his dominions, and delivering over to his eldest son, Athelstan (o), the new-conquered provinces of Essex, Kent, and Sussex. But no inconveniencies seem to have arisen from this partition; as the continual terror of the Danish invasions prevented all domestic dissension. A fleet of these ravagers, consisting of thirty-three sail, appeared at Southampton, in 837; but were repulsed with loss by Wulfhere, governor of the neighbouring county. The same year, Æthelhelm, governor of Dorsetshire, routed another band which had disembarked at Portsmouth; but he obtained the victory after a furious engagement, but lost his life in the action. Next year the Danes made several inroads into England, and fought battles; had several skirmishes in East-Anglia and Lindesey and Kent; where, though they were sometimes repulsed and defeated, they always obtained their end, of committing spoil upon the country, and carrying off their booty. They avoided coming to general engagement, which was not suited to their plan of operations. Their vessels were small, and ran easily up the creeks and rivers; where they drew them ashore, and having formed an entrenchment round them, which they guarded with part of their number, the remainder scattered themselves every where, and carrying off the inhabitants and cattle and goods, they hastened to their ships, and quickly disappeared. Every part of England was held in continual alarm; and the inhabitants of one county durst not give assistance to those of another, lest their own families and property should in the mean time be exposed by their absence to the fury of those barbarous ravagers. All orders of men were involved in this calamity; and the priests and monks, who had been commonly spared in the domestic quarrels of the Heptarchy, were the chief objects on which the Danish idolaters exercised their rage and animosity. Every season of the year was dangerous; and the absence of the enemy was no reason why any man could esteem himself a moment in safety (p).

These incursions had now become almost annual; when the Danes, encouraged by their successes against France as well as England (for both kingdoms were alike exposed to this dreadful calamity), invaded the last in so large a body, in 851, as seemed to threaten it with subjugation. But the English, more military than the Britons, roused themselves with a vigour proportioned to the exigency. Ceorle, governor of Devonshire, fought a battle with one body of the Danes at Wiganburgh, and put them to rout with great slaughter. King Athelstan attacked another at sea near Sandwich, sunk nine of their ships, and put the rest to flight. A body of them, however, ventured, for the first time, to take up winter-quarters in England; and receiving in the spring a strong reinforcement of their countrymen, in three hundred and fifty vessels, they advanced from the Isle of Thanet, where they had stationed themselves; burnt the cities of London and Canterbury; and having put to flight Berthulf, who now governed Mercia under the title of king, they marched into the heart of Surrey, and laid every place waste around them. Ethelwulf, impelled by the urgency of the danger, marched against them at the head of the West-Saxons; and carrying with him his second son, Ethelbald, gave them battle at Okely, and gained a decisive victory over them. This advantage procured but a short respite to the English. The Danes still kept their settlement in the Isle of Thanet; and being attacked by Ealher and Huda, governors of Kent and Surrey, in 853, though defeated in the beginning of the action, they finally repulsed the assailants, and slew both governors. They removed thence to the Isle of Shepey; where they took up their winter-quarters, that they might farther extend their devastation and ravages.

This unsettled state of England hindered not Ethelwulf from making a pilgrimage to Rome in 855; whither he carried his fourth, and favourite son, Alfred, then only six years of age. He passed there a twelvemonth in exercises of religion; and failed not in that most essential part of devotion, liberality to the church. Besides giving presents to the more distinguished ecclesiastics, he made a perpetual grant of three hundred mancuses (q) a year to that see; one third to support the lamps of St. Peter's, another those of St. Paul's, a third to the pope himself. In his return home, he married Judith, daughter of the emperor Charles the Bald; but on his landing in England, he met with an opposition which he little expected.

His eldest son, Athelstan, being dead; Ethelbald, his second, who had assumed the government, formed, in concert with many of the nobles, the project of excluding his father from a throne, which his weakness and superstition seem to have rendered him so ill qualified to fill. The people were divided between the two princes; and a sanguinary

(m) The scene of this battle was Hengsdown, near Kellington, in Cornwall.

(n) A severe law is ascribed to Egbert, enacting that every Briton who should pass to the eastward of Offa's Dyke, should suffer death; a circumstance not very probable, if it be true that he had reduced the Welsh to submission; in which case he would hardly have been so eager to separate his English subjects from all connexion with a vassal people.

(o) Athelstan is supposed by some to have been the son, by others the brother of Ethelwulf.

(p) About this time (for historians differ with regard to the particular year) a great revolution happened in the northern division of Great Britain. Kenneth Mac-Alpin, king of the Scots, whose hereditary hatred of the Picts had been inflamed by recent injuries, and who had a claim on the Pictish crown by right of blood, gained several victories over these old enemies of the Scots, and gratified his ambition and revenge by effecting a complete subjugation of the Picts to his authority; in consequence of which, he became the sole sovereign of North-Britain. It is affirmed by some of the historic writers of Scotland, that the Picts were exposed to a general massacre, and punished with utter extirpation: but it is evident, from various circumstances, that this account is not just; for, though there is reason to believe, that the troops of Kenneth were guilty of great cruelties in the prosecution of their two principal victories over the Picts, yet he appears to have incorporated the remainder of their nation among his native subjects, so that their name, in the lapse of time, was lost in that of the victorious Scots.

(q) A mancus is supposed to have been worth about seven shillings and six-pence sterling. Spelman says, it was about the weight of our present half-crown.

civil war, joined to all the other calamities under which the English laboured, appeared inevitable; when Ethelwulf had the facility to yield to the greater part of his son's pretensions. He made with him a partition of the kingdom; and taking to himself the eastern part, which was always at that time esteemed the least considerable, as well as the most exposed, he delivered over to Ethelbald the sovereignty of Wessex (r).

ETHELBALD and ETHELBERT.

ETHELWULF lived only two years after making his profuse grants to the church; and by his will he shared England between his two eldest sons, in 857, Ethelbald and Ethelbert; the west being assigned to the former; the east to the latter. Ethelbald was a profligate prince; and marrying Judith, his mother-in-law, gave great offence to the people; but moved by the remonstrances of Swithun, bishop of Winchester, he was at last prevailed on to divorce her. His reign was short; and his brother, succeeding to the government, in 860, behaved himself, during a reign of five years, in a manner more worthy of his birth and station. The kingdom, however, was still infested by the Danes, who made an inroad and sacked Winchester; but were there defeated. A body also of these pirates, who were quartered in the Isle of Thanet, having deceived the English by a treaty, unexpectedly broke into Kent, and committed great devastations.

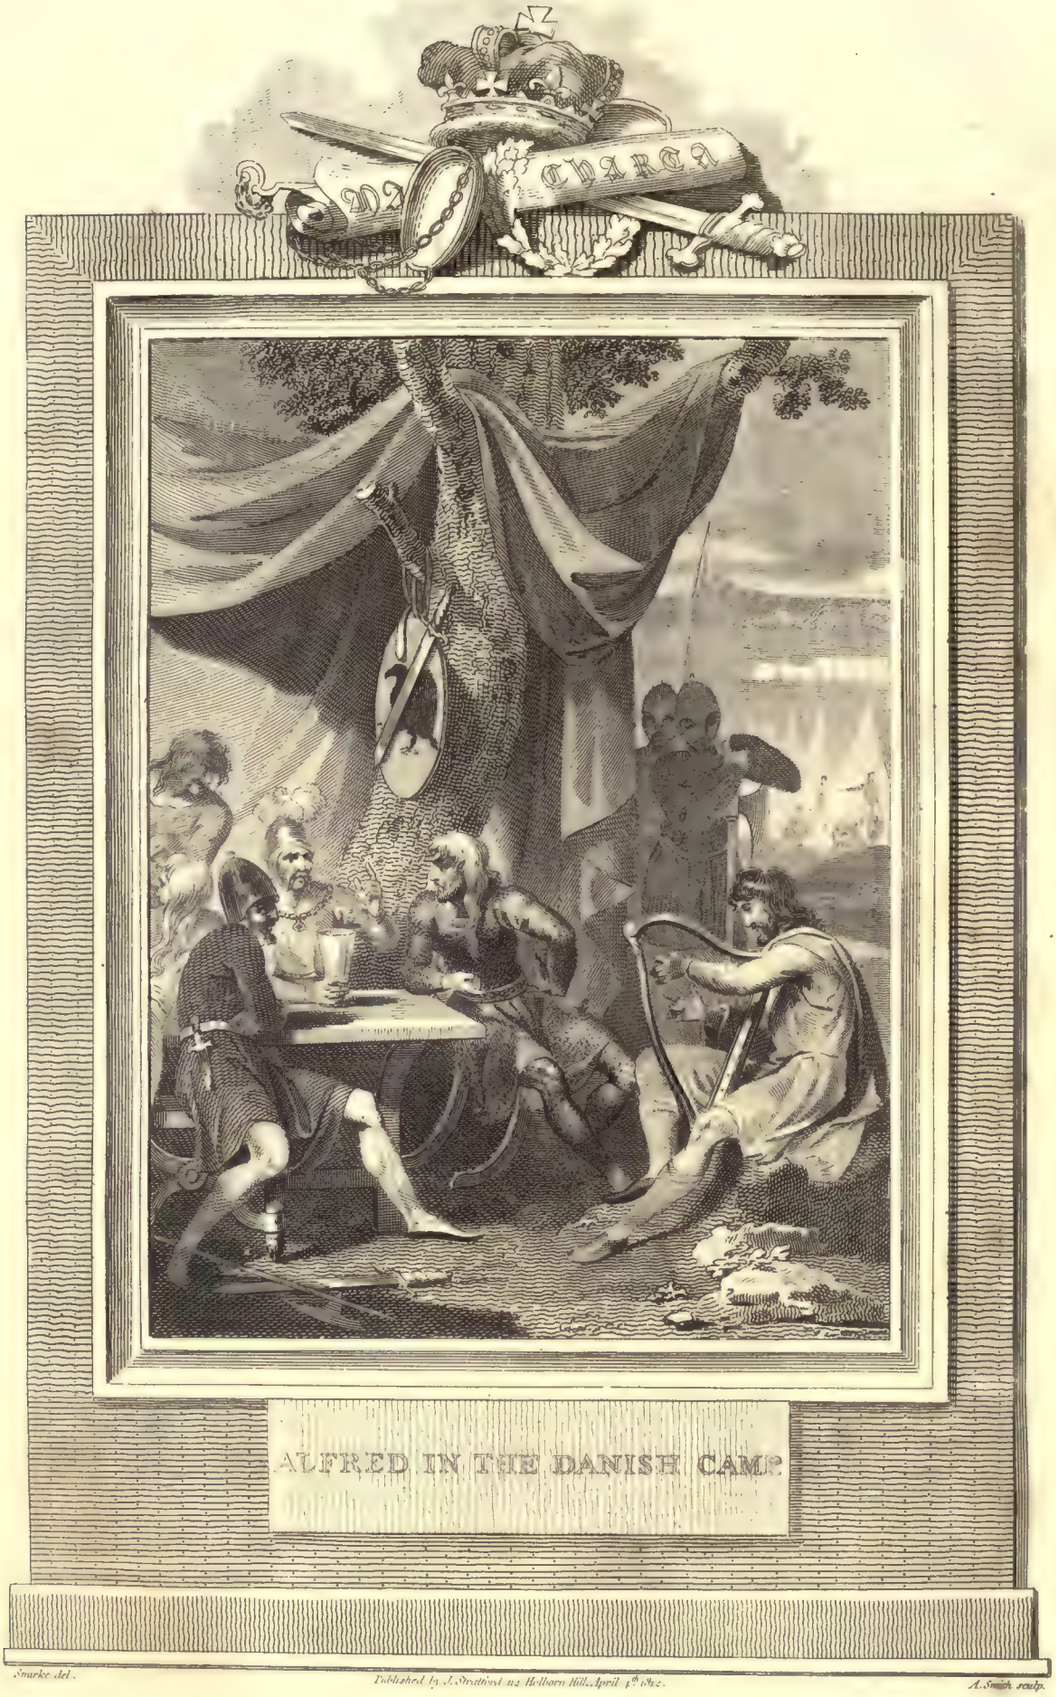
ETHELRED I.

ETHELBERT was succeeded by his brother Ethelred, in 866, who, though he defended himself with bravery, enjoyed, during his whole reign, no tranquillity from those Danish irruptions. His younger brother, Alfred, seconded him in all his enterprises; and generously sacrificed to the public good all animosity which he might entertain on account of his being excluded by Ethelred from a large patrimony which had been left him by his father.

The first landing of the Danes in the reign of Ethelred was among the East-Angles, who, more anxious for their present safety than for the common interest, entered into a separate treaty with the enemy; and furnished them with horses, which enabled them to make an irruption by land into the kingdom of Northumberland. They there seized the city of York; and defended it against Osbert and Ælla, two Northumbrian princes, who perished in the assault (s). Encouraged by these successes, and by the superiority which they had acquired in arms, they now ventured, under the command of Hinguar and Hubba, to leave the sea-coast, and penetrating into Mercia, in 867, they took up their winter-quarters at Nottingham, where they threatened the kingdom with a final subjection. The Mercians, in this extremity, applied to Ethelred for succour; and that prince, with his brother Alfred, conducting a great army to Nottingham, obliged the enemy to dislodge, and to retreat into Northumberland, in 870. Their restless disposition, and their avidity for plunder, allowed them not to remain long in those quarters: they broke into East-Anglia, defeated and took prisoner Edmund, the king of that country, whom they afterwards murdered in cool blood; and committing the most barbarous ravages on the people, particularly on the monasteries (t), they gave the East-Angles cause to regret the temporary relief which they had obtained, by assisting the common enemy.

The next station of the Danes was, in 871, at Reading; whence they infested the neighbouring country by their incursions. The Mercians, desirous of shaking off their dependence on Ethelred, refused to join him with their forces; and that prince, attended by Alfred, was obliged to march against the enemy, with the West-Saxons alone, his hereditary subjects. The Danes, being defeated in an action, shut themselves up in their garrison; but quickly making thence an irruption, they routed the West-Saxons, and obliged them to raise the siege. An action soon after ensued at Aston in Berkshire, where the English, in the beginning of the day, were in danger of a total defeat. Alfred advancing with one division of the army, was surrounded by the enemy in disadvantageous ground; and Ethelred, who was at that time hearing mass, refused to march to his assistance, till prayers should be finished: but as he afterwards obtained the victory, this success, not the danger of Alfred, was ascribed by the monks to the piety of that monarch. This battle of Aston did not terminate the war. Another battle was a little after fought at Basing; where the Danes were more successful; and being reinforced by a new army from their own country, they became every day more terrible to the English. Amidst these confusions, Ethelred died of a wound which he received in an action with the Danes; and left the inheritance of his cares and misfortunes, rather than of his grandeur, to his brother Alfred, then twenty-two years of age.



ALFRED THE GREAT,

WHO ascended the throne in 871, gave early marks of those great virtues and shining talents, by which, during the most difficult times, he saved his country from ruin and subversion. Ethelwulf, his father, the year after his return with Alfred from Rome, had again sent the young prince thither with a numerous retinue; and a report being spread of the king's death, the pope, Leo III. gave Alfred the royal unction; whether prognosticating his future greatness from the appearances of his pregnant genius, or willing to pretend, even in that age, to the right of conferring kingdoms. Alfred, on his return home, became every day more the object of his father's affections; but being indulged in all youthful pleasures, he was much neglected in his education; and he had already reached his twelfth year, when he was yet totally ignorant of the lowest elements of literature. His genius was first roused by the recital of Saxon poems, in which the queen took delight; and this species of erudition, which is sometimes able to make a considerable progress even among barbarians, expanded those noble and elevated sentiments which he had received from nature. Encouraged by the queen, and stimulated by his own ardent inclination, he soon learned to read those compositions; and proceeded thence to acquire the knowledge of the Latin tongue, in which he met with authors that better prompted his heroic spirit, and directed his generous views. Absorbed in these elegant pursuits, he is said to have regarded his accession to royalty rather as an object of regret than of triumph; but being called to the throne, in preference to his brother's children, as well by the will of his father, a circumstance which had great authority with the Anglo-Saxons, as by the vows of the whole nation, and the urgency of public affairs, he shook off his literary indolence, and exerted himself in defence of his people. He had scarcely buried his brother, when he was obliged to take the field, in order to oppose the Danes, who had seized Winchester, and were exercising their usual ravages on the countries around. He marched against them with the few troops which he could assemble on a sudden; and giving them battle, gained at first an advantage, but by his pursuing the victory too far, the superiority of the enemy's numbers prevailed, and recovered them the day. Their loss, however, in the action was so considerable, that, fearing Alfred would receive daily reinforcements from his subjects, they were content to stipulate for a safe retreat, and promised to depart the kingdom. For that purpose they were conducted to London, and allowed to take up winter-quarters there; but, careless of their engagements, they immediately set themselves to the committing of spoil on the neighbouring country. Burrhed, king of Mercia, in whose territories London was situated, made a new stipulation with them, and engaged them, by presents of money, to remove to Lindesey in Lincolnshire, in 872; a country which they had already reduced to ruin and desolation. Finding therefore no object in that place, either for their rapine or violence, they suddenly turned back, in 873, upon (r) Immediately after, he summoned the states of the whole kingdom, and with the same facility conferred a perpetual and important donation on the church.

(s) Brompton attributes the Danish invasion of Northumberland to the intrigues of Bruern Bocard, a nobleman of that kingdom, whose wife had been ravished by Osbert, he was instigated by motives of revenge to solicit Hinguar and Hubba to attempt the conquest of Northumberland.

(t) Amidst the devastations of this campaign, the following event occurred: Ebba, abbess of Coldingham, in the shire of Berwick, apprehending an attack from the Danes, cut off her nose and upper lip, and prevailed upon the nuns of her convent to disfigure themselves in the same manner, that the enemy might be so disgusted with their appearance as to leave their virginity uncontaminated. The lust of the Danes being converted into revenge for their disappointment, they set fire to the abbey, which was consumed with its heroic inhabitants.

Mercia, in a quarter where they expected to find it without defence; and fixing their station at Repton in Derbyshire, they laid the whole country desolate with fire and sword. Burrhed, despairing of success against an enemy, whom no force could resist, and no treaties bind, abandoned his kingdom, and flying to Rome; took shelter in a cloister, in 874. He was brother-in-law to Alfred, and the last who bore the title of king in Mercia.

The West-Saxons were now the only remaining power in England; and though supported by the vigour and abilities of Alfred, they were unable to sustain the efforts of those ravagers, who from all quarters invaded them. In 875 a new swarm of Danes came over under three princes, Guthrum, Oscital, and Amund; and having first joined their countrymen at Repton, they soon found the necessity of separating, in order to provide for their subsistence. Part of them, under the command of Haldene, their chieftain, marched into Northumberland in 876, where they fixed their quarters; part of them took quarters at Cambridge, whence they dislodged in the ensuing summer, and seized Wereham, in the county of Corset, the very centre of Alfred's dominions (u). That prince so straightened them in these quarters, that they were content to come to a treaty with him, and stipulated to depart his country. Alfred, well acquainted with their usual perfidy, obliged them to swear upon the holy reliques to the observance of the treaty; not that he expected they would pay any veneration to the reliques; but he hoped, that, if they now violated this oath, their impiety would infallibly draw down upon them the danger of heaven. But the Danes, little apprehensive of the danger, suddenly, without seeking any pretence, fell upon Alfred's army; and having put it to rout, marched westward and took possession of Exeter. The prince collected new forces, and exerted such vigour, that he fought in one year eight battles with the enemy, and reduced them to the utmost extremity. In 878 he hearkened, however, to new proposals of peace; and was satisfied to stipulate with them, that they would settle elsewhere in England, and would not permit the entrance of more ravagers into the kingdom. But while he was expecting the execution of this treaty, which it seemed the interest of the Danes themselves to fulfil, he heard that another body had landed, and having collected all the scattered troops of their countrymen, had surprised Chippenham, then a considerable town, and were exercising their usual ravages all around them.

This last incident quite broke the spirit of the Saxons, and reduced then to despair. Finding that, after all the miserable havoc which they had undergone in their persons and in their property; after all the victorious actions which they had exerted in their own defence; a new band, equally greedy of spoil and slaughter, had disembarked among them; they believed themselves abandoned by heaven to destruction, and delivered over to those swarms of robbers, which the fertile north thus incessantly poured forth against them. Some left their country, and retired into Wales, or fled beyond sea: others submitted to the conquerors, in hopes of appeasing their fury by a servile obedience. And every man's attention being now engrossed in concern for his own preservation, no one would hearken to the exhortations of the king, who summoned them to make under his conduct one effort more in defence of their prince, their country, and their liberties. Alfred himself was obliged to relinquish the ensigns of his dignity, to dismiss his servants, and to seek shelter, in the meanest disguises, from the pursuit and fury of his enemies. He concealed himself under a peasant's habit, and lived some time in the house of a neat-herd, who had been entrusted with the care of some of his cows. There passed here an incident, which has been recorded by all the historians, and was long preserved by popular tradition; though it contains nothing memorable in itself, except so far as every circumstance is interesting, which attends so much virtue and dignity, reduced to such distress. The wife of the neat-herd was ignorant of the condition of her royal guest; and observing him one day busy by the fire-side, in trimming his bow and arrows, she desired him to take care of some cakes which were toasting, while she was employed elsewhere in other domestic affairs. But Alfred, whose thoughts were otherwise engaged, neglected this injunction; and the good woman, on her return, finding her cakes all burnt, rated the king very severely, and upbraided him, that he always seemed very well pleased to eat her warm cakes, though he was thus negligent in toasting them.

By degrees, Alfred, as he found the search of the enemy become more remiss, collected some of his retainers, and retired into the centre of a bog, formed by the stagnating waters of the Thone and Parret, in Somersetshire. He here found two acres of firm ground; and building a habitation on them, rendered himself secure by its fortifications, and still more by the unknown and inaccessible roads which led to it, and by the forests and morasses with which it was every way environed. This place he called Æthelingay, or the Isle of Nobles; and it now bears the name of Athelney. He thence made frequent and unexpected sallies upon the Danes, who often felt the vigour of his arm, but knew not from what quarter the blow came. He subsisted himself and his followers by the plunder which he acquired; he procured them consolation by revenge; and from small successes, he opened their minds to hope, that, notwithstanding his present low condition, more important victories might at length attend his valour.

Here lay concealed, but not inactive, the intrepid Alfred, during a twelvemonth; when the news of a prosperous event reached his ears, and called him to the field. Hubba, the Dane, having spread devastation, fire, and slaughter, over Wales, had landed in Devonshire from twenty-three vessels, and laid siege to the castle of Kinwith, a place situated near the mouth of the small river Tau. Oddune, earl of Devonshire, with his followers, had taken shelter there; and being ill supplied with provisions, and even with water, he determined, by some vigorous blow, to prevent the necessity of submitting to the barbarous enemy. He made a sudden sally upon the Danes before sun-rising; and taking them unprepared, he put them to rout, pursued them with great slaughter, killed Hubba himself, and got possession of the famous Reafen, or enchanted standard, in which the Danes put great confidence. It contained the figure of a raven, which had been inwoven by the three sisters of Hinguar and Hubba with many magical incantations, and which, by its different movements, prognosticated, as the Danes believed, the good or bad success of any enterprize.

Animated by this successful specimen of returning courage in his subjects, Alfred resolved to improve the advantage. Being convinced, however, that it would be hazardous to make an attempt against the enemy, without some acquaintance of their force and posture, he disguised himself as a harper or minstrel, (a profession highly esteemed by all the northern nations,) and repaired with one attendant to the Danish camp. The reception which he met with answered his warmest expectations. He passed through every part of the camp without incurring the least suspicion: and, after entertaining the soldiers by his songs and music, he was introduced to Guthrum, the principal commander of their army, who was pleased with his musical talents, and charmed with his sprightly sallies of wit. Continuing several days in the camp, he reconnoitred the enemy to his full satisfaction. They appeared to him to be under no apprehensions of an attack from the English; their negligence was strikingly manifest; and they were wholly unprepared to make any effectual resistance to a sudden aggression. He had no sooner returned to Æthelingay, than he secretly sent messengers to the nobles of Somersetshire, Wilts, and Hants, directing them to conduct their vassals, on an appointed day, to Ecbyrhtes-stan (supposed to be Brixton) on the borders of the forest of Selwood. This requisition brought a considerable army to the place of rendezvous, whose first meeting with their monarch was attended with looks of eagerness and shouts of loyalty. He instantly conducted them to Eddington in Wiltshire, where the Danes were encamped; and taking advantage of his previous knowledge of the place, he directed his attack upon the most unguarded quarter of the enemy. The Danes, surprised to see an army of English, whom they considered as totally subdued, and still more astonished to hear that Alfred was at their head, made but a faint resistance, notwithstanding their superiority of numbers, and were soon put to flight with great slaughter. The remainder of the routud army, with their prince, was besieged by Alfred in a fortified

(u) In the course of this year, Rollo, a Norman leader, landed on the English coast; but, reflecting on the great qualities and indefatigable spirit of Alfred, and finding also the country was already stocked with swarms of rapacious invaders, of the same origin with himself and his followers, he crossed the channel, made the northern parts of France the objects of his depredations, and at length became the founder of the Norman power in that kingdom. Some historians have brought down his arrival in England to a later period; namely, to the time when Alfred had subjected to his crown the Danes of East-Anglia, Mercia, and Northumberland, and had restored peace to all parts of his kingdom.

camp to which they fled; but being reduced to extremity by want and hunger, they had recourse to the clemency of the victor, and offered to submit on any conditions. The king, no less generous than brave, gave them their lives; and even formed a scheme for converting them, from mortal enemies, into faithful subjects and confederates. He knew, that the kingdoms of East-Anglia and Northumberland were totally desolated by the frequent inroads of the Danes, and he now proposed to repeople them, by settling Guthrum and his followers in that quarter. He hoped that the new planters would at last betake themselves to industry, when, by reason of his resistance, and the exhausted condition of the country, they could no longer subsist by plunder, and, that they might serve him as a rampart against any future incursions of their countrymen. But before he ratified these mild conditions with the Danes, he required, that they should give him one pledge of their submission, and of their inclination to incorporate with the English, by declaring their conversion to Christianity. Guthrum, and his army, had no aversion to the proposal; and, without much instruction, or argument, or conference, they were all admitted to baptism. The king answered for Guthrum at the font, gave him the name of Athelstan, and received him as his adopted son.

The success of this expedient seemed to correspond to Alfred's hopes: the greater part of the Danes settled peaceably in their new quarters, in 880. Some smaller bodies of the same nation, which were dispersed in Mercia, were distributed into the five cities of Derby, Leicester, Stamford, Lincoln, and Nottingham, and were thence called the Fif or Five-burghers. The more turbulent and unquiet made an expedition into France under the command of Hastings; and except by a short incursion of Danes, who sailed up the Thames and landed at Fulham, but suddenly retreated to their ships on finding the country in a posture of defence, Alfred was not for some years infested by the inroads of those barbarians.

The king employed this interval of tranquillity in restoring order to the state, which had been shaken by so many violent convulsions; in establishing civil and military institutions; in composing the minds of men to industry and justice; and providing against the return of like calamities. He was, more properly than his grandfather Egbert, the sole monarch of the English (for so the Saxons were now universally called,) because the kingdom of Mercia was at last incorporated in his state, and was governed by Ethelbert, his brother-in-law, who bore the title of earl: and though the Danes, who peopled East-Anglia and Northumberland, were for some time ruled immediately by their own princes, they all acknowledged a subordination to Alfred, and submitted to his superior authority. As equality among subjects is the great source of concord, Alfred gave the same laws to the Danes and English, and put them entirely on a like footing in the administration both of civil and criminal justice. The fine for the murder of a Dane was the same with that for the murder of an Englishman; the great symbol of equality in those ages.

The king, after rebuilding the ruined cities, particularly London, in 886, which had been destroyed by the Danes in the reign of Ethelwulf, established a regular militia for the defence of the kingdom. He ordained that all his people should be armed and registered; he assigned them a regular rotation of duty; he distributed part into the castles and fortresses, which he built at proper places; he required another part to take the field on any alarm, and to assemble at stated places of rendezvous; and he left a sufficient number at home, who were employed in the cultivation of the land, and who afterwards took their turn in military service. The whole kingdom was like one great garrison; and the Danes could no sooner appear in one place, than a sufficient number was assembled to oppose them, without leaving the other quarters in a defenceless state.

But Alfred, sensible that the proper method of opposing an enemy, who made incursions by sea, was to meet them on their own element, took care to provide himself with a naval force, which, though the most natural defence of an island, had hitherto been totally neglected by the English. He increased the shipping of his kingdom both in number and strength, and trained his subjects in the practice, as well of sailing, as of naval tactics. He distributed his armed vessels in proper stations round the island, and was sure to meet the Danish ships either before or after they had landed their troops, and to pursue them in all their incursions. Though the Danes might suddenly, by surprise, disembark on the coast, which was generally become desolate by their frequent ravages, they were encountered by the English fleet in their retreat; and escaped not, as formerly, by abandoning their booty, but paid, by their total destruction, the penalty of the disorders which their temerity had committed.

Thus did Alfred repel several inroads of the piratical Danes, and maintained his kingdom, during some years, in safety and tranquillity. A fleet of a hundred and twenty ships of war was stationed upon the coast; and being provided with warlike engines, as well as with expert seamen, both Frisians and English (for Alfred supplied the defects of his own subjects by engaging able foreigners in his service,) maintained a superiority over those smaller bands, with which England had so often been infested. But at last, in 893, Hastings, the famous Danish chief, having ravaged all the provinces of France, both along the sea-coast and the Loire and Seine, and being obliged to quit that country, more by the desolation which he had occasioned, than by the resistance of the inhabitants, appeared off the coast of Kent with a fleet of three hundred and thirty sail. The greater part of the enemy disembarked in the Rother, and seized the fort of Apuldore, in 894. Hastings himself, commanding a fleet of eighty sail, entered the Thames, and fortifying Milton in Kent, began to spread his forces over the country, and to commit the most destructive ravages. But Alfred, on the first alarm of this descent, flew to the defence of his people, at the head of a select band of soldiers, whom he always kept about his person; and gathering to him the armed militia from all quarters, appeared in the field with a force superior to the enemy. All straggling parties, whom necessity, or love of plunder, had drawn to a distance from their chief encampment, were cut off by the English; and these pirates, instead of increasing their spoil, found themselves cooped up in their fortifications, and obliged to subsist by the plunder which they had brought from France. Tired of this situation, which must in the end prove ruinous to them, the Danes at Apuldore rose suddenly from their encampment, with an intention of marching towards the Thames, and passing over into Essex; but they escaped not the vigilance of Alfred, who encountered them at Farnham, put them to rout, seized all their horses and baggage, and chased the runaways on board their ships, which carried them up the Colne to Mersey in Essex, where they entrenched themselves. Hastings, at the same time, and probably by concert, made a like movement; and Deserting Milton, took possession of Bamflete, near the Isle of Canvey in the same county; where he hastily threw up fortifications for his defence against the power of Alfred.

Another unfortunate circumstance for the English, was the death of Guthrum, prince of the East-Anglian Danes; as also of Guthred, whom the king had appointed governor of the Northumbrians; and those restless tribes, being no longer restrained by the authority of their princes, and being encouraged by the appearance of so great a body of their countrymen, broke into rebellion, shook off the authority of Alfred, and yielding to their inveterate habits of war and depredation, embarked on board two hundred and forty vessels, and appeared before Exeter in the west of England. Alfred lost not a moment in opposing this new enemy. Having left some forces at London to make head against Hastings and the other Danes, he marched suddenly to the west; and falling on the rebels before they were aware, pursued them to their ships with great slaughter. These ravagers sailing next to Sussex, began to plunder the country near Chichester; but the order which Alfred had every where established, sufficed here, without his presence, for the defence of the place; and the rebels meeting with a new repulse, in which many of them were slain, and some of their ships taken, were obliged to put again to sea, and were discouraged from any other attempt.

Meanwhile, the Danish invaders in Essex, having united their force under the command of Hastings, advanced into the inland countries and made spoil of all around them; but soon had reason to repent their temerity. The English army left in London, assisted by a body of the citizens, attacked the enemy's entrenchments at Bamflete, overpowered the garrison, and having done great execution upon them, carried off the wife and two sons of Hastings. In 895, Alfred generously spared these captives; and even restored them to Hastings, on condition that he should depart the kingdom.

But though the king had thus honourably rid himself of this dangerous enemy, he had not entirely subdued or expelled the invaders. The piratical Danes willingly followed in an excursion any prosperous leader who gave them hopes of booty; but were not so easily induced to relinquish their enterprise, or submit to return, baffled and without plunder, into their native country. Great numbers of them, after the departure of Hastings, seized and fortified Shobury at the mouth of the Thames; and having left a garrison there, marched along the river, till they came to Boddington in Gloucestershire; where, being reinforced by some Welsh, they threw up entrenchments, and prepared for defence. The king here surrounded them with the whole force of his dominions; and as he had now a certain prospect of victory, he resolved to trust nothing to chance, but rather to master his enemies by famine than assault. They were reduced to such extremities, that, having eaten their own horses, and having many of them perished with hunger, they made a desperate sally upon the English; and though the greater number fell in the action, a considerable body made their escape. These roved about for some time in England, still pursued by the vigilance of Alfred; they attacked Leicester with success, defended themselves in Hartford, and then fled to Quatford, where they were finally broken and subdued, in 897. The small remains of them either dispersed themselves among their countrymen in Northumberland and East-Anglia, or had recourse again to the sea, where they exercised piracy, under the command of Sigefert, a Northumbrian. This freebooter, well acquainted with Alfred's naval preparations, had framed vessels of a new construction, higher, and longer, and swifter, than those of the English: but the king soon discovered his superior skill, by building vessels still higher, and longer, and swifter, than those of the Northumbrians; and falling upon them, while they were exercising their ravages in the west, he took twenty of their ships; and having tried all the prisoners at Winchester, he hanged them as pirates, the common enemies of mankind.

The well-timed severity of this execution, together with the excellent posture of defence established every where, restored full tranquillity in England, and provided for the future security of the government. The East-Anglian and Northumbrian Danes, on the first appearance of Alfred upon their frontiers, made anew the most humble submissions to him; and he thought it prudent to take them under his immediate government, without establishing over them a viceroy of their own nation. The Welsh also acknowledged his authority; and this great prince had now, by prudence and justice and valour, established his sovereignty over all the southern parts of the island, from the English channel to the frontiers of Scotland; when he died, October 28, 901, in the vigour of his age and the full strength of his faculties, after a glorious reign of twenty-nine years and a half, and fifty-third of his age, in which he deservedly attained the appellation of Alfred the Great, and the title of Founder of the English Monarchy.

The following exceedingly just character of Alfred is given by Mr. Hume: The merit of this prince, both in private and public life, may with advantage be set in opposition to that of any monarch or citizen which the annals of any age or any nation can present to us. He seems indeed to be the model of that perfect character, which, under the denomination of a sage or wise man, philosophers have been fond of delineating, rather as a fiction of their imagination, than in hopes of ever seeing it really existing. So happily were all his virtues tempered together; so justly were they blended; and so powerfully did each prevent the other from exceeding its proper boundaries! He knew how to reconcile the most enterprising spirit with the coolest moderation; the most obstinate perseverance with the easiest flexibility; the most severe justice with the gentlest lenity; the greatest vigour in commanding with the most perfect affability of deportment; the highest capacity and inclination for science, with the most shining talents for action. His civil and his military virtues are almost equally the objects of our admiration; excepting only, that the former, being more rare among princes, as well as more useful, seem chiefly to challenge our applause. Nature also, as if desirous that so bright a production of her skill should be set in the fairest light, had bestowed on him every bodily accomplishment, vigour of limbs, dignity of shape and air, with a pleasing, engaging, and open countenance. Fortune alone, by throwing him into that barbarous age, deprived him of historians worthy to transmit his fame to posterity; and we wish to see him delineated in more lively colours, and with more particular strokes, that we may at least perceive some of those small specks and blemishes, from which, as a man, it is impossible he could be entirely exempted.

But we should give but an imperfect idea of Alfred's merit, were we to confine our narration to his military exploits, and were not more particular in our account of his institutions for the execution of justice, and of his zeal for the encouragement of arts and sciences.

Alfred having subdued, and expelled the Danes, found the kingdom in the most wretched condition; desolated by the ravages of those barbarians, and thrown into disorders, which were calculated to perpetuate its misery. Though the great armies of the Danes were broken, the country was full of straggling troops of that nation, who, being accustomed to live by plunder, were become incapable of industry; and who, from the natural ferocity of their manners, indulged themselves in committing violence, even beyond what was requisite to supply their necessities: The English themselves, reduced to the most extreme indigence by these continued depredations, had shaken off all bands of government; and those who had been plundered to-day, betook themselves next day to the like disorderly life, and, from despair, joined the robbers in pillaging their fellow-citizens. These were the evils for which it was necessary that the vigilance of Alfred should provide a remedy.

That he might render the execution of justice strict and regular, he divided all England into counties; these counties he subdivided into hundreds; and the hundreds into tithings. Every householder was answerable for the conduct of his family and slaves, and even of his guests, if they lived above three days in his house. Ten neighbouring householders were formed into one corporation, who, under the name of a tithing, decennary, or fribcurg, were answerable for each other's conduct, and over whom one person, called a tithingman, headbourg, or borsholder, was appointed to preside. Every man was punished as an outlaw, who did not register himself in some tithing. And no man could change his habitation, without a warrant or certificate from the householder of the tithing to which he formerly belonged.

When any person in any tithing or decennary was guilty of a crime, the borsholder was summoned to answer for him; and if he were not willing to be surety for his appearance, and his clearing himself, the criminal was committed to prison, and there detained till his trial. If he fled, either before or after finding sureties, the borsholder and decennary became liable to enquiry, and were exposed to the penalties of law. Thirty-one days were allowed them for producing the criminal; and if that time elapsed without their being able to find him, the borsholder, with two other members of the decennary, was obliged to appear, and, together with three chief members of three neighbouring decennaries (making twelve in all,) to swear that his decennary was free from all privity both of the crime committed, and of the escape of the criminal. If the borsholder could not find such a number to answer for their innocence, the decennary was compelled by fine to make satisfaction to the king, according to the degree of the offence. By this institution every man was obliged from his own interest to keep a watchful eye over the conduct of his neighbours; and was in a manner surety for the behaviour of those who were placed under the division to which he belonged: whence these decennaries received the name of frank-pledges.

So regular a distribution of the people, with so strict confinement in their habitation, may not be necessary in periods when men are more enured to obedience and justice, and it might perhaps be regarded as destructive of liberty and commerce in a polished nation; but it was well calculated to reduce that fierce and licentious people under the salutary restraint of law and government. But Alfred took care to temper these rigours by other institutions favourable to the freedom of the citizens; and nothing could be more popular and liberal than his plan for the administration of justice. The borsholder summoned together his whole decennary to assist him in deciding any smaller difference which occurred among the members of this little community. In affairs of greater moment, in appeals from the decennary, or in controversies arising between members of different decennaries, the cause was brought before the hundred, which consisted of ten decennaries, or a hundred families of freemen, and which was regularly assembled once in four weeks, for the decision of causes. The method they practised deserves to be noticed, as being the origin of juries; an institution, admirable in itself, and the best calculated for the preservation of liberty and the administration of justice, that ever was devised by the wit of man. Twelve freeholders were chosen; who, having sworn, together with the hundreder, or presiding magistrate of that division to administer impartial justice, proceeded to the examination of that cause which was submitted to their jurisdiction. And beside these monthly meetings of the hundred, there was an annual meeting, appointed for a more general inspection of the police of the district; for the enquiry into crimes, the correction of abuses in magistrates, and the obliging of every person to shew the decennary in which he was registered. The people, in imitation of their ancestors, the ancient Germans, assembled there in arms; whence a hundred was sometimes called a wapentake, and its court served both for the support of military discipline, and for the administration of civil justice.

The next superior court to that of the hundred was the county-court, which met twice a year, after Michaelmas and Easter, and consisted of the freeholders of the county, who possessed an equal vote in the decision of causes. The bishop presided in this court, together with the alderman; and the proper object of the court was the receiving of appeals from the hundreds and decennaries, and the deciding of such controversies as arose between men of different hundreds. Formerly, the alderman possessed both the civil and military authority; but Alfred, sensible that this conjunction of powers rendered the nobility dangerous and independent, appointed also a sheriff in each county, who enjoyed a co-ordinate authority with the former in the judicial function (v). His office also empowered him to guard the rights of the crown in the county, and to levy the fines imposed; which in that age formed no inconsiderable part of the public revenue.

There lay an appeal, in default of justice, from all these courts to the king himself in council; and as the people, sensible of the equity and great talents of Alfred, placed their chief confidence in him, he was soon overwhelmed with appeals from all parts of England. He was indefatigable in the dispatch of these causes; but finding that his time must be entirely engrossed by this branch of duty, he resolved to obviate the inconvenience, by correcting the ignorance or corruption of the inferior magistrates, from which it arose. He took care to have his nobility instructed in letters and the laws: he chose the earls and sheriffs from among the men most celebrated for probity and knowledge: he punished severely all malversation in office: and he removed all the earls, whom he found unequal to the trust; allowing only some of the more elderly to serve by a deputy, till their death should make room for more worthy successors.

The better to guide the magistrates in the administration of justice, Alfred framed a body of laws which was called his Dome Book, or Liber Judialis, for the general use of the whole kingdom; which, though now lost, served long as the basis of English jurisprudence, and is generally deemed the origin of what is denominated the COMMON LAW. He appointed regular meetings of the states of England twice a year in London; a city which he himself had repaired and beautified, and which he thus rendered the capital of the kingdom. The similarity of these institutions to the customs of the ancient Germans, to the practice of the other northern conquerors, and to the Saxon laws during the Heptarchy, prevents us from regarding Alfred as the sole author of this plan of government; and leads us rather to think, that, like a wise man, he contented himself with reforming, extending, and executing the institutions which he found previously established. But, on the whole, such success attended his legislation, that every thing bore suddenly a new face in England: robberies and iniquities of all kinds were repressed by the punishment or reformation of the criminals: and so exact was the general police, that Alfred, it is said, hung up, by way of bravado, golden bracelets near the highways; and no man dared to touch them. Yet, amidst these rigours of justice, this great prince preserved the most sacred regard to the liberty of his people; and it is a memorable sentiment preserved in his will, that it was just the English should for ever remain as free as their own thoughts.

As good morals and knowledge are almost inseparable, in every age, though not in every individual; the care of Alfred for the encouragement of learning among his subjects, was another useful branch of this legislation, and tended to reclaim the English from their former dissolute and ferocious manners: but the king was guided in this pursuit, less by political views, than by his natural bent and inclination towards letters. When he came to the throne, he found the nation sunk into the grossest ignorance and barbarism, proceeding from the continued disorders in the government, and from the ravages of the Danes: the monasteries were destroyed, the monks butchered or dispersed, their libraries burnt; and thus the only seats of erudition in those ages were totally subverted. Alfred himself complains, that on his accession he knew not one person, south of the Thames, who could so much as interpret the Latin service; and very few in the northern parts, who had even reached that pitch of erudition. But this prince invited over the most celebrated scholars from all parts of Europe; he established schools every where for the instruction of his people; he founded, at least repaired (w), the university of Oxford, and endowed it with many privileges, revenues, and immunities; he enjoined by law all freeholders possessed of two hydes (x) of land or more, to send their children to school for their instruction; he gave preferment both in church and state to such only as had made some proficiency in knowledge; and by all these expedients he had the satisfaction, before his death, to see a great change in the face of affairs; and in a work of his, which is still extant, he congratulates himself on the progress which learning, under his patronage, had already made in England.

But the most effectual expedient employed by Alfred, for the encouragement of learning, was his own example, and the constant assiduity with which, notwithstanding the multiplicity and urgency of his affairs, he employed himself in the pursuits of knowledge. He usually divided his time into three equal portions: one was employed in sleep, and the refection of his body by diet and exercise; another (v) Besides the courts we have mentioned, there was a superior court, at which the king himself presided; and which, being supposed to contain the collective talents and wisdom of the whole kingdom, was honoured with the appellation of Wittena-gemote, or assembly of wise men. It was the peculiar province of this supreme court to enact laws; establish imposts; decide all questions relative to peace and war; to determine causes of the highest moment; and, finally, to regulate the most important acts of public administration; so that its ostensible authority was equivalent to our present parliaments, and the prerogative of our kings. But as the monarch always proposed the subject of debate which had been previously discussed in the privy council, his influence was considerable; and, indeed, where any question is agitated in the presence of a monarch, whose sentiments are first known, it requires a much greater firmness of mind than is possessed by the largest portion of mankind, to assert that independence of thought and freedom of speech which constitutes the soul of debate.

All archbishops, bishops, abbots, presbyters, aldermen, heretoges, shire-reeves, and judges, were, in virtue of their respective offices, entitled to a seat in the wittena-gemote; all proprietors of land to a certain amount were likewise members of it: but whether the ceorls, or husbandmen, and farmers of inferior property, were allowed this privilege has not been ascertained; though much time and learned labour have been spent in the investigation. Attempts have, indeed, been made to prove that they were represented by their tything men or borsholders, and the traders and mechanics by their portreeves: but no evidence has been adduced that could possibly operate conviction.

When the ceorls had, by succession or industry, increased their property to the amount of the stipulated qualifications, they were declared by an express law to be thanes and members of the wittena-gemote. The qualification was five hydes of land; and all freemen possessed of such an estate, with a church, a bell-house, and manor-place, upon it, were considered as nobles, and entitled to be members. This qualification was probably found to be too small, as it was gradually augmented; till, in the reign of Edward the Confessor, it was fixed at forty hides, or about four thousand acres. The members of the wittena-gemote enjoyed many privileges; and their personal security was specially provided for, both in going to and returning from the assembly, except they were notorious thieves and robbers.

The time of meeting in this national council was entirely arbitrary, depending solely on the king's pleasure: it was therefore extremely irregular, and sometimes several years elapsed without a single meeting taking place; till Alfred established, as a perpetual usage, that the wittena-gemote should meet regular twice a year, and oftener, if occasion should require, "to treat of the government of God's people, how they should keep themselves from sin, live in peace, and receive justice."

(w) That king Alfred only repaired the university of Oxford is an erroneous opinion, which has, however, been adopted by some of our best historians; from a supposition, that learning had been taught in the schools there by the monks of former times; but, in consequence of the troubles which had lately pervaded the kingdom, the knowledge of letters had sunk to so low an ebb, that it might, with equal justice, be said to be almost extinct; but, notwithstanding the above opinion obtained such credit as it did, yet it is abundantly evident, according to Camden, that Alfred founded three halls or schools in Oxford: the first, situated at the end of High Street, for grammarians, was called Little University Hall; the second, in School Street, for philosophy, was stiled Less University Hall; and the third in High Street, to the west of the first, was termed Great University Hall, and is now University College.

(x) With regard to what quantity of land signified by the word hide, Henry of Huntingdon informs us, that it was as much as was sufficient to employ one plough for a year. Some reckon it eighty, others at one hundred, and some even at two hundred acres.

in the dispatch of business; a third in study and devotion; and that he might more exactly measure the hours, he made use of burning tapers of equal length, which he fixed in lanthorns; an expedient suited to that rude age, when the geometry of dialling, and the mechanism of clocks and watches, were totally unknown. And by such a regular distribution of his time, though he often laboured under great bodily infirmities, this martial hero, who fought in person fifty-six battles by sea and land, was able, during a life of no extraordinary length, to acquire more knowledge, and even to compose more books, than most studious men, though blest with the greatest leisure and application, have, in more fortunate ages, made the object of their uninterrupted industry.

Sensible that the people, at all times, especially when their understandings are obstructed by ignorance and bad education, are not much susceptible of speculative instruction, Alfred endeavoured to convey his morality by apologues, parables, stories, apophthegms, couched in poetry; and besides propagating among his subjects, former compositions of that kind, which he found in the Saxon tongue, he exercised his genius in inventing works of a like nature, as well as in translating from the Greek the elegant fables of Æsop. He also gave Saxon translations of Orosius's and Bede's histories; and of Boethius concerning the consolation of philosophy. And he deemed it nowise derogatory from his other great characters of sovereign, legislator, warrior, and politician, thus to lead the way to his people in the pursuits of literature.

Meanwhile, this prince was not negligent in encouraging the vulgar and mechanical arts, which have a more sensible, though not a closer connexion with the interests of society. He invited, from all quarters, industrious foreigners to repeople his country, which had been desolated by the ravages of the Danes. He introduced and encouraged manufactures of all kinds; and no inventor or improver of any ingenious art did he suffer to go unrewarded. He prompted men of activity to betake themselves to navigation, to push commerce into the most remote countries, and to acquire riches by propagating industry among their fellow-citizens. He set apart a seventh portion of his own revenue for maintaining a number of workmen, whom he constantly employed in rebuilding the ruined cities, castles, palaces, and monasteries. Even the elegancies of life were brought to him from the Mediterranean and the Indies; and his subjects, by seeing those productions of the peaceful arts, were taught to respect the virtues of justice and industry, from which alone they could rise. Both living and dead, Alfred was regarded by foreigners, no less than by his own subjects, as the greatest prince after Charlemagne, that had appeared in Europe during several ages, and as one of the wisest and best that had ever adorned the annals of any nation.

Alfred had, by his wife, Ethelswitha, daughter of a Mercian earl, three sons and three daughters. The eldest son, Edmund, died without issue, in his father's life-time. The third, Ethelward, inherited his father's passion for letters, and lived a private life. The second, Edward, succeeded to his power; and passes by the appellation of Edward the Elder, being the first of that name who sat on the English throne.

CHAP. II.

From the Accession of EDWARD THE ELDER to the Death of EDGAR.

EDWARD THE ELDER.

THE beginning of the reign of Edward the Elder was not without trouble; for he met with a competitor in the person of his cousin Ethelwold, son of Alfred's brother Ethelbert. Indeed Ethelwold, according to the generally received doctrine of hereditary right, had a preferable title to the throne than Edward; but Edward was the son of Alfred, a man of great personal merit, and highly esteemed by the people. Ethelwold having collected a body of forces, marched to Winburne in Dorsetshire, which he seized and fortified. He also took possession of Christ Church, in the adjacent county of Hants. The king immediately assembled an army, with which he advanced against his opponent; and his near approach struck such an alarm into the heart of Ethelwold, that he fled by night from Winburne, and hastened beyond the Humber, where the Danes, who had perhaps encouraged him to assert his pretensions, received him with open arms, and proclaimed him their king. To strengthen his interest, he made a voyage to France, where he remained some years, during which he was employed in collecting a host of turbulent adventurers, who had emigrated from the coasts of the Baltic to seek their fortunes in the more southern parts of Europe. With this force he re-embarked for England, and landed on the eastern coast in the year 904.

The kingdom was now threatened with a renewal of those disorders from which it had been relieved by the courage and wisdom of Alfred. Ethelwold, being joined by a great number of Danes from the provinces of East-Anglia and Northumberland, advanced into the heart of Mercia, and ravaged it with great fury. The king had no sooner levied an army, in 905, than he marched in pursuit of the enemy, who had retreated into East-Anglia. He retaliated their devastations, by a similar treatment of the Danish districts in that province: but not meeting with the hostile army, he ordered all his troops to retire. The Kentishmen, however, from an avidity of spoil, disobeyed the royal commands, and were surprised by the forces of Ethelwold, with whom they fought a desperate battle near Bury, in which they lost several men of rank, as well as the victory. On the side of the enemy, Ethelwold himself, a Danish prince named Eoric, and some of the chief officers of the army, lost their lives.

The valour of the Kentishmen having thus put an end to the competition of Ethelwold, the king concluded a peace with the East-Anglian and Northumbrian Danes in 906: but this accommodation was not of long continuance; for the turbulent infidelity of the Danes violated the treaty, and entailed on them the resentment of Edward, who sent a strong army, in 909, into Northumberland, which committed great slaughter and depredation. In the succeeding year, the king equipped a hundred sail, which he dispatched towards the Northumbrian coasts. The Danes, instead of defending these coasts, poured into Mercia in a numerous body, with a view of indemnifying themselves by the richer spoils of that province, for what they might lose by the descent of Edward's forces. The king, foreseeing the probability of this irruption, had prepared to defeat the purposes for which it was intended. An English army suddenly attacked the plunderers as they were returning to the northward; and a desperate conflict ensued, in which several thousand Danes were slain, among whom were many distinguished officers. All the booty which the enemy had acquired, was recovered by the victors; and the Danes of Northumberland were so weakened by the effects of this engagement, that they gave little molestation to Edward during the remainder of his reign.

That the country might be the less exposed to the insults of the Danes, Edward pursued that policy which his father had adopted, of fortifying the principal towns in his dominions. In these works of defence, he was cordially seconded by his sister Ethelfleda, who, superior to the ordinary occupations of female life, shone in the manly characters of warrior and politician. She had by this time lost her husband Ethelred, whom she succeeded, in 912, in the government of Mercia. She defended this province with great success both against the Danes and Welsh, and erected a considerable number of towns and castles in different parts of it.

After a few years of desultory incursions from small parties of Danes, over whom the English were usually victorious, a strong body of Scandinavian adventurers, who had been plundering the coasts of Bretagne, sailed towards this island, and entered the Bristol Channel. In 918 they landed in Wales, and prosecuted their predatory course as far as Erchenfield in Herefordshire; but were at length, in 919, encountered by the forces of the neighbouring shires, routed with great slaughter, and compelled to give hostages for their speedy departure out of the realm. Before they complied with this agreement, they landed in the county of Somerset, where the king had taken such precautions for the security of the coast, that they were defeated in two descents, and so effectually disappointed in their hopes of success against the English, that they made a descent on the coast of Ireland.

On the death of Ethelfleda, in 920, who seems, as well as her husband, to have possessed over the Mercians an authority superior to that of an ordinary governor, and approaching to that of a palatine, her daughter Elfwina inherited her extensive demesnes, and testified an inclination to connect herself in marriage with a Danish prince; a measure measure which would have proved dangerous to Edward's power. He therefore resolved to act a bold and politic part, and marching with a body of forces into the Mercian province, in 921, took possession of its principal towns and fortresses, as well as the person of Elfwina, and subjected it to his immediate government.

The active reign of this prince was distinguished by further exertions for the extension of his power, and the chastisement of his enemies. He reclaimed to a due subordination, by force of arms, the revolted Danes of East-Anglia and Northumberland, and exacted from them a renewal of the oath of allegiance which they had taken to Alfred. By a fortunate expedition to the westward of the Severn, he repressed the inroads of the Welsh, and compelled them to yield to his authority. He reduced the Britons of Strathcluyd to a dependent state; and is said to have received the submissions of Constantine king of Scotland: so that he exceeded his father in regal supremacy and extent of territory.

Satiated with glory and success, Edward died in 925, in the vigour of his age, at Farringdon in Berks, after a reign of twenty-four years, and was buried at Winchester. In courage and military skill, he was equal to his illustrious parent; and though his mind was less adorned by nature, and less cultivated by study, than that of Alfred, he possessed a sufficient share of sagacity and prudence to follow the plan of government which that prince had established. He is the reputed founder of the university of Cambridge, to which he is said to have transplanted several of the Oxonian professors (y). Some of his laws are yet extant (z).

ATHELSTAN.

GREAT were the hopes entertained of this prince, who in his infancy, had been particularly distinguished by his grandfather Alfred, had received the honour of knighthood from that monarch, and had been educated under the eye of his aunt Ethelfleda and her Mercian consort. He was crowned at Kingston soon after the death of Edward, in 925, amidst the general acclamations of the people. His accession, however, in 926, was disturbed by the intrigues of a nobleman named Alfred, who alledged the illegitimacy of his birth as a reason for endeavouring to depose him, and place his brother Edwin on the throne. Their design, however, being discovered, Alfred, the chief conspirator, was seized and brought to trial; but the evidence adduced to prove his guilt being insufficient to convict him, his offer to assert his innocence by oath in the presence of the pope was accepted, and he was accordingly sent to Rome. The oath was administered by John, who was then vested with the papal dignity; and Alfred had no sooner taken it than he fell into convulsions, of which he expired in three days. A stronger indication of his guilt could not have been offered to the sovereign pontiff, who ordered the body to be placed in the English college till he knew whether Athelstan would allow it Christian burial. The king, well pleased at the news of his death, immediately confiscated his estate, as if he had been really convicted of treason, and bestowed it on the monastery of Malmesbury; taking special care that all the particulars of this superstitious transaction should be inserted in the grant (a).

Though the spirit of activity and enterprize which had appeared in Athelstan during the reign of the late king, might have been deemed sufficient to awe the turbulence of the Danish colonists into peace and submission, those of Northumberland began to shake off the English yoke. Athelstan marched into that province, and endeavoured to conciliate the affections of the Danes by bestowing one of his sisters, named Editha, in marriage, on Sithric, their principal leader, and by permitting him to assume the title of king of the Northumbrians. The Danish prince at the same time embracing Christianity, preserved his fidelity to the English sovereign till his death, which happened in 927, within the space of a few months after his nuptials. Anlaf and Guthfred, his sons by a former wife, seized the reins of government, and made an open declaration of their independence on Athelstan: but on the approach of an English army, they thought it prudent to abandon their country; and Anlaf fled for refuge to Ireland, while his brother retired to the court of Constantine, king of Scotland, to whom messengers were immediately dispatched by the English king, requesting that Guthfred might be delivered into his hands. Constantine, unwilling to violate the rights of hospitality, for some time resisted the solicitations of Athelstan; but, when these solicitations were converted into menaces, prudence dictated an apparent compliance; and a promise was accordingly made to give up his guest, though without the least intent of performance: for Guthfred, apprized by the Scottish king of the danger that threatened him, made his escape. Constantine, to appease the fury of a monarch whose power he dreaded, proposed an interview with Athelstan, which took place at Dackers, in Cumberland, in 928; where a compromise was effected, apparently to their mutual satisfaction. But, while Constantine was thus outwardly on friendly terms with Athelstan, he felt a strong inclination to clip the aspiring wings of so powerful a neighbour, and readily entered into a confederacy for that purpose with Eugenius prince of Cumberland, and Anlaf, the son of Sithric, (or, as others say, an Hibernian chief of the same name.) The knowledge of this combination produced an invasion of Scotland, in 934, from Athelstan, whose fleet terrified the coasts of that kingdom, while his army ravaged the inland parts. Constantine was so intimidated by the progress of the English in his dominions, that he is said to have purchased peace by doing homage for his kingdom (b).

While Athelstan was acquiring an increase of glory by the humiliation of his enemies, his domestic repose was disturbed, in 938, by the intervention of an unfortunate circumstance, which is thus related by Brompton: A nobleman, who entertained a professed enmity to Edwin, the king's brother, accused that prince of being concerned in the conspiracy of Alfred; and Athelstan, affording too ready an attention to this ill-grounded accusation, resolved to operate his destruction. Fearing, however, to expose himself to popular indignation by a public execution, he ordered his unfortunate brother to be placed in a boat without rudder or sails, and committed to the fury of the waves. Edwin, who strenuously asserted his innocence, finding his supplications for mercy were fruitless, patiently resigned himself to his fate; and, seeing his destruction was inevitable, hastened its period by casting himself headlong into the sea (c).

During these transactions, a fresh storm was gathering in the north; for, as soon as Athelstan returned to England, Anlaf and Constance had formed a project to renew their confederacy; and, as they exerted the utmost caution, and observed the most profound secrecy, their preparations did not suffer interruption from premature discovery. At the expiration of four years, they were amply prepared for a formidable invasion, and Anlaf, with a considerable body of Danish pirates whom he had found hovering on the Irish coast, having joined Constantine, whose troops were already united to those of the Welsh and Britons under Ewen, the confederate army marched into England in 938. Athelstan, (y) This point is disputed by some of the Oxford writers, who will not allow that any university was erected at Cambridge before the reign of Henry I. But setting aside the chimerical notions of those who would make Cantaber, a Spaniard, the founder four centuries before Christ, it is evident, from the best authorities, that Edward the Elder was the principal founder of this university.

(z) This prince had three natural children by Egwina, a young maiden of remarkable beauty and accomplishments, though of humble birth: Athelstan, the eldest, who succeeded him in the throne; Alfred, who died before his father, and a daughter, by some named Editha, and by others Beatrix.

He had likewise two wives; by the first of which, Elfleda, daughter of Elfhelm, a Saxon earl, he had two sons: Ethelwald, who died just before his father, and Edwin. She also bore him six daughters, two of whom were nuns; two were married to Charles the Simple, and Hugh Capet, kings of France; a fifth to Otho, emperor of Germany; and the youngest to Louis the Blind, king of Provence.

By his second wife he had two sons, Edmund and Edred, who successively reigned in England; and two daughters, one a nun, and the other married to a foreign prince.

(a) This story has the assertion of William of Malmesbury, lib. ii. cap. 6. for its authority.

(b) This last circumstance is strenuously denied by the Scotch, and as firmly supported by the English historians. The contest is of little importance; for, whether the fact be ascertained or confuted, neither honour nor disgrace can possibly accrue to the inhabitants of either nation. But if we consider the respective strength of the two monarchs, we must certainly conclude that an exaction of homage was likely to be made by the one, and submitted to by the other. Indeed, both parties agree that Constantine was indebted for the preservation of his crown to the submission he made: and, it is scarcely probable that a victorious monarch, who conceived himself injured, should be contented with a simple apology from the aggressor, a cession of territory, or acknowledgement of superiority, were the only marks of submission that could be required or accepted; and, as the former was not made, it is fair to presume that the latter was imposed.

(c) The authenticity of this account, however, is questioned by Malmesbury; and, by some authors, the whole event is treated as a fiction. Huntingdon, indeed, remarks, that Edwin perished at sea; but mentions his death as an accident that was much lamented by Athelstan.

who had foreseen this storm, met the invaders in the northern part of his kingdom; and a general conflict ensued, which continued, with no intermission of sanguinary fury, from morning till night (d). The slaughter was great on both sides, five petty princes being killed on the part of the allies, and seven chieftains, with many thousands of inferior combatants; while, on the side of the English, two princes of the blood, and a considerable number of men, fell victims to the rage of war. A complete victory attended the arms of Athelstan, who, in company with his brother Edmund, led the West-Saxons to the attack, Turketul, his chancellor or secretary, commanding the other division of his army. Though the king displayed a great degree of intrepidity and martial skill, the fortune of the day was principally attributed to the prowess of Turketul. Constantine and Anlaf effected their escape from the field of battle, with a small party of the powerful host which they had brought with them.

Athelstan pursued his victory by reducing some parts of Scotland, as well as a portion of the Cambrian principality. He also recovered the full subjection of the English Danes; and turning his course into Wales, compelled the chief prince of that country to pay him an annual tribute. His next expedition was into the county of Devon, in 939, whence he expelled the Britons, whom he forced to confine themselves to the province of Cornwall.

A perfect tranquillity pervaded the remainder of the reign of Athelstan, whose fame was now diffused over the continent, as one of the most illustrious princes of his time. He died at Gloucester, without issue, in 941, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and the sixteenth of his reign, and was buried at Malmesbury. He had acquired the reputation of a liberal and enlightened monarch, an able and politic governor, an enterprising warrior, and a wise legislator. He was the patron of learning, arts, and commerce; and was so distinguished by his munificence to the church, that the monastic writers, bestow on him the most extravagant encomiums.

Several useful laws were enacted under his auspices; and the two following in particular, are such as merit the praise of all who are friends either to learning or commerce. One is, that whoever made such progress in erudition as to be entitled to priest's orders, should enjoy all the privileges of a thane or nobleman; the other, that the same privileges should belong to a merchant who had made three voyages over the high seas, with his own ship and cargo. This prince is reported to have employed some learned Jews in translating the Old Testament into the Saxon language.

EDMUND I.

EDMUND, the brother of Athelstan, succeeded him on the throne, in 941. The Danes, taking the opportunity of a new king's accession, now renewed those troubles which had so frequently agitated the kingdom. They gladly received Anlaf, who had resided in Ireland since the battle of Brunanburgh, and who, returning from that country as soon as he had heard of the decease of Athelstan, took possession of York, in 942, and was proclaimed king by the Northumbrians. He then marched into Mercia, where the Five-burghers, or those Danes who had been settled by Alfred the Great in the towns of Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, Leicester, and Stamford, willingly espoused his cause, and assisted him in his depredations. Edmund advanced against him with an army, and compelled the revolters to sue for peace. He punished the five-burghers by depriving them of their towns, and removing them from the centre of his kingdom into places where their rebellious attempts would be less injurious.

The Northumbrians not adhering to their stipulations of peace, Edmund again found it necessary to have recourse to arms. He reduced them with great facility to external submission, in 944, and expelled their princes Anlaf and Reginald. His next enterprize was equally successful: the objects of it were the Cambrian and Strath-cluyd Britons, who had frequently co-operated with the enemies of the English. He subdued the territories of these descendants of the ancient Britons; and having deposed their prince, in 945, conferred the principality on Malcolm king of Scotland, on condition that he and his successors should do homage for it to the sovereigns of England, and assist him against the Danes, both by land and sea.

Edmund had struck such terror into his enemies by his prowess and vigour, that his subjects flattered themselves, in idea, with a series of peaceful years under his sway; and the justice, prudence, and sagacity, which he had manifested in his civil administration, gave them hopes that this season of peace would be accompanied with prosperity and happiness. But the event did not realise these pleasing expectations; for an extraordinary incident occurred, which deprived them of their king after a very short reign, while he was yet in the flower of his age. He was celebrating the festival of St. Augustine in his villa at Pucklechurch, in the county of Gloucester, in 948, with a party of his nobles, when one Leolf, who had formerly been banished for his robberies, entered the hall, and took his seat among the guests, most of whom were inflamed with liquor. Edmund recognised this delinquent, and was so enraged at the audacious intrusion of the wretch who had forfeited the protection of the laws, that he sprung from his seat, seized the ruffian by the hair, and laid him prostrate. Leolf having entangled himself with the king so as to occasion his falling over him, hastily drew a dagger, and pierced the royal bosom with the utmost force. Edmund immediately expired, in the eighth year of his reign, and was buried at Glastonbury; while his retinue, roused from their inattention by this sudden catastrophe, hewed Leolf in pieces, but not before he had wounded several of the assailants.

This prince promulgated some beneficial laws, among which were the following, viz. 1. That the oldest member of a gang of thieves should not be redeemed from death, as before, by paying his wiregild, or the price at which the law valued his life, but should be punished with hanging. 2. That a murderer should be the sole object of the enmity and resentment of the kindred of the murdered person; and that any one who should take revenge, for a murder, on the relatives of the assassin, by prosecution or other mode, should forfeit all his property. The latter statute was designed to prevent those lasting feuds which had so often embroiled the whole kindred of a murderer with the family and connexions of the person whom he had slain.

EDRED.

AS Edwy and Edgar, the sons of Edmund, were still in their infancy, their father's age not having exceeded twenty-five years at his death, his brother Edred, the only surviving son of Edward the Elder, ascended the throne, in 948, with the approbation of the wittena-gemote. In the first year of his reign, he led an army into the Northumbrian province, where the Danes, on the death of Edmund, had testified a desire of independence. The terror of the English arms extorted from them the most plausible declarations of submission; and all their nobles swore allegiance to Edred, by the medium of Turketul, his kinsman and secretary, the person who had so greatly contributed to the signal victory at Brunanburgh, and who afterwards was abbot of the monastery of Croyland. At the same time Malcolm king of Scotland did homage for the Cambrian principality to the new king of England.

The Northumbrians, averse to the English yoke, conferred the royal title on one Eric, against whom Edred marched with a full determination of severely punishing those restless barbarians. In 952 he carried slaughter and devastation into the heart of their province; but he does not appear to have taken measures for the dethroning of the Danish king, whom he perhaps suffered to reign as his vassal. As he was returning into Wessex, his rear was attacked by a body of Danes, who suddenly rushed from York, and cut off many of his troops. Edred was so enraged at this unexpected assault, that he prepared for the most exemplary vengeance on the whole province; but his anger was appeased by an embassy of Northumbrian nobles, who made him valuable pecuniary presents, renewed their promises of subjection, and consented to expel Eric from their throne, and to receive an English governor. Their submissions being accepted by Edred, he placed English garrisons in their chief towns, and appointed Osulf to the government of their territory, under the title of earl of Northumberland.

(d) William of Malmesbury relates on this occasion, a remarkable anecdote. Before the battle, Anlaf, in the disguise of an itinerant musician, reconnoitred the English camp, and procured an introduction into the royal tent. His performance before the king gained him a pecuniary reward; but his unseasonable pride produced a discovery of his person. As he was putting into the ground the money he had received, (for, as a prince, he disdained to keep what he had earned as a minstrel,) he aroused the suspicions of one of Athelstan's soldiers, who had once served under Anlaf himself, and who now recognised his former master. The honour of the soldier would not suffer him to betray one to whom he had sworn allegiance. He therefore did not communicate his observations to Athelstan till the pretended minstrel had accomplished a safe retreat. He then advised the king to remove his tent, as it was dangerous to continue a station against which Anlaf would doubtless direct his principal attack. Athelstan complying with this counsel, the spot which he left was soon occupied by a bishop, who brought a reinforcement to the army. The ensuing night, Anlaf penetrated into the English camp with a chosen body, and reaching the part where he had seen the king, slew the unfortunate prelate, and all his followers. This attack brought on a general action at day-break, the scene of which was Brunanburgh, a place supposed to have been in the county of Northumberland.

From this time Edred sunk into a superstitious indolence, which was increased by his infirm state of health. Dunstan, abbot of Glastonbury, who had been in high favour with the late king, took advantage of the bigotry of his present sovereign to insinuate himself into such a degree of power, that he acted as the minister of Edred both in spiritual and temporal government. Fortified with this influence over the king, he, under the pretence of rigid piety, endeavoured, with some success, to introduce into the church of England the practice of strict celibacy, which the Roman pontiffs had for a long time been extremely eager to establish throughout the Christian church, with a view of augmenting their own power, as heads of the hierarchy, by detaching the clergy from secular interests, and rendering them more independent of the civil magistrates. The attempts of Dunstan and other ecclesiastics towards the accomplishment of this point, occasioned violent disturbances in the kingdom. He commenced his grand scheme with the expulsion of the married clergy from his own abbey of Glastonbury; for the monasteries had hitherto been the promiscuous receptacles both of single and married devotees. He took all opportunities of inveighing against the libertinism of those churchmen who indulged themselves in the luxury of the nuptial bed, representing all amorous intercourse as a degradation of that dignity of manners, and that purity of life, which ought to be conspicuous in the conduct of such as had destined themselves to the ministry of the gospel, and the exclusive practice of religious duties. The absurdity of this doctrine, and its repugnance to one of the strongest passions of our nature, did not prevent it from operating with considerable influence on the bigotry and enthusiasm so prevalent among the clergy of those times.

While Dunstan was thus employed, Edred fell a victim to a disorder which had reduced him to a state of langour and emaciation, November 23, 955, in the tenth year of his reign, and was buried at Winchester. He was a prince of courage and capacity; but his general merit was tarnished by that superstition which the monastic writers considered as his best quality. Though he left two sons, Bertfrid and Elfred, his nephew Edwy ascended the throne without opposition.

EDWY.

THIS prince's reign was short, turbulent, and unhappy; about the time of his accession, in 955, he espoused Ethelgiva, notwithstanding the dissuasions of his ecclesiastical counsellors, who reprobated the match as unlawful, the consanguinity between the parties being such as to authorize a prohibition by the canon law. This step excited the displeasure of the more rigid monks, who warmly exclaimed against their sovereign's impiety. Edwy had too much sensibility not to resent the seditious clamours of the monkish fraternities, and too much penetration not to discern the hypocrisy of their character. It was not therefore to be expected, that he would countenance the hostilities which they had now declared against the married clergy, whom they strove to eject from all the monastic foundations, as having devoted themselves, by matrimony to a secular life.

The king's resentment against the monks was highly inflamed by an insult which he received from their two chief patrons on the day appropriated to his coronation. From the hall in which his nobles were feasting, he retired into his wife's apartment, where, in company with her mother, he enjoyed the attractions of female conversation. Dunstan affected to be shocked at the lascivious disposition of his royal master, and resolved to intrude on his privacy. Attended by Odo, archbishop of Canterbury, he boldly entered the room to which the king had withdrawn, reproved the effeminacy of Edwy and the wantonness of Ethelgiva, forced him from her arms, and triumphantly brought him back into the hall as a culprit.

Edwy, for the present, patiently endured this gross affront, though he was eager to revenge his insulted dignity on the arrogant Dunstan and his monkish partizans. As the haughty abbot had been entrusted by Edred with the management of the treasury, and was supposed to have misused great portions of the public money, Edwy ordered him to give an account of the sums which had passed through his hands. Dunstan replied, that whatever he had expended, as treasurer, had been paid by order of his late sovereign; and that, therefore, no inquiry ought to be instituted on the subject. The king, unwilling to admit this apology, accused the abbot of mal-administration, and commanded him to quit the kingdom, in 956 (e).

In the absence of Dunstan, archbishop Odo was the grand patron of rebellion: he sent a party of soldiers into the royal palace, who seized the queen, and conducted her to him; when that abandoned prelate, having previously burned her face with an iron which he had heated for the purpose, that he might destroy that fatal beauty to which he attributed the seduction of Edwy, conveyed her by force into Ireland, where he left her with peremptory orders never to return. His vengeance not being satiated by this act of savage barbarity, he pronounced a formal divorce between Edwy and his unfortunate consort, who was not yet exempted from the fatal effects of ecclesiastical rancour, being doomed to experience a catastrophe which, so long as the page of history shall be read, will not only excite the most indignant horror against the immediate perpetrator, but reflect eternal infamy on the age in which it could be suffered to pass with impunity.

In the mean time, the monks were straining every nerve to disseminate through the kingdom a spirit of disaffection and revolt; and their efforts were attended with success in the provinces of Mercia and Northumberland. The insurgents prevailed on Edgar, the king's brother, a youth of thirteen years of age, to put himself at their head. The Mercians were so eager to shake off their allegiance to Edwy, that their states were assembled, and Edgar was solemnly acknowledged as their king. Edwy was unable to resist the torrent of misfortune which now rushed upon him; for, though the West-Saxons still adhered to him, he was too weak to make head against the revolters, who at length, in 957, gained over to the side of Edgar the inhabitants of all England to the northward of the Thames.

Soon after this revolution, Dunstan re-appeared in his native country, having been recalled from his exile by Edgar, who found it expedient to comply with the prejudices of the monks, as he was indebted to their powerful support for his sudden elevation from the rank of a subject to that of a sovereign. He rewarded the sufferings of this pious abbot with the bishopric of Winchester, and admitted him to a great store of his confidence.

Edwy could not reflect on the triumph of monkish revenge without feeling the most sensible mortification. He was himself deprived of the major part of his dominions, when he had committed no crime that merited such treatment from his subjects. He had been compelled to separate from the object of his warmest affection, for a trivial irregularity in his marriage with her; and his sorrows were augmented by the unjustifiable cruelties exercised on this unhappy princess after her return from banishment.

The wounds inflicted on that amiable princess, with the malicious intent of defacing her beauty, being perfectly cured, and their expected effect defeated by a total obliteration of the scars, she resolved to return to England; and was flying on the wings of affection to the embraces of Edwy, whom she still regarded as her lawful husband, when a band of ruffians, employed by Odo to observe her motions, intercepted her flight, and seized her at Gloucester. The imperious primate determined to punish this instance of disobedience to his will with a severity adapted to his mind: and, though death in its common garb would have appeared sufficiently terrible to satiate the vengeance of a less dignified persecutor, the rancour of Odo, the mighty patron of monastic bigotry, the bosom-friend of Dunstan, required him to be clothed in additional horrors. In com(e) Every reader who is acquainted with the principal features which marked the character of the monks, will readily conclude, that their whole order poured forth the most virulent invectives against the tyranny and injustice of Edwy, in banishing their great friend and most active supporter. How great then must have been their clamours, when the king restored the married ecclesiastics to the convents from which they had been expelled by the arts of Dunstan, and ejected those monks which had been lately substituted in their place!

pliance with his commands, the villains, proceeded, with relentless inhumanity, to ham-string her; and her lovely body, whose charms would have roused the embers of pity in the most frigid breast, and enforced compassion from the most obdurate, was barbarously mangled, and left to writhe in excruciating torments for the space of three days before the unhappy victim expired, in 958 (f).

A continued reflection on the injuries which he had sustained as a king and as a lover, and on the success of fanatical hypocrisy over the common sense of his people, had such an effect on the frame of Edwy, that he did not survive the mutilation of his territories above two years. He died of a broken heart, October 1, 959, before he had attained the age of twenty-one years, and was buried at Winchester, after a reign of four years and some months, leaving the undivided sovereignty of England in the hands of Edgar.

The character of Edwy has been roughly handled by the monkish historians, who could distinguish no merit or virtues in any sovereign that had the spirit to resist the insolence and the encroachments of their order. A secular priest, however, has ventured to bestow the tribute of praise on his memory, by remarking, that he governed his dominions in a laudable manner; that the kingdom flourished under his sway; but that his prosperous beginning was interrupted by an immature death.

EDGAR.

EDGAR succeeded his brother Edwy in 959, at the age of sixteen. The turbulence of the last reign was followed by a long season of tranquillity, which was derived from the following causes. The monks, who had embroiled the administration of Edwy by their malicious calumnies and treasonable arts, found so steady a patron in his politic brother, that they had no inducement to disturb the peace of the community. But the principal cause of the calm which pervaded Edgar's reign, was his own undeviating attention to every circumstance that could secure to his subjects the blessings of peace; a conduct by which he obtained the epithet of the Pacific. He was convinced that the most effectual means of preventing either domestic insurrections or foreign invasions, would be, to keep not only the internal, but also the maritime parts of his kingdom, in a posture of defence. With this view, he quartered a strong body of well-disciplined troops in those parts of his dominions where he had most reason to apprehend occasional commotions. He established a greater navy than any English monarch that preceded him, which he divided into three squadrons, one stationed on the eastern coasts, another on the western, and a third on the northern (g). These squadrons were accustomed to sail every summer along the coasts and in the narrow seas, each meeting the other, and then returning to its former station; by which means the English commerce met with constant protection, and pirates or invaders were deprived of all opportunities of a descent.

Besides this attention to the defence of the country, Edgar took the most prudent precaution for the impartial administration of justice throughout his territories. He made an annual visitation of the different provinces, that he might inquire into the conduct of the magistrates, punish such as had given corrupt decisions, and redress the grievances which the poor might have suffered from the oppression of the opulent. He also enacted a law, imposing a considerable mulct on any magistrate who should pronounce an unjust or illegal sentence, unless it appeared to have arisen from a defect of judicial knowledge; and, if such want of skill or judgement should be clearly evident, the same law ordained, that he should be dismissed from his office (h).

In the affairs of the church Edgar was principally directed by the counsels of Dunstan, now archbishop of Canterbury, who, in conjunction with two other zealous advocates of the monks, Ethelwald and Oswald, bishops of Winchester and Worcester, carried into general effect the plan which the pope had so much at heart, for purging the monasteries and cathedrals of all ecclesiastics who refused to adopt a life of celibacy, and take the rigid vows of the Benedictine order, Edgar entered with affected zeal into the views of this triumvirate; and, in a general council, held in 960, of the prelates, and the heads of the religious orders. He inveighed against the dissolute lives of the secular clergy; the smallness of their tonsure, which it is probable, maintained no longer any resemblance to the crown of thorns; their negligence in attending the exercise of their functions; their mixing with the laity in the pleasures of gaming, hunting, dancing, and singing; and their openly living with concubines, by which it is commonly supposed he meant their wives. He then turned himself to Dunstan the primate; and, in the name of Edred, whom he supposed to look down from heaven with indignation against all those enormities, addressed him to the following purport: "It was by your advice, O Dunstan, that I founded monasteries, built churches, and expended my treasure in the support of religion and religious houses. You were my counsellor and my assistant in all my schemes; you were the director of my conscience: to you I was obedient in all things. When did you call for supplies which I refused you? Was my assistance ever wanting to the poor? Did I deny support and establishments to the clergy and convents? Did I not hearken to your instructions, who told me that these charities were, of all others, the more grateful to my Maker, and fixed a perpetual fund for the support of religion? And are all our pious endeavours now frustrated by the dissolute lives of the priests? Not that I throw any blame on you: you have reasoned, besought, inculcated, inveighed: but it now behoves you to use sharper and more vigorous remedies; and conjoining your spiritual authority with the civil power, to purge effectually the temple of God from thieves and intruders." It is easy to imagine, that this harangue had the desired effect; and that, when the king and prelates thus concurred with the popular prejudices, it was not long before the monks prevailed, and established their new discipline in almost all the convents.

While Dunstan and his two associates were actively engaged, in 970, in what they regarded as the reformation of the monasteries, their royal patron was promoting the arts of peace, and extending his authority, without the effusion of blood, over the other princes of the island. He is said to have received the submissions of the king of Scotland, the prince of Cumberland, the king of Man and the Isles, and all the princes of Wales; and to this pompous list several of the Hibernian chieftains are added by some historians. Though we ought to admit, with some reserve, the affirmations of Edgar's panegyrists, who, from a reverential gratitude to the memory of such a munificent benefactor of the monks, might be disposed to emblazon and exaggerate his regal superiority, there is reason to doubt that the vigour of his preparations, and the fame of his power and policy, might enable him to assert his empire over the various princes of Britain, as they were respectively so much inferior to him in extent of territory and strength of dominion. In 973, eight of his princely vassals are reported to have attended him at Chester, and to have rowed his barge on the river Dee, while he sat at the helm (i). This has been considered as a frolic; but Edgar might wish (f) Thus miserably perished the wretched Ethelgiva, over whose fate the most rigid virtue may shed the tear of regret without fear of degredation, as her errors, if such they can be called, sprang from the most natural, if not the most noble, of all human passions; while her virtues were of ample magnitude to claim respect and command esteem. The detested assassin calls for an equal tribute of justice with the unhappy victim of his superstitious cruelty; but our language cannot afford an epithet sufficiently expressive of abhorrence to convey those sentiments which the conduct of Odo must naturally inspire.

(g) Most of our ancient historians have magnified the number of Edgar's ships to an amount that is far from being credible. Brompton makes his naval armament consist of four thousand vessels; Hoveden, Simeon of Durham, and the Mailros Chronicle, compute it at three thousand six hundred; others at three thousand. These accounts are so repugnant to probability, after admitting, in the fullest extent, the flourishing state of the navy at the death of Alfred, and the progressive improvement of it, that we must consider them as a link of that chain of exaggeration which appears in the monkish histories, or rather panegyrics of Edgar's reign. On the other hand, Thorne represents this monarch's fleet as comprehending no more than three hundred ships; a calculation which is perhaps, below the truth. The Saxon Chronicle mentions a fleet equipped by Ethelred II. in the year 1008, to have been greater than any which has ever appeared in the reign of any former king of England; and, as this fleet did not amount to one thousand vessels, we may conclude that Edgar's navy, however blazoned by encomiastic amplification, was inferior in number even to the fourth part of Brompton's calculation.

(h) The good effects of this regulation were speedily felt; and that exemplary distribution of justice which Alfred the Great had established; but which had been in some measure interrupted by the subsequent commotions of the realm, was now restored by the patriotic policy of Edgar.

(i) These princes are supposed to have contributed to the expence of Edgar's navy, on the consideration of his protecting their territories from invasion.

to implicate an idea of his sovereignty over these princes, with the prosecution even of a casual amusement.

The reign of this prince was not protracted to so long a period as might have been expected from the early age at which he mounted the throne. He died July 18, 975, in the thirty-second year of his age, and the sixteenth of his reign; leaving two sons, Edward and Ethelred, and a daughter named Editha; and was buried in Glastonbury church. His character is the theme of extravagant praise with all our ancient historians, one of whom styles him the honour and delight of the English nation, while another calls him a second Solomon, and a third makes no scruple to assert, that he was to the English what Romulus was to the Romans, Cyrus to the Persians, Alexander to the Macedonians, Arsaces to the Parthians, and Charlemagne to the French. They have not only represented him as an admirable politician, but as a very virtuous and religious prince. Such was the strained encomiums of those who received advantages from his villainy: but after-ages, less prepossessed in his favour, have ranked him among more suitable company in a much lower class. Very judicious historians have taken him from the list of saints, whither the monks, his flatterers, had placed him, and have not hesitated to reckon him among the number of the vilest of princes. Thus Burnet, an author of good repute and credit, in his Preface to his History of the Reformation, places him in the same class with Bruinchild and Irene. It is indeed somewhat extraordinary, that one should have been extolled for his virtues by the monks, whose irregularities were so peculiarly opposite to the tenets they enforced. His first transgression of this kind was, the breaking into a convent, carrying off Editha, a nun, by force, and even committing violence on her person. For this act of sacrilege and barbarity, no other penance was enjoined than that he should abstain from wearing his crown for seven years. As for the lady herself, he was permitted to continue his intercourse with her without scandal. There was another mistress of Edgar's, named Elfleda the Fair, with whom he formed a connection, by a kind of accident. For being at the house of one of his nobles, and fixing his affections on the nobleman's daughter, he privately requested that the young lady should pass that very night with him. The lady's mother knowing his power, and the impetuosity of his temper, prevailed upon her daughter seemingly to comply with his request; but, in the mean time substituted a beautiful domestic in the young lady's place. In the morning, when the king perceived the deceit, instead of being displeased at the stratagem, he expressed pleasure in the adventure; and transferring his love to Elfleda, as the damsel was called, she became his favourite mistress, and maintained an ascendancy over him till his marriage with Elfrida. The story of this lady is too remarkable to be passed over in silence.

Edgar had long heard of the beauty of a young lady, whose name was Elfrida, daughter of Olgar, earl of Devonshire; but unwilling to credit common fame in this particular, he sent Ethelwald, his favourite friend to see, and inform him, if Elfrida was indeed that incomparable woman report had described her. Ethelwald arriving at the earl's, had no sooner cast his eyes upon that nobleman's daughter than he became desperately enamoured of her himself. Such was the violence of his passion, that, forgetting his master's instructions, he solicited only his own interests, and demanded for himself the beautiful Elfrida from her father in marriage. The favourite of a king was not likely to find a refusal; the earl gave his consent, and their nuptials were performed in private. Upon his return to court, which was shortly after, he assured the king, that her riches alone, and her high quality, had been the cause of her admiration, and he appeared amazed how the world could talk so much, and so unjustly of her charms. The king was satisfied, and no longer felt any curiosity, while Ethelwald secretly triumphed in his address. When he had, by this deceit, weaned the king from his purpose, he took an opportunity, after some time, of turning the conversation on Elfrida, representing, that though the fortune of the earl of Devonshire's daughter would be a trifle to a king, yet it would be an immense acquisition to a needy subject. He therefore, humbly entreated permission to pay his addresses to her, as she was the richest heiress in the kingdom. A request so seemingly reasonable, was readily complied with; Ethelwald returned to his wife, and their nuptials was solemnized in public. His greatest care, however, was employed in keeping her from court; and he took every precaution, to prevent her appearing before a king so susceptible of love, while she was so capable of aspiring that passion. But it was impossible to keep his treachery long concealed. Favourites are never without private enemies, who watch every opportunity of rising upon their ruin. Edgar was soon informed of the whole transaction; but dissembling his resentment, he took occasion to visit that part of the country, where this miracle of beauty was detained, accompanied by Ethelwald, who reluctantly attended him thither. Upon coming near the lady's habitation, he told him that he had a curiosity to see his wife, of whom he had formerly heard so much, and desired to be introduced as his acquaintance. Ethelwald, thunder-struck at the proposal, did all in his power, but in vain, to dissuade him. All he could obtain was permission to go before, on pretence of preparing for the king's reception. On his arrival, he fell at his wife's feet, confessed what he had done to be possessed of her charms, and conjuring her to conceal, as much as possible, her beauty from the king, who was but too susceptible of its power. Elfrida, little obliged to him for a passion that had deprived her of a crown, promised compliance; but, prompted either by vanity, or revenge, adorned her person with the most exquisite art, and called up all her beauty on the occasion. The event answered her expectations; the king no sooner saw, than he loved her. The better to effect his intentions, he concealed his passion from the husband, and took leave with a seeming indifference; but his revenge was not the less certain and fatal. Ethelwald was some time after sent into Northumberland, upon pretence of urgent affairs; but the unfortunate earl never performed his journey; for he was found murdered in a wood (k) by the way. Some say, he was stabbed by the king's own hand; others, that he only commanded the assassination; however this be, Elfrida was invited soon after to court, by the king's own order, and their nuptials were performed with the usual solemnity. Thus the murder of Ethelwald seemed, in some measure, to be accounted for.

That Edgar was not without a tincture of cruelty, is further evident from his having ordered the Isle of Thanet to be pillaged and laid waste, because some of the inhabitants had plundered several merchants of York who had touched on the coast; or, as others relate, because his royal rights had been invaded, and his institutions disregarded, by a part of the islanders. In the gratification of his sensual appetites, this boasted saint was irregular and vicious; for he made no scruple of debauching the wives and daughters of his subjects, whenever the impulse of beauty inspired him with libidinous ideas.

This monarch, from motives of policy, encouraged the resort of foreigners to his court; many of whom were induced, by his countenance and persuasion, to fix their residence in England, where they doubtless contributed to the improvements of the arts, and at the same time, in the opinion of some of the early writers, corrupted the manners of the natives; yet historians of a more philosophic turn have concluded that these continental strangers softened the ferocity, and polished the rudeness, of the Anglo-Saxon character; for, though, by the sedulous labours of Alfred, a superior state of civilization had taken place, the effect of his endeavours had not been so permanent as to prevent a relapse (l).

(k) Harewood Forest.

(l) In Edgar's reign, the country was so infested with wolves, that a remedy for this evil became an object worthy of the royal consideration. He not only converted the legal punishment of particular offences into an obligation upon the criminal to produce, by a limited time, a certain number of wolves' tongues; but, as great numbers of these voracious animals poured into England from the mountainous parts of Wales, he commuted the tribute of money and cattle, which Athelstan had imposed on the Welsh, into an annual delivery of three hundred wolves' heads. By these means, as well as by the frequent hunting of the wolf in

EDWARD THE MARTYR.

THE accession of this prince met with considerable opposition from the intrigues of his step-mother Elfrida, who wished to raise her own son Ethelred to the throne, though though he was then only seven years of age. The pretensions of this ambitious woman were founded on the supposed illegitimacy of Edward's birth, arising from some circumstances which she insisted were sufficient to invalidate the marriage of Edgar with his mother. Notwithstanding the fallacy of her claims, that influence which she had possessed at court, during the life of her husband had gained her many friends, who were now ready to stand forth in their support. But the title of Edward was supported by many advantages. He was appointed successor by the will of his father: he was approaching to man's estate, and might soon be able to take into his own hands the reins of government: the principal nobility, dreading the imperious temper of Elfrida, were averse to her son's government, which must enlarge her authority, and probably put her in possession of the regency: above all, Dunstan whose character for sanctity had given him great credit with the people, had espoused the cause of Edward, over whom he had already acquired great ascendancy; and he was determined to execute the will of Edgar in his favour. To cut off all opposite pretensions, Dunstan anointed and crowned the young prince at Kingston, in 975; and the whole kingdom, without farther dispute, submitted to his authority.

It was of great importance to Dunstan and the monks, to place on the throne a king favourable to their cause: the secular clergy had still partizans in England, who wished to support them in the possession of the convents, and of the ecclesiastical authority. On the first intelligence of Edgar's death, Alfere, duke of Mercia, expelled the new orders of monks from all the monasteries which lay within his jurisdiction; but Elfwin, duke of East-Anglia, and Brithnoth, duke of the East-Saxons, protected them within their territories, and insisted upon the execution of the late laws enacted in their favour. In order to settle this controversy, several synods were summoned which, according to the practice of those times, consisted partly of ecclesiastical members, partly of the lay nobility. The monks were able to prevail in these assemblies; though, as it appears, contrary to the secret wishes, if not the declared inclination, of the leading men in the nation: they had more invention in forging miracles to support their cause; or having been so fortunate as to obtain, by their pretended austerities, the character of piety, their miracles were more credited by the populace.

In one synod, Dunstan, finding the majority of votes against him, rose up, and informed the audience, that he had that instant received an immediate revelation in behalf of the monks: the assembly was so astonished at this intelligence, or probably so overawed by the populace, that they proceeded no farther in their deliberations. In another synod, held in the old monastery at Winchester in 977, a voice issued from the crucifix, and informed the members, that the establishment of the monks was founded on the will of heaven, and could not be opposed without impiety. But the miracle performed in the third synod, which was held at Calne in Wiltshire, in 978, was still more alarming: the floor of the hall in which the assembly met sunk of a sudden, and a great number of the members were either bruised or killed by the fall. It was remarked, that Dunstan had that day prevented the king from attending the synod, and that the beam, on which his own chair stood, was the only one that did not sink under the weight of the assembly: but these circumstances, instead of begetting any suspicion of artifice, were regarded as the surest proof of the immediate interposition of Providence, in behalf of those favourites of Heaven.

Edward lived four years after his accession, and there passed nothing memorable during his reign. His death alone was memorable and tragical. This young prince was endowed with the most amiable innocence of manners; and as his own intentions were always pure, he was incapable of entertaining any suspicion against others. Though his step-mother had opposed his succession, and had raised a party in favour of her own son, he always shewed her marks of regard, and even expressed, on all occasions, the most tender affection towards his brother. He was hunting one day in Dorsetshire; and being led by the chase near Corfe Castle, where Elfrida resided, he took the opportunity of paying her a visit, unattended by any of his retinue, and he thereby presented her with the opportunity which she had long wished for. Not chusing to dismount, he desired some liquor to be brought him: while holding the cup in his hand, a servant of Elfrida approached him, and stabbed him in the back (m). The prince, finding himself wounded, put spurs to his horse; but becoming faint by loss of blood, he fell from the saddle, his foot stuck in the stirrup, and he was dragged along by his unruly horse till he expired. Being traced by the blood, his body was found, and was privately interred at Wareham by his servants; from whence it was removed to the monastery of Shaftesbury; where, according to the superstition of the times, it wrought innumerable miracles (n).

The regard which this prince testified for the monks, the general innocence and piety of his life, and the complacency of his manners, joined to his tragical death, in the flower of his youth, procured him the epithet of Saint and Martyr.

ETHELRED II.

DUNSTAN, averse to the succession of Ethelred, endeavoured to prevail on Editha, the natural daughter of Edgar, to assume the crown, which, he affirmed, the influence of himself and his friends would enable her to wear in safety. But this offer being declined, he consented to crown Ethelred in 979, though he performed the office with a very ill grace; for, during the ceremony, he pretended to prophecy a long series of calamities that would befall the new king and his people, by way of judgement from Heaven for the murder of the late monarch.

The freedom which England had so long enjoyed from the depredations of the Danes, seems to have proceeded, partly from the establishments which that piratical nation had obtained in the north of France, and which employed all their superfluous hands to people and maintain them; partly from the vigour and warlike spirit of a long race of English princes, who preserved the kingdom in a posture of defence by sea and land, and either prevented or repelled every attempt of the invaders. But a new generation of men being now sprung up in the northern regions, who could no longer disburthen themselves on Normandy; the English had reason to dread that the Danes would again visit an island to which they were invited, both by the memory of their past successes, and by the expectation of assistance from their countrymen, who, though long established in the kingdom, were not yet thoroughly incorporated with the natives, nor had entirely forgotten their inveterate habits of war and depredation. And as the reigning prince was a minor, and even when he attained to man's estate, never discovered either courage or capacity sufficient to govern his own subjects, much less to repel a formidable enemy, the people might justly apprehend the worst calamities from so dangerous a crisis.

The Danes, before they durst attempt any important enterprize against England, made an inconsiderable descent by way of trial; and having landed from seven vessels near Southampton, in 981, they ravaged the country, enriched themselves by spoil, and departed with impunity. In 982, they made a like attempt in Cornwall and Devonshire, and met with the like success. The invaders, having now found affairs in a very different situation from that in which they formerly appeared, encouraged their countrymen to assemble a greater force, and to hope for more considerable advantages. They landed in Essex, in 991, under the command of two leaders, Justin and Guthmund; and having defeated and slain at Maldon, Brithnoth, duke of that country, who ventured, with a small body, to attack them, they spread their devastations over all the neighbouring provinces. In this extremity, Ethelred, to whom historians give the epithet of the Unready, instead of in the way of diversion, an extraordinary diminution of this pest was effected in a few years; but Mr. Hume committed an error in saying, that from the time of Edgar, "the animal has been no more seen in this island:" an assertion which is ill-founded, when confined to England: for it appears that wolves began to multiply, in the reign of Edward I. who issued a mandate to one Peter Corbet to take the most efficacious measures for their extirpation from Gloucestershire and some of the neighbouring counties. After that monarch's reign, it does not appear that any more wolves were seen in England or Wales; but they were not exterminated from North-Britain till the seventeenth century.

(m) This assassination happened in 979.

(n) Elfrida, to extirpate her guilt, had recourse to the usual mode of erecting monasteries. She built one at Ambresbury, in Wiltshire, and another at Worwell, in Northamptonshire: but, finding the good opinion of the public, who were in general too easily duped by the delusion of hypocrisy, irretrievably lost, she submitted to the penance of greater severity, by retiring to the last of these convents, where she passed the remainder of her life in solitary confinement.

rousing his people to defend with courage their honour and their property, hearkened to the advice of Siric, archbishop of Canterbury, which was seconded by many of the degenerate nobility; and paying the enemy the sum of ten thousand pounds, he bribed them to depart the kingdom (o). This shameful expedient was attended with the success which might be expected. The Danes next year appeared off the eastern coast, in hopes of subduing a people who defended themselves by their money, which invited assailants, instead of their arms, which might repel them. But the English, sensible of their folly, had, in the interval, assembled in a great council, and had determined to collect at London a fleet able to give battle to the enemy; though that judicious measure failed of success, from the treachery of Alfric duke of Mercia, whose name is infamous in the annals of that age, by the calamities which his repeated perfidy brought upon his country. This nobleman had, in 983, succeeded to his father, Alfere, in that extensive command; but being deprived of it two years after, and banished the kingdom, he was obliged to employ all his intrigue, and all his power, which was too great for a subject, to be restored to his country, and re-instated in his authority. Having had experience of the credit and malevolence of his enemies, he thenceforth trusted for security, not to his services, or to the affections of his fellow-citizens, but to the influence which he had obtained over his vassals, and to the public calamities, which he thought must, in every revolution, render his assistance necessary. Having fixed this resolution, he determined to prevent all such successes as might establish the royal authority, or render his own situation dependent or precarious. As the English had formed the plan of surrounding and destroying the Danish fleet in harbour, he privately informed the enemy of their danger; and when they put to sea, in consequence of this intelligence, he deserted to them, with the squadron under his command, the night before the engagement, and thereby, disappointed all the efforts of his countrymen. Ethelred, enraged at his perfidy, seized his son Alfgar, and ordered his eyes to be put out. But such was the power of Alfric, that he again forced himself into authority; and though he had given this specimen of his character, and received this grievous provocation, it was found necessary to entrust him anew with the government of Mercia. This conduct of the court, which in all its circumstances is so barbarous, weak, and imprudent, both merited and prognosticated the most grievous calamities.

The northern invaders, now well acquainted with the defenceless condition of England, made a powerful descent in 993, under the command of Sweyn king of Denmark, and Olave king of Norway: they landed at Bamborough in Northumberland, and carried off copious spoils to their vessels; then coasting along, they sailed up the Humber, and spread on all sides their destructive ravages. Many of the Northumbrian Danes joined the confederate kings, against whom an army was at length sent by Ethelred, under the command of three nobles of Danish extraction. When the two armies were on the point of engaging, the three generals of the English forces, unwilling to fight against their northern brethren, fled from the field, and their troops thus deserted, preferred an unmanly flight to the glory of a spirited resistance.

Encouraged by this success, and still more by the contempt which it inspired for their enemy, the piratical Danes ventured to attack the centre of the kingdom; and entering the Thames in ninety-four vessels, laid siege to London in 994, and threatened it with total destruction. But the citizens, alarmed at the danger, and firmly united among themselves, made a bolder defence than the cowardice of the nobility and gentry gave the invaders reason to apprehend; and the besiegers, after suffering the greatest hardships, were finally frustrated in their attempt. In order to revenge themselves, they laid waste Essex, Sussex, and Hampshire; and having there procured horses, they were thereby enabled to spread, through the more inland counties, the fury of their depredations. In this extremity, Ethelred and his nobles had recourse to the former expedient; and sending ambassadors to the two northern kings, they promised them subsistence and tribute, on condition they would, for the present, put an end to their ravages, and soon after depart the kingdom. Sweyn and Olaus agreed to the terms, and peaceably took up their quarters at Southampton, where the sum of sixteen thousand pounds was paid to them. Olaus even made a journey to Andover, where Ethelred resided; and he received the rite of confirmation from the English bishops, as well as many rich presents from the king. He here promised that he would never more infest the English territories; and he faithfully fulfilled the engagement.

This composition brought only a short interval to the miseries of the English. The Danish pirates appeared, in 997, in the Severn; and having committed spoil in Wales, as well as in Cornwall and Devonshire, they sailed round to the south coast, and entering the Tamar, completed the devastation of these two counties. They then returned to the Bristol Channel; and penetrating into the country by the Avon, spread themselves over all that neighbourhood, and carried fire and sword even into Dorsetshire. They next changed the seat of war; and after ravaging the Isle of Wight, they entered the Thames and Medway, and laid siege to Rochester, where they defeated the Kentish men in a pitched battle, in 999. After this victory, the whole province of Kent was made a scene of slaughter, fire, and devastation. The extremity of these miseries forced the English into counsels for common defence both by sea and land; but the weakness of the king, the divisions among the nobility, the treachery of some, the cowardice of others, the want of concert in all, frustrated every endeavour: their fleets and armies either came too late to attack the enemy, or were repulsed with dishonour; and the people were thus equally ruined by resistance or by submission. The English, therefore, destitute both of prudence and unanimity in council, of courage and conduct in the field, had recourse to the same expedient which by experience they had already found so ineffectual: they offered the Danes to buy peace, by paying them a large sum of money. These ravagers rose continually in their demands; and now required the payment of twenty-four thousand pounds (p), to which the English were so mean and imprudent as to submit. The departure of the Danes procured them another short interval of repose, which they enjoyed as if it were to be perpetual, without making any effectual preparations for a more vigorous resistance upon the next return of the enemy.

Besides receiving this sum, the Danes were engaged by another motive to depart a kingdom which appeared so little in a situation to resist their efforts: in the year 1000 they were invited over by their countrymen in Normandy, who at that time were hard pressed by the arms of Robert king of France, and who found it difficult to defend the settlement which, with so much advantage to themselves and glory to their nation, they had made in that country. It is probable also, that Ethelred, observing the close connection thus maintained among all the Danes, however divided in government and situation, was desirous of forming an alliance with that formidable people: for this purpose, being now a widower, he made his addresses to Emma, sister to Richard II. duke of Normandy, and he soon succeeded in his negociation. The princess came over to England, and was married to Ethelred in 1001.

The Danes had been established during a longer period in England than in France; and though the similarity of their original language to that of the Saxons invited them to a more early coalition with the natives, they had hitherto found so little example of civilized manners among the English, that they retained all their ancient ferocity, and valued themselves only on their national character of military bravery. The recent as well as more ancient atchievements of their countrymen, tended to support this idea; and the English princes, particularly Athelstan and Edgar, sensible of that superiority, had been accustomed to keep in pay bodies of Danish troops, who were quartered about the country, and committed many violences upon (o) A Saxon pound usually consisted of about forty-eight shillings, each of which comprehended five Saxon pence; and as a penny was then almost equal in weight to what a silver three-pence would now be, a pound, in those times, nearly amounted to three pounds of our present money; and, if we consider the amazing change produced in the value of money by the much greater plenty of it now in circulation, as well as by the difference between that and the current century in point of population and industry, ten thousand pounds in the reign of Ethelred, must have been at least equivalent to the present sum of three hundred thousand pounds.

(p) About seven hundred and twenty thousand pounds in present value. The occasion for which this money was raised procured it the appellation of Dane-geld; a name which was also given to the money raised for the equipment of fleets against Danish or other pirates. This gave rise to a regular land-tax levied at the rate of twelve pence on every hide of land.

the inhabitants. These mercenaries had attained to such a height of luxury, according to the old English writers, that they combed their hair once a day, bathed themselves once a week, changed their clothes frequently; and by all these arts of effeminacy, as well as by their military character, had rendered themselves so agreeable to the fair sex, that they debauched the wives and daughters of the English, and dishonoured many families. But what most provoked the inhabitants was, that instead of defending them against invaders, they were ever ready to betray them to the foreign Danes, and to associate themselves with all straggling parties of that nation. The animosity between the inhabitants of English and Danish race had, from these repeated injuries, risen to a great height; when Ethelred, from a policy incident to weak princes, embraced the cruel resolution of massacring the latter, throughout all his dominions (q). Secret orders were dispatched to commence the execution every where on the same day; and the festival of St. Brice, which fell on a Sunday, (November 13, 1002,) the day on which the Danes usually bathed themselves, was chosen for that purpose. It is needless to repeat the accounts transmitted concerning the barbarity of this massacre: the rage of the populace, excited by so many injuries, sanctified by authority, and stimulated by example, distinguished not between innocence and guilt, spared neither sex nor age, and was not satiated without the torture as well as death of the unhappy victims. Even Gunilda, sister to Sweyn king of Denmark, who had married earl Paling, and had embraced Christianity, was, by the advice of Edric, earl of Wilts, seized and condemned to death by Ethelred, after seeing her husband and children butchered before her face. This unhappy princess foretold, in the agonies of despair, that her murder would soon be avenged by the total ruin of the English nation.

Never was prophecy better fulfilled: and never did barbarous policy prove more fatal to the authors. Sweyn and his Danes, who wanted but a pretence for invading the English, appeared off the western coast in 1003, and threatened to take full revenge for the slaughter of their countrymen. Exeter fell first into their hands, from the negligence or treachery of earl Hugh, a Norman, who had been made governor by the interest of queen Emma. They began to spread their devastations over the country; when the English, sensible what outrages they must now expect from their barbarous and offended enemy, assembled more early, and in greater numbers than usual, and made an appearance of vigorous resistance. But Ethelred, instead of heading his forces in person, gave the command of them to duke Alfric, whose treachery he had before experienced. The consequence of this injudicious choice was, that, when the two armies met, Alfric feigned a sudden indisposition; and the English were so dejected at the want of a commander, that they retired without encountering the enemy. Sweyn pursued them with little success as far as Wilton, which he plundered and burned. He then made himself master of Old Sarum, to which he set fire, and returned to his ships with considerable booty.

The next year, he changed the seat of war, and made his appearance in Norfolk, where he spread such an alarm by his devastations, that Ufketul, earl of East-Anglia, thought proper to purchase a peace by pecuniary contribution. Sweyn, however, did not long adhere to his stipulations; but, being still bent on revenge, suddenly assaulted Thetford, plundered it, and reduced it to ashes. Ufketul, perceiving that no confidence was to be placed in such perfidious tribes, resolved to make a vigorous opposition. He sent directions to the provincials to attack the Danish fleet in harbour; but want of courage, or perhaps treachery, prevented the execution of these orders. He posted himself and his forces between the Danes and their ships, with a view of intercepting their retreat; and, as soon as they approached him, he charged them with such impetuosity, that they were on the point of being vanquished; but the fortune of the day veering on their side, they effected their return to the fleet, after a desperate conflict.

A great famine, which, in 1005, oppressed the unfortunate English, procured them a remission of Danish irruptions, by inducing Sweyn to return to his native country. This respite, however, continued only for one year; at the expiration of which, in 1006, the horrors of desolation were renewed by a fresh and formidable shoal of adventurers from the Baltic.

Unspeakably wretched was the condition of the English for many successive years from this period. They were robbed and murdered with impunity; many of their principal towns were totally consumed by fire; no place, however sacred; no rank, however exalted; neither the tenderness of infancy, nor the imbecility of age; neither the engaging weakness of the female character, nor the beauty of person with which it is usually accompanied, could soften the destructive rage of the banditti who now assailed the country. Armies were levied, and fleets equipped (r), for the chastisement of the inhuman invaders; but such a want of union prevailed among the English, such a deficiency of judgement appeared in the conduct of their sovereign, and so enormous was the treachery of some of the nobles (particularly Edric Streon, successor of Alfric in the dukedom of Mercia, who had espoused the king's daughter Edgitha,) that every scheme calculated for the defence or deliverance of the kingdom was completely frustrated (s). Though an interval of rest was sometimes procured from the Danes by the payment of large sums (t), which could not be raised without the oppression of the public, respites thus purchased were rendered almost momentary by the rapacious and insatiate perfidy of the enemy. Without detailing the progress of these hostilities, we shall only observe, that, after the Danish ravages had been continued for several years in the absence of Sweyn, he himself returned to England with a strong fleet, in 1013, in firm hopes of subduing a nation already reduced to the brink of ruin. He landed at Sandwich; and, after a short stay in that neighbourhood, sailed to the northward. Entering the mouth of the Humber, he proceeded up the Trent to Gainsborough, where he fixed his station. The terror of his arms, and the attachment of the English Danes to a prince of their original country, produced the immediate submission of the Northumbrians and their governor Uthred: and the East-Angles were soon induced to imitate this example of defection. Having intrusted his fleet to the care of his son Canute, with whom he also left the hostages received from the different tribes which he had compelled the northern inhabitants to provide for his use. He then directed his course to the southward, with a numerous and well-appointed host; and so intimidated, by the barbarity of his ravages, such as were disposed to resist, that he obtained the homage of the people wherever he passed. Oxford, which had been almost ruined by the Danes about four years before, was speedily reduced to subjection; and when he had taken hostages for the fidelity of that town and county, he hastened through Berks into Hampshire, and took easy possession of Winchester. His next object was the metropolis of the kingdom, where the citizens, animated by the presence of Ethelred, exhibited such an intrepid spirit of resistance, that he raised the (q) The universality of this massacre is spoken of by almost all the ancient historians: but when we consider that the Danes were almost the sole inhabitants of the kingdoms of Northumberland and East-Anglia, and very numerous in Mercia, this representation of the matter appears very doubtful. Great resistance must have been made, and violent wars ensued; which was not the case. Wallingford, who supports this latter opinion, must therefore be admitted as the only impartial historian in this circumstance. We are told, that the word Lurdane, (Lord Dane,) for an idle lazy fellow, who lives at other people's expence, came from the conduct of the Danes, who were put to death. But the English princes had been entirely masters for several generations; and only supported a military corps of that nation. It seems probable, therefore, says Hume, that it was these Danes only that were put to death.

(r) In the year 1008, Ethelred procured the enactment of a law, compelling the proprietors of three hundred and ten hides of land to provide one ship of war; a measure so judicious, as to form a contrast to most of the other transactions of his administration. In consequence of this statute, a fleet of near eight hundred sail was soon equipped; but it was rendered useless to the country, partly by the factious and disloyal spirit of the nobles. Saxon Chronicle. There were two hundred and forty-three thousand six hundred hides in England. Consequently the ships equipped must be seven hundred and eighty-five. The cavalry was thirty thousand four hundred and fifty men. Hume.

(s) Edric had impelled his brother Brithric to prefer an accusation of treason against Wolfnoth, governor of Sussex, the father of the famous earl Godwin; and that nobleman, well acquainted with the malevolence as well as power of his enemy, found no means of safety but in deserting with twenty ships to the Danes. Brightric pursued him with a fleet of eighty sail; but his ships being shattered in a tempest, and stranded on the coast, he was suddenly attacked by Wolfnoth, and all his vessels burnt and destroyed. The imbecility of the king was little capable of repairing this misfortune: the treachery of Edric frustrated every plan for future defence; and the English navy, disconcerted, discouraged, and divided, was at last scattered into its several harbours. Hume.

(t) Besides the three payments before mentioned, the English paid their invaders thirty thousand pounds in the year 1007, and forty-eight thousand pounds in 1012, which last sum would be equal to one million four hundred and forty thousand pounds of present money.

siege with some loss, and retired to Bath. Here he was gratified with the submissions of the principal nobility of Wessex, who found themselves unable, in the calamitous situation of the country, to make head against the fierce invader.

Ethelred now relinquished all hopes of maintaining himself on his throne. The greater part of his people had already submitted to the king of Denmark; and there were strong grounds of apprehension, that if he should continue in England he might fall into the hands of that royal barbarian, whom he had too deeply offended to expect from him any marks of kindness or clemency: He therefore left his capital; and, after continuing a short time at Greenwich with a Danish squadron of forty-five vessels, which had submitted to him in the preceding year, he sailed to the Isle of Wight, with an intention of taking refuge in Normandy, whither he had sent before him queen Emma, and her two sons Alfred and Edward. Richard received his unhappy guests with a generosity that does honour to his memory.

The king had not been above six weeks in Normandy, when in 1014, he heard of the death of Sweyn, who expired at Gainsborough, before he had time to establish himself in his newly-acquired dominions. The English prelates and nobility, taking advantage of this event, sent over a deputation to Normandy; invited Ethelred to return to them, expressing a desire of being again governed by their native prince, and intimating their hopes that, being now tutored by experience, he would avoid all those errors which had been attended with such misfortunes to himself and to his people. But the misconduct of Ethelred was incurable; and on his resuming the government, he discovered the same incapacity, indolence, pusillanimity, and credulity, which had so often exposed him to the insults of his enemies. His son-in-law, Edric, notwithstanding his repeated acts of treason, retained such influence at court, as to instil into the king jealousies of Sigefert and Morcar, two of the chief nobles of Mercia: Edric allured them into his house, where he murdered them; while Ethelred participated in the infamy of the action, by confiscating their estates, and thrusting into a convent the widow of Sigefert. She was a woman of singular beauty and merit; and in a visit which was paid her, during her confinement, by prince Edmund, the king's eldest son, she inspired him with so violent an affection, that he released her from the convent, and soon after married her, without the consent of his father.

In the mean time the English found in Canute, the son and successor of Sweyn, an enemy no less terrible than the prince from whom death had so lately delivered them. He ravaged the eastern coast with merciless fury, and put ashore all the English hostages at Sandwich, after having cut off their hands and noses. He was obliged, by the necessity of his affairs, to make a voyage to Denmark; but returning soon after, he continued his depredations along the southern coast: he even broke into the counties of Dorset, Wilts, and Somerset; where an army was assembled against him, under the command of prince Edmund and duke Edric. The latter still continued his perfidious machinations; and after endeavouring in vain to get the prince into his power, he found means to disperse the army; and he then openly deserted to Canute with forty vessels in 1015. Notwithstanding this misfortune, Edmund was not disconcerted; but assembling all the force of England, was in a condition to give battle to the enemy. The king had had such frequent experience of perfidy among his subjects, that he had lost all confidence in them: he remained at London, pretending sickness, but really from apprehensions that they intended to buy their peace, by delivering him into the hands of his enemies. The army called aloud for their sovereign to march at their head against the Danes; and, on his refusal to take the field, they were so discouraged, that those vast preparations became ineffectual for the defence of the kingdom. Edmund, deprived of all regular supplies to maintain his soldiers, was obliged to commit equal ravages with those which were practised by the Danes; and after making some fruitless expeditions into the north, which had submitted entirely to Canute's power, he retired to London, determined there to maintain, to the last extremity, the small remains of English liberty. He here found every thing in confusion by the death of the king, who expired after an unhappy and inglorious reign of thirty-seven years, at the age of forty nine, on the 23rd of April, 1016. He left two sons by his first marriage, Edmund, who succeeded him, and Edwy, whom Canute afterwards murdered. His two sons by the second marriage, Alfred and Edward, were immediately, upon Ethelred's death, conveyed into Normandy by queen Emma.

Notwithstanding the troubles attendant on this reign, many prudent and beneficial laws were enacted during the course of it, calculated for the promotion of social order, and the encouragement of commerce.

EDMUND II. GENERALLY CALLED IRONSIDE.

IMMEDIATELY after his father's death Edmund was proclaimed king by the citizens of London and the nobles assembled there; and his coronation soon afterwards took place, the crown being placed on his head by Livingus archbishop of Canterbury. But the greater part of the English nobility and people, and all the Anglo-Danish colonists, acknowledged Canute as their sovereign; and that prince received, at Southampton, the homage of the principal nobles, prelates, and abbots, who abjured the race of Ethelred. The Dane, in return for these submissions, swore to the assembly, that, both in spiritual and temporal affairs, he would be their faithful lord.

It was supposed that the death of Ethelred would procure a cessation of hostilities; but this was not the case; for Edmund, not in the least dismayed by the success of Canute, was still inspired with the hopes of victory; and the Danish prince, equally courageous and sanguine, panted for the full possession of the English throne. Edmund marched with an army into Wessex, to recover that province from the dominion of his rival; and, by defeating the Danes near Gillingham in Dorsetshire, encouraged several of the West Saxon counties to revert to their rightful sovereign. In the mean time Canute had reached London with his fleet, and had invested that city with all his forces. He caused a deep fosse to be dug round those parts of the town which were not washed by the Thames, to hinder the citizens from being supplied with provisions; and then made many assaults, which, however, were constantly unsuccessful. Having raised the siege, he advanced against Edmund, that he might decide the contest by a general engagement. The two armies met at Sceorstan, where a furious battle commenced, which continued till the approach of night, and was renewed in the morning with fresh vigour. The extraordinary prowess and martial skill of Edmund at length threw the Danish ranks into disorder; and a complete victory would probably have attended the arms of the English prince, if Edric, who commanded a body of troops on the side of the Danes, had not employed artifice to second the efforts of courage. He cut off the head of a soldier who, in his features, resembled Edmund, and, fixing it on the point of his spear, cried out to the English, "Fly, ye wretches! your king is slain: behold his head!" A sudden consternation seized them, which might perhaps have terminated in flight, had not their sovereign posted himself on an eminence, and shewn himself without his helmet to his terrified forces. He then hastened to the spot where Edric was combating, and darted a javelin at him with great force, which the crafty traitor found means to avoid. The English now returned to the charge, and the engagement did not cease until the evening: but the Danes had taken such advantage of the temporary alarm of the former, that they maintained their ground, and disappointed Edmund's hopes of a decisive day. The Danes, however, so severely felt the effects of this obstinate conflict, that they silently retreated towards London in the course of that night (u).

The siege of the capital was now resumed by Canute; but Edmund resolved to make an attempt for delivering the loyal citizens from the assaults of the besiegers. He met with success in his endeavours for this purpose, compelling the Danes to retire from the walls with precipitation. He encountered their army near Brentford, and defeated them with considerable slaughter, though he had previously lost a number of his own men, who were drowned in passing the Thames. He then returned into Wessex, while Canute invested London a third time, but still found the reduction of it impracticable. Again raising the siege, he first ravaged some of the Mercian counties, and afterwards made his appearance in Kent, whither he was followed by the active Edmund.

Edric perceiving the small hopes of conquering the English prince by open war, devised the expedient of ruining him by artifice. With the consent of Canute, he solicited pardon of Edmund for his treasonable conduct, and made such plausible protestations of future fidelity, that the generosity of the king overcame his prudence, and he received his brother-in-law into favour. Accompanied by this hypocritical traitor, he engaged the Danes at Otford on the Darent; and having put them to the rout, he pursued them to Aylesford, where he was prevailed on by Edric to desist from the prosecution of his victory, lest the enemy, driven to despair, should rally on the pursuers, and inflict a severe retaliation. His weakness in listening to the insinuation of this villain occasioned the loss of an opportunity which never occurred to him in the sequel, of destroying, or greatly weakening, the Danish power.

Edmund now increased his army to the utmost of his ability, and attacked the whole force of Canute at Assington in Essex. Here a bloody conflict ensued, the two rival kings contending with uncommon spirit for the attractive prize of English royalty. Edmund displayed the most heroic intrepidity, and had penetrated to the guards of the Danish prince, with whom he wished for a personal combat; when the fortune of the day, which visibly inclined to the English, was suddenly changed by a signal act of treachery. Edric, apprehensive of Canute's discomfiture, quitted the field with that division which he commanded, and though Edmund strained every nerve to prevent the ill consequences of such a desertion, all his efforts to retrieve the declining courage of those who were thus abandoned, and whom the Danes now pressed with redoubled confidence and ardour, were inefficacious. Many of the English nobles fell on this fatal day; and an extraordinary slaughter was made of the inferior ranks of the soldiery.

Edmund retiring with a small party to Gloucester, was pursued by the victor, who could not, however, prevent him from assembling another army, with which he prepared for a strenuous renewal of hostilities. But some of the nobles of each party, weary of the dangers and fatigues of constant action, persuaded the royal competitors to compromise their dispute. To this proposition the two kings agreed; and a formal meeting took place at Deerhurst in Gloucestershire. While their respective armies stood in array on the opposite banks of the Severn, they passed into a small island formed by that river; and, after a brief conference, it was resolved that the kingdom of England should be divided between them. The provinces of Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumberland, were assigned to Canute; and Edmund retained the ancient East-Saxon kingdom (including the city of London,) with all the country south of the Thames.

By this treaty a period was put to the wars which had so long raged between the Danes and Anglo-Saxons, and which had reduced the latter nation to such an extremity of distress, that nothing but a durable peace could restore it to any degree of lustre. It is certain, however, that Edmund did not survive the treaty more than a month (v); for he was murdered (w) at Oxford, November 30, 1016, by two of his own domestics, who were suborned by the traitor Edric, (the first to bear the news to Canute, and to congratulate him on his accession to the throne of England.) But we do not find that Canute, who derived so great an accession of power from the death of his formidable rival, either instigated the traitor to the commission of so nefarious an act, or gave it the sanction of his connivance.

CANUTE.

THE brave and intrepid Edmund being thus traiterously cut off in the flower of his age, Canute took possession of the dominions which that prince had reserved to himself by the treaty of partition; but he was unwilling to seize them before he had made a formal allegation of right, founded (as he and his creatures falsely asserted) on one of the articles of that convention, purporting that he should be the successor of Edmund. In a general assembly convoked at London in 1017, by order of the Danish monarch, the evidence adduced in his favour was deemed valid; and all the members took the oath of allegiance to him, abjuring the brothers and sons of Edmund. Shortly after this decision of the states he was crowned.

After Canute had possessed himself of the sovereignty of England, his first care was to divide it into four governments, viz. Mercia, Northumberland, East Anglia, and Wessex. The first of these he restored to Edric; the second he conferred on Eiric, a powerful Danish chieftain; the third, on Turkill; while he kept the fourth under his own immediate administration. In these appointments he was influenced rather by necessity than inclination. By thus acting he gratified the ambition and rapacity of those nobles who had been instrumental in raising him to his present power: but he intended to take the earliest opportunity of reducing them to a state of comparative insignificance, that they might not be enabled, in case of a change in their sentiments of loyalty towards him, to shake the foundations of that throne on which their efforts had contributed to place him.

But Canute did not consider himself as securely established on the throne while so many princes of the Anglo-Saxon race were living; therefore he contrived the means of freeing himself from uneasiness on that head. He first banished, and then murdered Edwy, the brother of Edmund, who acquired such popularity among the country people, that he was styled Ceorles-cyng, i. e. king of the husbandmen. He sent Edward and Edmund, the infant sons of the late king, to Sweden, with a private intimation to the king of that country that their death would be agreeable to him: but the Swede had more humanity, and sent the children to Solomon king of Hungary, whom he requested to take proper care of their maintenance and education. With respect to Edward and Alfred, the sons of Ethelred by the Norman Emma, Canute was apprehensive of the attempts of their uncle Richard to dispossess him, in their favour, of the dominions of Edmund Ironside. To silence the clamours of the duke, who had remonstrated with him on his injustice to those princes, he offered to espouse Emma, and promised to bequeath the crown of England to the eventual offspring of such marriage. Richard and his sister acquiesced in these proposals; and Canute's fears of a Norman invasion were removed by the appearance of the fair widow at his court, to whom he was immediately united in marriage.

Being now free from apprehension on account of the English princes, Canute proceeded to take measures for the punishment of those noblemen who had been disloyal to their former sovereign, and the removal of such as seemed dangerous by their power and influence. Canute was reproached by Edric with having neglected to reward him according to his merits, and to treat him with that superior confidence which he deserved; whereupon Canute ordered that monster of turpitude to be instantly put to death, as the betrayer and murderer of Edmund. He also punished with death the supposed accomplices of Edric in the assassination of that monarch. He banished some of the English nobility, and deprived others of their lives, either because he was diffident of their fidelity, or was alarmed at their power. He seized the estates of many of the disaffected English, and conferred them on his principal Danish followers, as a recompence for their zeal and services.

Canute's next step was to render his government popular among his new subjects, by confirming the laws of the Saxon kings in a great council assembled at Oxford in 1018. He further gratified them by sending back to Denmark the greater part of his fleet and army; though, before their return, he exacted for their payment the sum of eleven thousand pounds from the city of London, and seventy-two thousand pounds from the rest of the kingdom. In the administration of justice, he avoided all distinction between Danes and English; and made it his particular aim to suppress all remains of that national animosity which had hindered the Anglo-Danish tribes from being completely incorporated with the Saxon inhabitants.

Thinking himself now firmly seated on the English throne, he repaired to Denmark, in 1019, which was then harassed by the Swedes and Norwegians. He made a successful campaign against the enemy (x), and returned to England in 1020, where he employed himself in promoting (v) Edmund left two sons by his wife Algitha, Edwin and Edward.

(w) The body of Edmund was buried at Glastonbury.

(x) Earl Godwin, who afterwards became so eminent and powerful, accompanied Canute on this occasion, and greatly contributed to the success

ing the security and welfare of the kingdom, and repairing the mischiefs inseparable from a long course of fierce hostilities. Soon after his return he thought proper to annul that exorbitant power which he had granted to Eiric and Turkill, the governors of Northumberland and East Anglia. He expelled both these noblemen from England in 1021, and suffered no person, throughout the realm, to possess such a degree of authority as might enable him to oppose the royal commands with any tolerable hopes of success.

Although Canute, by adding England to his hereditary kingdom of Denmark, had rendered himself a very powerful monarch, his ambition was by no means satisfied. He still thirsted for an increase of dominion; and finding that Olaus king of Norway had become hateful to his subjects by his endeavours to check their piratical practices, and had fallen into contempt among them for his unwarlike spirit, he fomented their disaffection by corrupting the principal nobles; and, by opening his English purse, secured a strong party of Norwegians in his interest. But before his scheme was ripe for execution, the Swedes renewed the war with Denmark, and compelled him to make another voyage to that country in 1025, whence he returned to England with loss and discomfiture. His subsequent success in Norway, however, compensated for this misfortune; for, sailing to the North Sea with a fleet of fifty vessels, he was enabled to expel Olaus from his throne, and to take possession of the Norwegian realm in 1028, which he preserved against all the efforts of the partizans of the exiled prince, who lost his life in attempting its recovery.

Canute, now become the sovereign of three kingdoms, returned to his English dominions, in 1029, and renewed his encouragement of those arts which render a nation flourishing and happy. He was a zealous patron of commerce and manufactures; he promoted the interests of religion and learning; he dispensed the most impartial justice to his people; and endeavoured to atone for his former barbarities by the equity, moderation, and humanity, of his government. In the midst of these patriotic exertions he was alarmed by the intelligence of a projected invasion from Normandy, in favour of Ethelred's sons Edward and Alfred, whom Robert, the second sovereign of that duchy after Emma's brother, was desirous of placing on the throne of England. This prince had prepared a strong fleet for asserting the right of his cousins; but his ships were so damaged by a storm, that they were obliged to return into port. Robert not being deterred from his design by this accident, Canute resolved to amuse him by negociation; and made an offer of Wessex to the two princes. This proposal delayed the invasion till the following year, when Robert, influenced by motives of superstition, and compunction for his connivance at the murder of his brother and predecessor, duke Richard III. made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and dying at Bithynia on his return, delivered Canute from his anxiety.

The more effectually to make his peace with Heaven for the blood he had shed, and the injustice he had committed, Canute undertook a journey to Rome, in 1031, where he received absolution from his holiness, bestowed valuable presents on the pontiff and the principal churches, confirmed the grant of the tax called Peter-pence, procured a reduction of the price paid at Rome by the English archbishops for their palls, and obtained new privileges for the English college in that city. Meeting there with the emperor Conrad II. and Rodolph king of Arles, he prevailed on them to remit the tolls and impositions exacted from his subjects, whether merchants or pilgrims, in passing through their dominions to the Romish metropolis.

On his return from Rome, in 1032, he levied an army to enforce the payment of Dane-geld from Duncan, who as heir to the crown of Scotland, possessed the Cumbrian principality. For this territory he had refused to do homage to Canute, alledging that he was not king of England de jure. But the appearance of that monarch soon compelled Duncan to make the desired submissions, though it does not appear that he paid any part of the pecuniary demand.

success of the war. Being entrusted with the command of a body of English troops, who were stationed near the hostile camp, he surprized the enemy by a nocturnal attack, and having forced their entrenchments, put them to a total rout. Though he had transgressed the rules of martial discipline, by engaging without the orders of his commander in chief, his courage and good fortune so pleased Canute, (who, not seeing the English in the morning, suspected they had been guilty of desertion,) that he rewarded Godwin with particular marks of favour, and gave him in marriage the sister of his brother-in-law Ulf. Henry of Huntingdon, Brompton, Adam of Bremen.

Of the remainder of Canute's reign, we read no other particulars that merit our notice. He died in peace at Shaftesbury, November 12, 1035, after having bequeathed the crown of England to his second son Harold, that of Norway to his eldest son Sweyn, and that of Denmark to Hardicanute, who was his only son by Emma, and who, though his father had engaged, by the nuptial contract, to secure his succession to the English throne, was perhaps deemed by him too young and inexperienced to rule a nation lately subjected to a foreign yoke (y).

From his abilities as a warrior and a statesman, Canute derived the epithet of Great. He may, in some respects, be compared with Augustus Cæsar. Like that prince, he was cruel and vindictive while he was occupied in the acquisition of sovereignty; and, like him, he seemed to have changed his nature after he had attained the aims of his ambition. The ferocity of a conqueror gave way to the benevolence of an amiable monarch; and the odium of devastation and murder was sunk in the lenity of a popular administration.

We are told by Huntingdon, that as he was one day walking on the beach at Southampton, accompanied by his courtiers, who were remarkably profuse in their expressions of flattery, and even bestowed on him the attributes of the Deity, declaring that nothing in nature dared to disobey his commands; he ordered his chair to be placed by the sea-side, as the tide was rising, and seating himself, commanded the approaching waves to retire, and evince their obedience to him who was lord of the ocean. He continued to sit some time, as in expectation of their submission; but, being almost surrounded by the water, he at length arose, and turning to his courtiers, reproved them for their flattery; telling them to learn, from what they had seen, that all human power was weak and insignificant, and that omnipotence was vested in God alone! a truth sufficiently obvious, but not often impressed by royalty in the circle of adulation. From that moment he is said never to have worn the crown; but to have ordered it to be placed on the head of a crucifix in the church at Winchester, where it remained till his death.

HAROLD I. SURNAMED HAREFOOT (z).

NO sooner was the decease of Canute and his testamentary disposition known, than an assembly of the Anglo-Danish thanes, together with some of the English nobles, and the mercantile thanes of London, took place at Oxford, in 1035; and the result of this meeting was the election of Harold to the sovereignty of England. This prince, by seizing his father's treasures at Winchester, had been enabled to strengthen his interest, but not so powerfully as to secure the concurrence of the majority of the English, who declared in favour of Hardicanute, as destined to the succession by the articles of his mother's marriage with Canute, which a subsequent devise ought not to invalidate. Earl Godwin, whose influence was very considerable, supported the pretensions of the latter; and both parties being inflamed with mutual animosity, the contest might have proceeded to open violence, had not the leaders at length consented to a compromise, by which it was determined, in 1036, that Harold should reign over all the provinces to the north of the Thames, and Hardicanute over the southern territories; that Emma, in her son's name, should govern his portion till his return from Denmark; and that Godwin should act as her prime minister, and as commander of the army in Hardicanute's division.

The duchy of Normandy being now in the hands of a minor (William, son of duke Robert,) great disorders arose among the nobility; insomuch that Edward and Alfred, the sons of Ethelred, found their residence in that country inconvenient and hazardous. They therefore took the opportunity of coming over to England, at a time when their mother lived in regal state at Winchester (a). The arrival of the two princes to whom the English were greatly attached by reason of their descent from the Anglo-

Saxon kings, gave alarm to Harold, who felt himself insecure on the throne while they were present, and ready to take advantage of the current of popular loyalty. Having gained over Godwin to his interest, he invited the two princes to his court with hypocritical expressions of friendship and regard; and Alfred, the more enterprising of the two, accepted the invitation. Godwin, with a numerous party of armed followers, intercepted the prince and his Norman retinue, consisting of about seven hundred persons, put the greater part of them to death, and having deprived the unfortunate Alfred of his sight, imprisoned him in the monastery of Ely, where he soon fell a victim to the inhumanity of his treatment (b). Emma, shocked at the fate of her son, and apprehensive of the bloodthirsty violence of Harold and his infamous associate, fled into Flanders, while prince Edward returned to Normandy. Harold, taking advantage of the departure of Emma, and the absence of her son Hardicanute, who still remained in Denmark, procured the suffrages of the nobility and people in the territories assigned to that prince, and, in 1037, became sovereign of all England. From this time nothing is recorded of him but the imposition of a tax for the support of a fleet of sixteen ships, destined for the protection of the coasts. He died after a short reign at Oxford, on the 17th of March (c), 1039, unlamented by his subjects, as his character was that of a brutal and unenlightened monarch.

HARDICANUTE.

PREVIOUS to the death of Harold, Hardicanute had sailed from his Danish kingdom with a well-manned fleet of sixty vessels, with which, in all probability, he intended to have made an attempt on the southern counties of England, as belonging to him by the late convention. He first paid a visit to his mother, whose residence was at Bruges; and here he received a deputation from the states of England, requesting him to assume the reins of government, in the room of his deceased brother-in-law. He readily accepted the offer of the English crown; and immediately crossing the channel, was welcomed with the general joy of the nation. No sooner had he ascended the throne, than he exhibited such a specimen of his disposition as could not fail of disgusting his new subjects. To evince his detestation of the conduct of Harold in having violated the partition-treaty, and treated prince Alfred with such unprovoked cruelty, he gave a singular commission to Alfric archbishop of York, earl Godwin, Styre the high-steward, and other officers, to assist the executioner in disinterring the body of the late king, cutting off the head, and throwing the corpse into the Thames, where it was soon after discovered by a fisherman, by whom it was delivered to the Danish inhabitants of London, and deposited in their burial-ground, at St. Clement's Danes.

His next transaction gave more real disgust to the people, as it did not merely affect their feelings, but attacked their property. He laid on them a tax of thirty-two thousand pounds for the payment of his fleet and army which had attended him from Denmark, at a time when famine raged throughout the kingdom, in 1040. This impost gave rise to animated complaints; and the public indignation was kindled to such a height at Worcester, by the insolence of the collectors, and the oppressive nature of the tax itself, that two of the king's officers were slain by the tumultuous fury of the citizens. Hardicanute, barbarously vindictive, issued orders to Godwin and other noblemen to march with an army to that city, plunder and destroy the inhabitants, set fire to the buildings, and ravage the circumjacent country. These commands were put in execution, except that part which related to the massacre of the people, a very small number of whom suffered death, the rest of the citizens having fortified themselves in an island of the Severn, whence they were permitted, on the intercession of the nobles with the king, to return in safety.

Hardicanute, notwithstanding the tincture of cruelty which he possessed, did not suffer it to appear in his treatment of his brother-in-law Edward, at whose prior right to the crown he felt no jealousy or alarm. He professed a great regard for this prince, whom he entertained at his court, and seemed determined to prosecute the murderers of his brother Alfred. The archbishop of York having accused earl Godwin, and Livingus bishop of Worcester, of being concerned in that scene of barbarity, the king deprived Livingus of his see, and would have punished Godwin for his conduct in that iniquitous business, had not the earl secured his pardon by corruption. Perceiving the king's taste for magnificence, he presented him with a splendid galley, curiously wrought and completely equipped, the crew consisting of eighty men, each of whom had two golden bracelets, a gilt helmet, corslet, shield, and other martial accoutrements equally brilliant. Hardicanute was appeased by this costly present, and suffered the donor to escape justice, on his swearing that he had no concern in the death of Alfred, and that, in putting out that prince's eyes, and confining him in a monastery, he had only executed the express orders of Harold. The same rapacious spirit which dictated the acceptance of Godwin's present, as a commutation for the legal punishment of a crime, induced Hardicanute to restore Livingus to his bishopric, in consideration of a pecuniary compliment.

This monarch died suddenly at Lambeth, at the nuptial feast of one of his Danish courtiers, in the midst of jollity and intemperance, in 1041. He appears to have been frank and open in his disposition: his court was the abode of liberality and magnificence: he was an affectionate son, and an hospitable master. On the other hand, he was unreasonably severe in his government, arbitrary, rapacious, and revengeful.

EDWARD THE CONFESSOR.

ON the death of Hardicanute, the English saw a favourable opportunity for recovering their liberty, and for shaking off the yoke which had oppressed them under four Danish kings. Sweyn, king of Norway, the eldest son of Canute, was absent; and as the two last kings had died without issue, none of that race presented himself, nor any whom the Danes could support as successor to the throne. Prince Edward, the only surviving son of Ethelred, was fortunately at court; and though the descendants of Edmund Ironside were the true heirs of the Saxon family, yet their absence in so remote a country as Hungary (d), appeared a sufficient reason for their exclusion to a people like the English, so little accustomed to observe a regular order in the succession of their monarchs. All delays might be dangerous; and the present occasion must hastily be embraced; while the Danes, without concert, without a leader, astonished at the present incident, and anxious only for their personal safety, were afraid to oppose the united voice of the nation.

But this concurrence of circumstances in favour of Edward, might have failed of its effect, had his succession been opposed by Godwin, whose power, alliances, and abilities, gave him great influence at all times, especially amidst those sudden opportunities which always attended a revolution of government, and which, either seized or neglected, commonly prove decisive. There were opposite reasons which divided men's hopes and fears with regard to Godwin's conduct. On the one hand, the credit of that nobleman lay chiefly in Wessex, which was almost entirely inhabited by English. It was therefore presumed, that he would second the wishes of that people in restoring the Saxon line, and in humbling the Danes, from whom he, as well as they, had reason to dread, as they had already felt, the most grievous oppressions. On the other hand, there subsisted a declared animosity between Edward and Godwin, on account of his brother Alfred's murder, which Edward indeed never sincerely pardoned. But their common friends here interposed; and representing the necessity of their good correspondence, obliged them to lay aside all jealousy and rancour, and concur in restoring liberty to their native country. Godwin only stipulated that

(b) Though this anecdote is discredited by some historians, it is so confidently asserted by others, as a matter of notoriety, that, as it is not incompatible with the unprincipled characters of Harold and Godwin, there seems to be insufficient reason to doubt the substance of it, though the narrators may have exaggerated the number of the Normans who were slain, and the horrid tortures practised on the occasion.

(c) According to Rapin; but Hume says he died on the 14th of April. He was buried at Westminster.

(d) Edward, the son of Edmund Ironside, had indeed a preferable claim to the crown; but his long exile in Hungary, where he had espoused the sister-in-law of his protector Solomon, threw a damp on his pretensions, and reconciled his countrymen to the exclusion of a prince who was too remotely situated, and too little known, to command their exertions, or interest their affections.

Edward, as a pledge of his reconciliation, should promise to marry his daughter Editha; and having fortified himself by this alliance, he summoned a general council at Gillingham, and prepared every measure for securing the succession to Edward. The English were unanimous and zealous in their resolutions; the Danes were divided and dispirited: any small opposition which appeared in this assembly was brow-beaten and suppressed; and Edward was crowned king, with every demonstration of duty and affection.

Upon this signal and decisive advantage, the triumph of the English was at first attended with some violence against the Danes; but the king, by the mildness of his character, soon reconciled the latter to his administration, and the distinction between the two nations gradually disappeared. The joy, however, of their present deliverance made such impression on the minds of the English, that they instituted an annual festival for celebrating that great event; and it was observed in some countries even to the time of Spelman.

The popularity which Edward enjoyed on his accession, was not destroyed by the first act of his administration, which was his resuming all the grants of his immediate Danish predecessors; an attempt which is commonly attended with the most dangerous consequences. The poverty of the crown convinced the nation that this act of violence was become absolutely necessary; and as the loss fell chiefly on the Danes, who had obtained large grants from the late kings, their countrymen, on account of their services in subduing the kingdom, the English were pleased to see them reduced to their primitive poverty. The king's severity also towards his mother Emma, the queen-dowager, though exposed to more censure, met not with very general disapprobation. He had hitherto lived on indifferent terms with that princess: he accused her of neglecting him and his brother during their adverse fortune: he remarked, that as the superior qualities of Canute, and his better treatment of her, had made her intirely indifferent to the memory of Ethelred, she also gave the preference to her children of her second bed, and always regarded Hardicanute as her favourite. The same reasons had probably made her unpopular in England; and though her benefactions to the monks obtained her the favour of that order, the nation was not, in general, displeased to see her stripped by Edward of immense treasures which she had amassed. He confined her, during the remainder of her life, in a monastery at Winchester; but carried his rigour against her no farther.

The English flattered themselves that, by the accession of Edward, they were delivered for ever from the dominion of foreigners; but they soon found that this evil was not yet entirely removed. The king had been educated in Normandy; and had contracted many intimacies with the natives of that country, as well as an affection for their manners. The court of England was soon filled with Normans, who, being distinguished both by the favour of Edward, and by a degree of cultivation superior to that which was attained by the English in those ages, soon rendered their language, customs, and laws, fashionable in the kingdom. The study of the French tongue became general among the people. The courtiers affected to imitate that nation in their dress, equipage, and entertainments: even the lawyers employed a foreign language in their deeds and papers: but above all, the church felt the influence and dominion of those strangers: Ulf and William, two Normans, who had formerly been the king's chaplains, were created bishops of Dorchester and London. Robert, a Norman also, was promoted to the see of Canterbury, and always enjoyed the highest favour of his master, of which his abilities rendered him not unworthy. And though the king's prudence, or his want of authority, made him confer almost all the civil and military employments on the natives, the ecclesiastical preferments often fell to the share of the Normans; and as the latter possessed Edward's confidence, they had secretly a great influence on public affairs, and excited the jealousy of the English, particularly of earl Godwin.

This powerful nobleman, besides being duke or earl of Wessex, had the counties of Kent and Sussex annexed to his government. His eldest son, Sweyn, possessed the same authority in the counties of Oxford, Berks, Gloucester, and Hereford: and Harold, his second son, was duke of East-Anglia, and at the same time governor of Essex. The great authority of this family was supported by immense possessions and powerful alliances; and the abilities, as well as ambition, of Godwin himself, contributed to render it still more dangerous. A prince of greater capacity and vigour than Edward would have found it difficult to support the dignity of the crown under such circumstances; and as the haughty temper of Godwin made him often forget the respect due to his prince, Edward's animosity against him was grounded on personal as well as political considerations, on recent as well as more ancient injuries. The king, in pursuance of his engagements, had indeed married Editha, the daughter of Godwin; but this alliance became a fresh source of enmity between them. Edward's hatred of the father was transferred to that princess; and Editha, though possessed of many amiable accomplishments, could never acquire the confidence and affection of her husband.

Sweyn, the eldest son of Godwin, gave an early instance of misconduct. Being captivated with the charms of the abbess of Leominster, he seduced her to incontinence; which so enraged the king, that he compelled the delinquent to quit his dominions, in 1048, though he offered to marry the lady whom he had debauched. Sweyn, thus exiled, retired to Denmark; and there he equipped eight vessels, with which he piratically infested the coasts of his native country. Edward was at length prevailed on, in 1049, to pardon this turbulent youth, and restore him to his honours, notwithstanding an additional crime which he had committed while he kept the sea with his squadron; for he had even murdered his kinsman, earl Beorn, who had gone on board one of his ships, to treat with him on the terms of his reconciliation with the king.

The most popular pretence on which Godwin could ground his disaffection to the king and his administration, was to complain of the influence of the Normans in the government; and a declared opposition had thence arisen between him and these favourites. It was not long before this animosity broke into action. Eustace, count of Bologne, having paid a visit to the king, passed by Dover in his return: one of his train, being refused entrance to a lodging which had been assigned him, attempted to make his way by force, and in the contest he wounded the master of the house. The inhabitants revenged this insult by the death of the stranger; the count and his train took arms, and murdered the wounded townsman; a tumult ensued; near twenty persons were killed on each side; and Eustace, being overpowered by numbers, was obliged to save his life by flight from the fury of the populace. He immediately repaired to court, and complained of the usage he had met with: the king entered zealously into the quarrel, and was highly displeased that a stranger of such distinction, whom he had invited over to his court, should, without any just cause, as he believed, have felt so sensibly the insolence and animosity of his people. He gave orders to Godwin, in whose government Dover lay, to repair immediately to the place, and to punish the inhabitants for the crime: but Godwin, who desired rather to encourage than repress the popular discontents against foreigners, refused obedience, and endeavoured to throw the whole blame of the riot on the count of Bologne, and his retinue. Edward now saw the necessity of exerting the royal authority; and threatened Godwin, if he persisted in his disobedience, to make him feel the effects of his displeasure.

Earl Godwin perceiving a rupture to be unavoidable, made preparations for his own defence, or rather for an attack on Edward. Under pretence of repressing some incursions of the Welsh, he secretly assembled an army, and was approaching the king, who resided, without any military force, and without suspicion, at Gloucester. Edward applied for protection to Siward, duke of Northumberland, and Leofric, duke of Mercia, two powerful noblemen, whose jealousy of Godwin's greatness, as well as their duty to the crown, engaged them to defend the king in this extremity. They hastened to him with such of their followers as they could assemble on a sudden; and finding the danger much greater than they had at first apprehended, they issued orders for mustering all their forces within their respective governments, and for marching them without delay to the defence of the king's person and authority. Edward, meanwhile, endeavoured to gain time by negociation; while Godwin, who thought the king entirely in his power, and who was unwilling to save appearances, fell into the snare.

The English, though they had no high idea of Edward's vigour and capacity, hastened from all quarters to defend him from the present danger. His army was now so considerable, that he ventured to take the field: and marching to London, he summoned a great council in 1050 to judge of the rebellion of Godwin and his sons. These noblemen pretended at first that they were willing to stand their trial; but having in vain endeavoured to make their adherents persist in rebellion, they offered to come to London, provided they might receive hostages for the safety of their persons: this proposal being rejected, they were obliged to disband the remains of their forces, and have recourse to flight. Baldwin, earl of Flanders, gave protection to Godwin and his three sons, Sweyn, Tosti, and Girth; Tosti had married the daughter of that prince; Harold and Leofwin, two other of his sons, took shelter in Ireland. The estates of the father and sons were confiscated: their governments were given to others: Queen Editha was confined in a monastery at Warewel; and the greatness of this family, once so formidable, seemed now to be totally supplanted and overthrown.

Godwin, however, had fixed his authority on too firm a basis, and he was too strongly supported by alliances, both foreign and domestic, not to occasion farther disturbances, and make new efforts for his re-establishment. The earl of Flanders, in 1051, permitted him to purchase and hire ships within his harbours; and Godwin, having manned them with his followers, and with free-booters of all nations, put to sea, and attempted to make a descent at Sandwich. The king, informed of his preparations, equipped a considerable fleet, much superior to that of the enemy; and the earl hastily, before their appearance, made his retreat into the Flemish harbours. The English court, allured by the present security, and destitute of all vigorous counsels, allowed the seamen to disband, and the fleet to go to decay; while Godwin, expecting this event, kept his men in readiness for action. He put to sea immediately, and sailed to the Isle of Wight, where he was joined by Harold, with a squadron which that nobleman had collected in Ireland. He was now master of the sea; and entering every harbour on the southern coast, seized all the ships, and summoned his followers in those counties, which had so long been subject to his government, to assist him in procuring justice to himself, his family, and his country, against the tyranny of foreigners. Reinforced by great numbers from all quarters, he entered the Thames; and appearing before London, threw every thing into confusion. The king alone seemed resolute to defend himself to the last extremity; but the interposition of the English nobility, many of whom favoured Godwin's pretensions, made Edward hearken to terms of accommodation; and the feigned humility of the earl, who disclaimed all intentions of offering violence to his sovereign, and desired only to justify himself by a fair and open trial, paved the way for his more easy admission. It was stipulated, that he should give hostages for his good behaviour, and that the primate and all the foreigners should be banished (e): by this treaty, the present danger of a civil war was obviated, but the authority of the crown was considerably impaired. Edward, sensible that he had not power sufficient to secure Godwin's hostages in England, sent them over to his kinsman, the young duke of Normandy.

The death of Godwin, which happened soon after his restoration, while he was sitting at table with the king, to whom he was steward of the household, prevented him from farther establishing the authority which he had acquired, and from reducing Edward to still greater subjection. He was succeeded in the government of Wessex, Sussex, Kent, and Essex, and in the office of steward of the household, a place of great power, by his son Harold, (now his eldest surviving son (f), who was actuated by an ambition equal to that of his father, and was superior to him in address, in insinuation, and in virtue. By a modest and gentle demeanor, he acquired the good-will of Edward; at least softened the hatred which that prince had so long borne to his family; and gaining every day new partizans by his bounty and affability, he proceeded in a more silent, and therefore a more dangerous manner, to the increase of his authority. The king, who had not sufficient vigour directly to oppose his progress, knew of no other expedient than that hazardous one, of raising him a rival in the family of Leofric, duke of Mercia, whose son Algar was invested with the government of East-Anglia, which, before the banishment of Harold, had belonged to the latter nobleman. But this policy, of balancing opposite parties, required a more steady hand to manage it than that of Edward, and naturally produced faction, and even civil broils, among nobles of such mighty and independent authority. Algar was soon after expelled his government by the intrigues and power of Harold; but being protected by Griffith, prince of Wales, who had married his daughter, as well as by the power of his father Leofric, he obliged Harold to submit to an accommodation, and was reinstated in the government of East-Anglia. This peace was not of long duration: Harold, taking advantage of Leofric's (g) death, which happened soon after, expelled Algar anew, and banished him the kingdom: and though that nobleman made a fresh irruption into East-Anglia with an army of Norwegians, and over-ran the country, his death soon freed Harold from the pretensions of so dangerous a rival. Edward, the eldest son of Algar, was indeed advanced to the government of Mercia; but the balance, which the king desired to establish between those potent families, was wholly lost, and the influence of Harold greatly preponderated.

The death of Siward, duke of Northumberland, in 1055, made the way still more open to the ambition of that nobleman. Siward, besides his other merits, had acquired honour to England, by his successful conduct in the only foreign enterprize undertaken during the reign of Edward. Duncan, king of Scotland, was a prince of a gentle disposition, but possessed not the genius requisite for governing a country so turbulent, and so much infested by the intrigues and animosities of the great. Macbeth, a powerful nobleman, and nearly allied to the crown, not content with curbing the king's authority, carried still farther his pestilential ambition: he put his sovereign to death; chased Malcolm Kenmore, his son and heir, into England; and usurped the crown. Siward, whose daughter was married to Duncan, embraced, by Edward's orders, the protection of this distressed family: he marched an army into Scotland, in 1054, and having defeated and killed Macbeth in battle, he restored Malcolm to the throne of his ancestors. This service, added to his former connections with the royal family of Scotland, brought a great accession to the authority of Siward in the north; but as he had lost his eldest son, Osberne, in the action with Macbeth, it proved in the issue fatal to his family. His second son, Waltheof, appeared, on his father's death (h), too young to be entrusted with the government of Northumberland; and Harold's influence obtained that dukedom for his own brother Tosti.

The king, now worn out with cares and infirmities, felt himself far advanced in the decline of life; and having no issue himself, began to think of appointing a successor to the throne. He sent a deputation to Hungary, to invite over his nephew Edward, son of his elder brother, and the only remaining heir of the Saxon line. That prince, whose succession to the crown would have been easy and undisputed, came to England with his children, Edgar Atheling, Margaret, and Christina; but his death, which happened within a month after his arrival, threw the (e) A wittena-gemot being assembled to ratify this convention, Godwin is said to have been formally impeached of the murder of Alfred, and to have received the king's pardon for his concern in that dark transaction.

(f) We have before mentioned the murder of Beorn by Sweyn; to expiate which, soon after his exile, he undertook a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, but in his return to Europe he was slain by the Saracens.

(g) The story of Leofric's wife, Godiva, riding through Coventry naked, is as follows: Godiva, the wife of Leofric, is highly extolled by historians both for her mental and personal accomplishments. It is said that, in order to relieve the inhabitants of Coventry from an oppressive tax imposed on them by her husband, she consented to ride naked through the city, such being the condition of their exemption, stipulated by the caprice of her lord. Accordingly, having previously forbidden the inhabitants to look at her on pain of death, she mounted her horse, and rode from one extremity of the town to the other, with no covering but what her hair, which was extremely long and beautiful, could afford her. It is pretended that one man, being prompted by curiosity to disobey her injunction, was struck dead with lightning for his presumption. In remembrance of this event, there is still an annual procession observed at Coventry, in which the figure of a naked woman is carried through the town on horseback. The pictures of Leofric and Godiva are also to be seen in the windows of Trinity Church, with the following inscription—

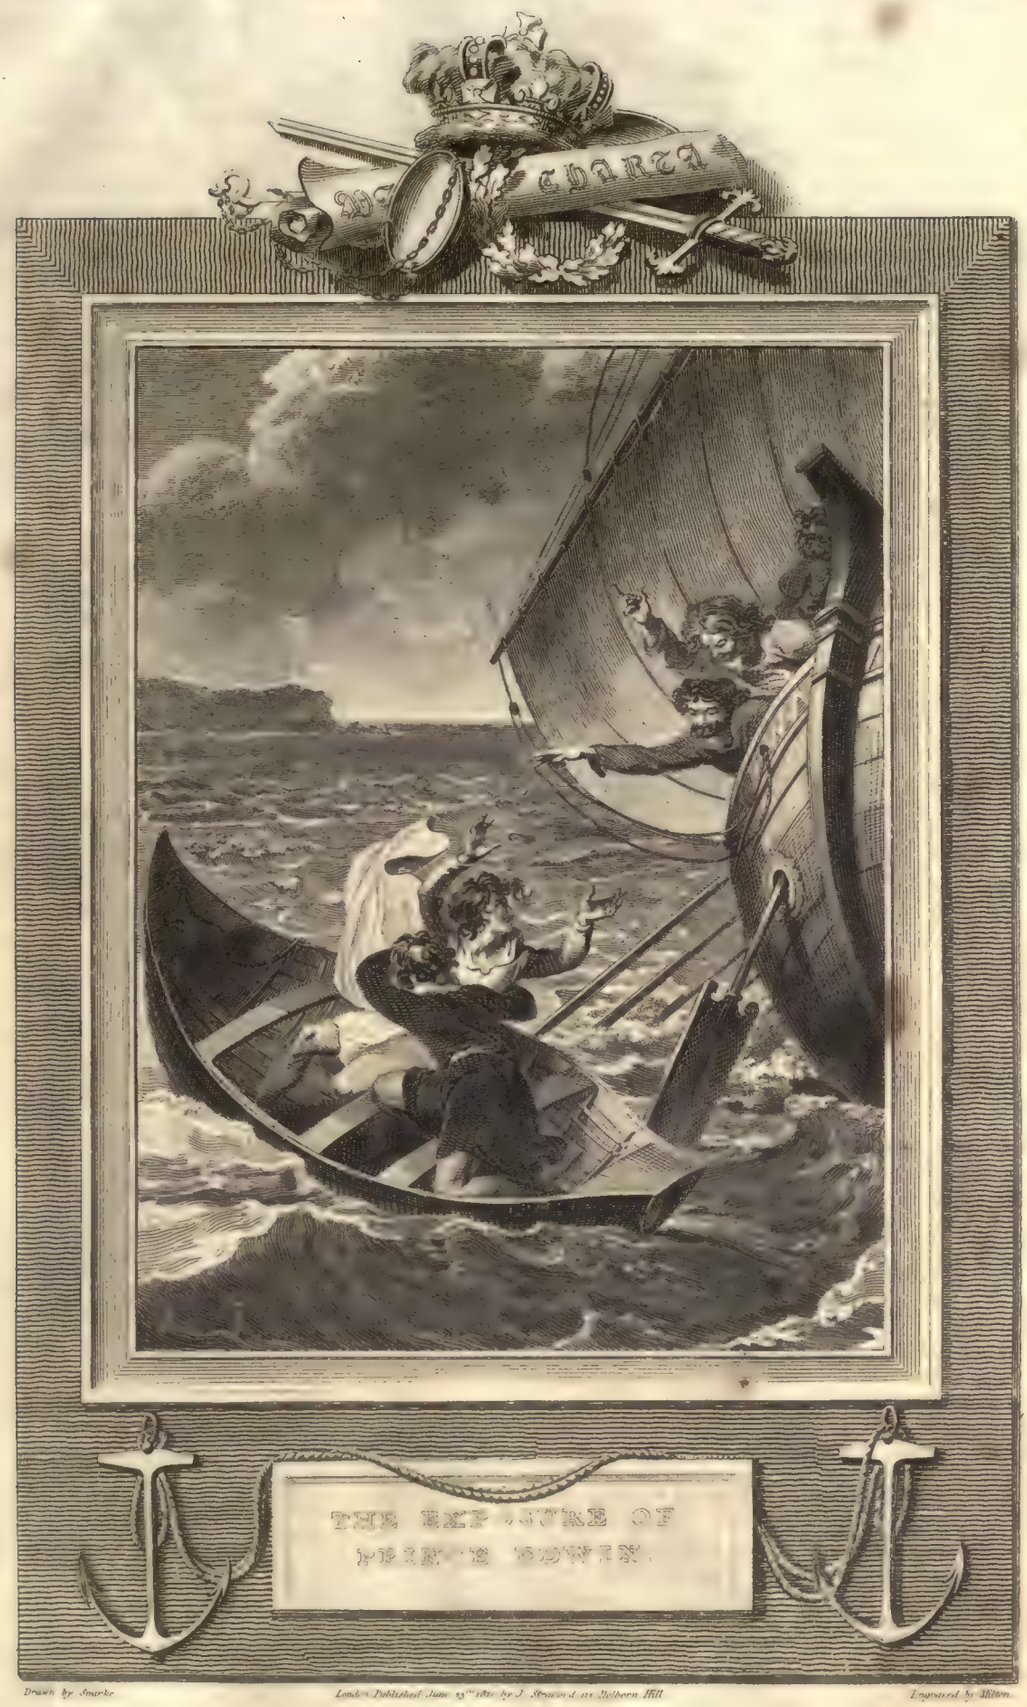
" I Luric, for the love of thee,
Do set Coventy toll-free."

(h) There are two circumstances related of Siward, which discover his high sense of honour, and his martial disposition. When intelligence was brought him of his son Osberne's death, he was inconsolable; till he heard that the wound was received in the breast, and that he had behaved with great gallantry in the action. When he found his own death approaching, he ordered his servants to clothe him in a complete suit of armour; and sitting erect on the couch, with a spear in his hand, declared, that in that posture, the only one worthy of a warrior, he would patiently await the fatal moment.

king into new difficulties. He saw, that the great power and ambition of Harold had tempted him to think of obtaining possession of the throne on the first vacancy, and that Edgar, on account of his youth and inexperience, was unfit to oppose the pretensions of so popular and enterprizing a rival. In this state of uncertainty, he is said to have secretly cast his eye towards his kinsman, William duke of Normandy, as the only person whose power, reputation, and capacity, could support any destination which he might make in his favour, to the exclusion of Harold and his family.

Duke William was natural son of Robert duke of Normandy, by Harlotta, daughter of a tanner in Falaise, and was early established in that grandeur from which his birth seemed to have set him at so great a distance. While he was but nine years of age, his father had resolved to undertake a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Before his departure, he assembled the states of the duchy; and informing them of his design, engaged them to swear allegiance to his natural son, William, whom, as he had no legitimate issue, he intended, in case he should die in the pilgrimage, to leave successor to his dominions. As he was a prudent prince, he could not but foresee the great inconveniencies which must attend this journey, and this settlement of his succession, arising from the perpetual turbulency of the great, the claims of other branches of the ducal family, and the power of the French monarch: but all these considerations were surmounted by the prevailing zeal for pilgrimages; and, probably, the more important they were, the more would Robert exult in sacrificing them to what he imagined to be his religious duty.

This prince, as he had apprehended, died in his pilgrimage; and the minority of his son was attended with all those disorders which were almost unavoidable in that situation: so that the regency established by Robert encountered great difficulties in supporting the government under the complication of dangers to which it was subjected; and the young prince, when he came to maturity, found himself reduced to a very low condition. But the great qualities which he soon displayed in the field and in the cabinet, gave encouragement to his friends, and struck terror into his enemies. He opposed himself on all sides against his rebellious subjects, and against foreign invaders; and by his valour and conduct prevailed in every action. He obliged the French king to grant him peace on reasonable terms; he expelled all pretenders to the sovereignty; and reduced his turbulent barons to submission. The natural severity of his temper appeared in a rigorous administration of justice; and having found the happy effects of this plan of government, without which the laws in those days became totally impotent, he regarded it as a fixed maxim, that an inflexible conduct was the first duty of a sovereign.



The tranquillity which he had established in his dominions, had given William leisure to pay a visit to the king of England during the time of Godwin's banishment in 1051; and he was received in a manner suitable to the reputation which he had acquired, to the relation by which he was connected with Edward, and to the obligations which that prince owed to his family. On the return of Godwin, and the expulsion of the Norman favourites, it is said that Robert, archbishop of Canterbury, before his departure, had persuaded Edward to think of adopting William as his successor; a counsel which was favoured by the king's aversion to Godwin, his prepossessions for the Normans, and his esteem of the duke. Of this circumstance, however, there is some doubt; and Edward thinking that the English would more easily acquiesce in the restoration of the Saxon line, invited his brother's descendants from Hungary, with a view of having them recognized heirs to the crown; but the death of his nephew, as above-mentioned, made him doubtful what mode to adopt, and he is said to have kept his purpose secret from all his ministers, and even from those who were most intimately connected with him.

But Harold proceeded after a more open manner, in encreasing his popularity, in establishing his power, and in preparing the way for his advancement on the first vacancy; an event which, from the age and infirmities of the king, appeared not very distant. But there was still another obstacle, which it was requisite for him previously to overcome. Earl Godwin, when restored to his power and fortune, had given hostages for his good behaviour; and among the rest, Ulnoth his son, and Hacun his grandson, by Sweyn, whom Edward, for greater security, as has been related, had consigned to the custody of the duke of Normandy. Harold, though not aware of the duke's being his competitor, was uneasy that such near relations should be detained prisoners in a foreign country; and he was fearful lest William should, in favour of Edgar Atheling, retain these pledges as a check on the ambition of any other pretender. He represented, therefore, to the king, his unfeigned submission to royal authority, his steady duty to his prince, and the little necessity there was, after such an uniform trial of his obedience, to detain any longer those hostages who had been required on the first composing of civil discords. By these topics, enforced by his great power, he extorted the king's consent to release them; and in order to effect his purpose, he immediately proceeded, with a numerous retinue, on his journey to Normandy. A tempest drove him on the territory of Guy count of Ponthieu, who, being informed of his quality, immediately detained him prisoner, and demanded an exorbitant sum for his ransom. Harold found means to convey intelligence of his situation to the duke of Normandy; and represented, that while he was proceeding to his court, in execution of a commission from the king of England, he had met with this harsh treatment from the mercenary disposition of the count of Ponthieu.

William was sensible of the importance of the incident. He foresaw, that if he could once gain Harold, either by favours or menaces, his way to the throne of England would be open, and Edward would meet with no farther obstacle in executing the favourable intentions which he had entertained in his behalf. He sent, therefore, a messenger to Guy, in order to demand the liberty of his prisoner; and that nobleman, not daring to refuse so great a prince, put Harold into the hands of the Norman, who conducted him to Roüen. William received him with every demonstration of respect and friendship; and after shewing himself disposed to comply with his request, in delivering up the hostages, he took an opportunity of disclosing to him the great secret of his pretensions to the crown of England, and of the will which Edward intended to make in his favour. He desired the assistance of Harold in perfecting that design; he made professions of the utmost gratitude in return for so great an obligation; he promised that the present grandeur of Harold's family, which supported itself with difficulty under the jealousy and hatred of Edward, should receive new encrease from a successor who would be so greatly beholden to him for his advancement. Harold was surprized at this declaration of the duke; but being sensible that he should never recover his own liberty, much less that of his brother and nephew, if he refused the demand, he feigned a compliance, renounced all hopes of the crown for himself, and professed his sincere intention of supporting the will of Edward, and seconding the pretensions of the duke of Normandy. William, to bind him faster to his interests, besides offering him one of his daughters in marriage, required him to take an oath that he would fulfil his promises; and in order to render the oath more obligatory, he employed an artifice well suited to the ignorance and superstition of the age. He secretly conveyed under the altar, on which Harold agreed to swear, the reliques of some of the most revered martyrs; and when Harold had taken the oath, he shewed him the reliques, and admonished him to observe religiously an engagement which had been ratified by so tremendous a sanction. The English nobleman was astonished; but dissembling his concern, he renewed the same professions, and was dismissed with all the marks of mutual confidence by duke William.

Harold finding himself at liberty, sought to justify the violation of an oath, which had been extorted from him by fear, and which, if fulfilled, might be attended with the subjection of his native country to a foreign power. He continued still to practise every art of popularity; to encrease the number of his partizans; to reconcile the minds of the English to the idea of his succession; to revive their hatred of the Normans; and by an ostentation of his power and influence to deter the timorous Edward from executing his intended will in favour of William. Fortune, about this time, threw two incidents in his way, by which he was enabled to acquire general favour, and to encrease the character which he had already attained, of virtue and abilities.

The Welsh, though a less formidable enemy than the Danes, had long been accustomed to infest the western borders; borders; and after committing spoil on the low countries. they usually made a hasty retreat into their mountains, where they were sheltered from the pursuit of their enemies, and were ready to seize the first favourable opportunity of renewing their depredations. Griffith, the reigning prince, had greatly distinguished himself in those incursions; and his name had become so terrible to the English, that Harold found he could do nothing more acceptable to the public, and more honourable for himself, than the suppressing of so dangerous an enemy. He formed the plan of an expedition against Wales; and having prepared some light-armed foot to pursue the natives into their fastnesses, some cavalry to scour the open country, and a squadron of ships to attack the seacoast, he employed at once all these forces against the Welsh, prosecuted his advantages with vigour, made no intermission in his assaults, and at last reduced the enemy to such distress, that, in order to prevent their total destruction, they made a sacrifice of their prince, whose head they cut off, and sent to Harold; and they were content to receive, as their sovereigns, two Welsh noblemen appointed by Edward to rule over them. The other incident was no less honourable to Harold.

Tosti, brother of this nobleman, who had been created duke of Northumberland, being of a violent tyrannical temper, had acted with such cruelty and injustice, that the inhabitants rose in rebellion, and chased him from his government. Morcar and Edwin, two brothers, who possessed great power in those parts, and who were grandsons of the great duke Leofric, concurred in the insurrection; and the former, being elected duke, advanced with an army to oppose Harold who was commissioned by the king to reduce and chastise the Northumbrians. Before the armies came to action, Morcar, well acquainted with the generous disposition of the English commander, endeavoured to justify his own conduct. He represented to Harold, that Tosti had behaved in a manner unworthy of the station to which he was advanced, and no one, not even a brother, could support such tyranny, without participating, in some degree, of the infamy attending it; that the Northumbrians, accustomed to a legal administration, and regarding it as their birth-right, were willing to submit to the king, but required a governor who would pay regard to their rights and privileges; that they had been taught by their ancestors, that death was preferable to servitude, and had taken the field, determined to perish, rather than suffer a renewal of those indignities to which they had so long been exposed; and they trusted that Harold, on reflection, would not defend in another that violent conduct, from which he himself, in his own government, had always kept at so great a distance. This vigorous remonstrance was accompanied with such a detail of facts, so well supported, that Harold found it prudent to abandon his brother's cause; and returning to Edward, he persuaded him to pardon the Northumbrians, and to confirm Morcar in the government. He even married the sister of that nobleman; and by his interest, procured Edwin, the younger brother, to be elected into the government of Mercia. Tosti in a rage departed the kingdom, and took shelter in Flanders with earl Baldwin, his father-in-law.

By this marriage Harold broke all measures with the duke of Normandy; and William perceived that he could no longer rely on the oaths and promises which he had extorted from him. But the English nobleman was now in such a situation, that he deemed it no longer necessary to dissemble. He had, in his conduct towards the Northumbrians, given such a specimen of his moderation as had gained him the affections of his countrymen. He saw that almost all England was engaged in his interests; while he himself possessed the government of Wessex, Morcar that of Northumberland, and Edwin that of Mercia. He now openly aspired to the succession; and insisted, that since it was necessary, by the confession of all, to set aside the royal family, on account of the imbecility of Edgar Atheling, the sole surviving heir, there was no one so capable of filling the throne as a nobleman of great power, of mature age, of long experience, of approved courage and abilities, who, being a native of the kingdom, would effectually secure it against the dominion and tyranny of foreigners. Edward, broken with age and infirmities, saw the difficulties too great for him to encounter; and though his inveterate prepossessions kept him from seconding the pretensions of Harold, he took but feeble and irresolute steps for securing the succession to the duke of Normandy (i). While he continued in this uncertainty, he was surprised by sickness, which brought him to his grave, on the 5th of January, 1066, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, and twenty-fifth of his reign.

Edward was possessed of virtues that might have entitled him to respect in a private sphere of life though his talents were insufficient to make him shine as a monarch. It was, however, a fortunate circumstance for his subjects that his defects proved a source of tranquillity; for, had his mind been susceptible of a laudable spirit of resentment, his ardour to repress the daring encroachments of Godwin must have necessarily involved the kingdom in the dreadful calamities of a civil war: but, indolent and timid, he sacrificed his glory to his ease, and rather chose to submit to illegal infringements on his authority, than to maintain the prerogative of the crown by any violent exertion. The general tenour of his conduct affords just grounds for believing that he was wholly exempt from those strong passions which are equally productive of signal virtues and flagrant vices; but his continence, which is so highly extolled by the monkish writers, who assert that he married the beautiful Editha for the sole purpose of exercising his virtue, by exposing it to continual temptation, appears to have been the effect of constitutional frigidity, which it certainly would have been more commendable to overcome than indulge. His piety and charity, however, merit the highest praise, and procured him the titles of Saint and Confessor, which were confirmed to him by Pope Alexander the Third, by whom he was canonized about too centuries after his death. The sums which are too commonly devoted by princes to purposes of private gratification, were applied by Edward to charitable uses; and his extreme attention to all religious concerns, shews that he entertained a just sense of the first duties of a monarch.

He is likewise entitled to commendation for his impartial administration of justice, to facilitate which he compiled a body of laws, from the collections of Ethelbert, Ina, and Alfred. This compilation must have been formed with judgement, since it long continued to be cherished by the English, even after the introduction of new laws: but it is now unfortunately lost; for the laws that pass under the name of Edward the Confessor, bear evident marks of a subsequent composition.

Edward was the first sovereign who is said to have received from Heaven the special privilege of curing the king's evil by the touch. The high opinion which the people entertained of his sanctity, induced them to pay an implicit belief to the efficacy of this extraordinary remedy; and the succeeding monarchs, finding it ensured a greater portion of reverence and respect, endeavoured to confirm the opinion from motives of policy. It continued till the accession of the present royal family; who, observing that it could only furnish a subject for ridicule and derision to the thinking part of mankind, and was no longer an object of astonishment even to the populace, wisely abolished the custom.

(i) The whole story of the transactions between Edward, Harold, and the duke of Normandy, is told so differently by the ancient writers, that there are few important passages of the English history liable to so great uncertainty. I have followed the account which appeared to me the most consistent and probable. It does not seem likely, that Edward ever executed a will in the duke's favour, much less that he got it ratified by the states of the kingdom, as is affirmed by some. The will would have been known to all, and would have been produced by the Conqueror, to whom it gave so plausible, and really so just a title; but the doubtful and ambiguous manner in which he seems always to have mentioned it, proves that he could only plead the known intentions of that monarch in his favour, which he was so desirous to call a will. There is indeed a charter of the Conqueror preserved by Dr. Hickes, vol. I. where he calls himself rex hereditarius, meaning heir by will; but a prince, possessed of so much power, and attended with so much success, may employ what pretence he pleases: it is sufficient to refute his pretences to observe, that there is a great difference and variation among historians, with regard to a point which had it been real, must have been agreed upon by all of them.

Again, some historians, particularly Malmesbury and Matthew of Westminster, affirm, that Harold had no intention of going over to Normandy, but that taking the air in a pleasure-boat on the coast, he was driven over by stress of weather to the territories of Guy count of Ponthieu; but besides that this story is not probable in itself, and is denied by most of the ancient historians, it is contradicted by a very curious and authentic monument discovered within these few years. It is a tapestry preserved in the ducal place of Roüen, and supposed to have been wrought by the orders of Matilda, wife to the emperor, at least it is of very great antiquity. Harold is there represented as taking his departure from king Edward in execution of some commission, and mounting his vessel with a great train. The design of redeeming his brother and nephew, who were hostages, is the most likely cause that can be assigned; and is accordingly mentioned by Eadmar, Hoveden, Brompton, and Simeon of Durham. For a farther account of this piece of tapestry, see Histoire de l'Academie de Literature, tom. IX. p. 535.

Before we conclude the reign of Edward, we think it necessary to relate two private incidents of his life, which tend more strongly to evince his native indolence and facility of disposition than those public transactions which may justly be supposed to result from study and deliberation.

One day, as he was reposing himself on a couch, a servant, who did not know he was there, entered the room without perceiving the king; and repairing to a chest of money that was open, took out a part of its contents. Encouraged by the success of his first attempt, he returned in a few minutes; when the king, thinking to put a stop to his rapacity—"Boy," said he very calmly, "you had better rest satisfied with what you have got; for should Hugolin my chamberlain come and catch you, he will not only take from you what you first stole, but order you to be severely whipped."

Another time, as he was hunting, a sport to which he was greatly attached, an insolent peasant crossed the hounds for the express purpose of spoiling his diversion; upon which the king rode up to him in a violent passion, and exclaimed---"By our Lady, fellow, I would be revenged on thee, were it in my power!"

Upon the whole, we may conclude that, though Edward possessed few qualities which could entitle him to the appellation of a great monarch, he was endued with many that gave him a just claim to the more enviable title of a good man.

HAROLD II.

THE accession of Harold to the throne of England in January, 1066, was attended with as little opposition and disturbance, as if he had succeeded by the most clear and indisputable title. The citizens of London were his zealous partizans: the clergy had espoused his cause; and all the powerful nobility, connected with him by alliance or friendship, willingly seconded his pretensions. The title of Edgar Atheling was scarcely noticed; much less the claim of the duke of Normandy; and Harold, assembling his friends, received the crown from their hands, without waiting for the free deliberation of the states, or regularly submitting the question to their determination (k). If any were averse to this measure, they were obliged to conceal their sentiments; and the new prince, taking a general silence for consent, and founding his title on the supposed suffrages of the people, which appeared unanimous, was, on the day immediately succeeding Edward's death, crowned and anointed king, by Aldred archbishop of York, at the cathedral of St. Paul; and the whole nation seemed joyfully to acquiesce in this elevation.

The commencement of the reign of Harold was marked by many popular acts of government, which afforded ample testimony of his wisdom, and of a close attention to the rights and liberties of his subjects. He treated the clergy with a becoming deference, without paying a blind submission to their will. When he found them guilty of irregularities, he exercised a requisite severity; but did not fail to bestow the most signal marks of his royal favour on those whose conduct was suitable to their character, rewarding them by a confirmation of their charters, and a reasonable extension of their immunities. He enforced a most rigid and impartial administration of justice, commanded an attentive revision of the laws, and inflicted the most exemplary punishment on all robbers and violaters of the public tranquillity, whom the lenity of the late reign had rather encouraged than repressed. He conferred on Edgar Atheling the earldom of Oxford; cultivated the favour of the nobility by acts of kindness and friendship; eased the people of many burthensome taxes; and established such salutary regulations for the security of their property, that his authority was in no danger of being exposed to the dangerous attacks of domestic commotions; and, in order to defend his dominions from foreign invasion, he prepared a powerful fleet and army to repel any attempts that might be made on them.

The first symptoms of danger which the king discovered came from abroad, and from his own brother Tosti, who had submitted to a voluntary banishment in Flanders. Enraged at the successful ambition of Harold, to which he himself had fallen a victim, he filled the court of Baldwin with complaints of the injustice he had suffered: he engaged the interest of that family against his brother: he endeavoured to form intrigues with some of the discontented nobles in England: he sent his emissaries to Norway, in order to rouse the freebooters of that kingdom to arms, and to excite their hopes of reaping advantage from the unsettled state of affairs on the usurpation of the new king: and that he might render the combination more formidable, he made a journey to Normandy; in expectation that the duke, who had married Matilda, another daughter of Baldwin, would, in revenge of his own wrongs, as well as those of Tosti, second, by his counsels and forces, the projected invasion of England.

William duke of Normandy, when he first received intelligence of Harold's accession, had been moved to the highest pitch of indignation; but that he might give the better colour to his pretensions, he sent an embassy to England, upbraiding that prince with his breach of faith, and summoning him to resign instantly possession of the kingdom. Harold replied to the Norman ambassadors, that the oath, with which he was reproached, had been extorted by fear of personal violence, and therefore could never be regarded as obligatory: that he had had no commission, either from the late king or the states of England, who alone could dispose of the crown, to make any tender of the succession to the duke of Normandy; and if he, a private person, had assumed so much authority, and had even voluntarily sworn to support the duke's pretensions, the oath was unlawful, and it was his duty to seize the first opportunity of breaking it: that he had obtained the crown by the unanimous suffrages of the people; and should prove himself totally unworthy of their favour, did he not maintain those national liberties, with whose protection they had entrusted him: and that the duke, if he made any attempt by force of arms, should experience the power of an united nation, conducted by a prince, who, sensible of the obligations imposed on him by the royal dignity, was determined that the same moment which might put a period to his government should put an end to his life.

This answer was no other than William expected; and therefore he made the most formidable preparations for war. Consulting only his courage, his resentment, and his ambition, he overlooked all the difficulties inseparable from an attack on a great kingdom by such inferior force, and he saw only the circumstances which would facilitate his enterprize. He considered that England, ever since the accession of Canute, had enjoyed profound tranquillity, during a period of nearly half a century; and it would require time for its soldiers, enervated by long peace, to learn discipline, and its generals experience. He knew that it was entirely unprovided with fortified towns, by which it could prolong the war; but must venture its whole fortune in one decisive action against a veteran enemy, who, being once master of the field, would be in a condition to overrun the kingdom. He saw that Harold, though he had given proofs of vigour and bravery, had newly mounted a throne, which he had acquired by faction, from which he had excluded a very ancient royal family, and which was likely to totter under him by its own instability, much more if shaken by any violent external impulse. And he hoped, that the very circumstance of his crossing the sea, quitting his own country, and leaving himself no hopes of retreat; as it would astonish the enemy by the boldness of the undertaking, would inspirit his soldiers by despair, and rouse them to sustain the reputation of the Norman arms.

The Normans had been long distinguished by valour among the European nations, and at this time had attained to the highest pitch of military glory. Besides dismembering France of such a noble territory as Neustria; besides defending it against the unremitted attempts of the French monarch and all its neighbours; besides exerting many acts of vigour under their present sovereign; they had, about this very time, revived their ancient fame, by the most hazardous exploits, and the most wonderful successes, in the other extremity of Europe. About the beginning of this century, a few Norman pilgrims, on their return from Jerusalem, having stopped at the town of Salermo in Italy, found it invested by a numerous army of Saracens; while the dispirited inhabitants, unable to defend themselves, were bargaining for their ransom. The Normans, enraged to find a spirit of cowardice prevail where confidence and vigour might have promoted success, immediately repaired to the governor, and made an offer offer to expel the enemy from his territories. Their services were joyfully accepted; and the succeeding night was fixed on for putting their promises in execution. Accordingly, about midnight, they boldly sallied from the town, to the number of sixty, accompanied by a few of the inhabitants, who had offered themselves as volunteers; and, attacking the camp of the enemy, put some thousands of the Saracens to the sword; while those who could escape the carnage, retired to their ships with precipitation, and instantly put to sea. The fame of this action was diffused all over Europe; and the pilgrims returning to Normandy, inspired their countrymen with such a spirit of emulation, that a numerous band of adventurers, under the command of Osmond, who was banished his country for murder, prepared to embark for Italy, with the view of enlisting in the service of the different princes, then engaged in a war with the Saracens. The success of this band induced others to follow; and, in the course of half a century, the Normans became so numerous in Italy, that having expelled not only the Saracens, but the Greeks and Germans, who had made inroads into the country, they subdued the Italians themselves; and taking possession of an extensive territory, laid the foundation of the kingdom of Naples and the Two Sicilies. These enterprizes of men, who were all of them vassals in Normandy, many of them banished for faction and rebellion, excited the ambition of William; who disdained, after such examples of fortune and valour, to be deterred from making an attack on a neighbouring country, where he could be supported by the whole force of his dominions.

The situation also of Europe inspired William with hopes, that, besides his brave Normans, he might employ against England the flower of the military force which was dispersed in all the neighbouring states. France, Germany, and the Low Countries, by the progress of the feudal institutions, were divided and subdivided into many principalities and baronies; and the possessors, enjoying the civil jurisdiction within themselves, as well as the right of arms, acted, in many respects, as independent sovereigns, and maintained their properties and privileges less by the authority of laws than by their own force and valour. A military spirit had universally diffused itself throughout Europe; and the several leaders, whose minds were elevated by their princely situation, embraced the most hazardous enterprizes with avidity; and being accustomed to nothing from their infancy but recitals of the success attending wars and battles, they were prompted by a natural ambition to imitate those adventurers, which they heard so much celebrated, and which were so much exaggerated by the credulity of the age. United, however loosely, by their duty to one superior lord, and by their connexions with the great body of the community to which they belonged, they desired to spread their fame each beyond his own district; and in all assemblies, whether instituted for civil deliberations, for military expeditions, or merely for shew and entertainment, to outvie each other by the reputation of strength and prowess. Hence their genius for chivalry; hence their impatience of peace and tranquillity; and hence their readiness to embark in any dangerous enterprize, how little soever interested in its failure or success.

William, by his power, his courage, and his abilities, had long maintained a pre-eminence among those haughty chieftains; and every one who desired to signalize himself by his address in military exercises, or his valour in action, had been ambitious of acquiring a reputation in the court and in the armies of Normandy. Entertained with that hospitality and courtesy which distinguished the age, they had formed attachments with the prince, and greedily attended to the prospects of the signal glory and elevation which he promised them in return for their concurrence in an expedition against England. The more grandeur there appeared in the attempt, the more it suited their romantic spirit: the fame of the intended invasion was already diffused in all directions: multitudes crowded to tender their service to the duke, together with that of their vassals and retainers; and William found less difficulty in completing his levies, than in chusing the most veteran forces, and in rejecting the offers of those who were impatient to acquire fame under so renowned a warrior.

Besides these advantages, which William owed to his personal valour and good conduct; he was indebted to fortune for procuring him some assistance, and also for removing many obstacles which he naturally expected in an undertaking, in which all his neighbours were so deeply interested. Conan, count of Britanny, was his inveterate foe: in order to throw a damp upon the duke's enterprize, he chose this conjuncture for reviving his claim to Normandy itself; and required, that in case of William's success against England, the possession of that duchy should devolve to him. But Conan died suddenly after making this demand; and Hoel, his successor, instead of adopting the malignity of his predecessor, zealously seconded the duke's views, and sent his eldest son, Alain Fergeant, to serve under him with a body of five thousand Bretons. The counts of Anjou, Poictou, Maine, and Boulogne, also engaged to supply him with troops and transports, on condition of being repaid for their services by a stipulated portion of land after the conquest of England; and even the court of France, though it might justly fear the aggrandizement of so dangerous a vassal, pursued not its interests on this occasion with sufficient vigour and resolution. Philip I. the reigning monarch, was a minor; and William, having communicated his project to the council, having desired assistance, and offered to do homage, in case of his success, for the crown of England, was indeed openly ordered to lay aside all thoughts of the expedition; but the earl of Flanders, his father-in-law, being at the head of the regency, favoured under-hand his levies, and secretly encouraged the adventurous nobility to enlist under the standard of the Norman duke.

The emperor of Germany, Henry IV. besides openly giving his vassals permission to embark in this expedition, which so much engaged the attention of Europe, promised his protection to the duchy of Normandy during the absence of the prince, and thereby enabled him to employ his whole force in the invasion of England. But the most important ally, whom William gained by his negociations, was the pope, who had a mighty influence over the ancient barons, no less devout in their religious principles, than valorous in their military exploits. The Roman pontiff, after an insensible progress during several ages of darkness and ignorance, began now to lift his head openly above all the princes of Europe; to assume the office of a mediator, or even an arbiter, in the quarrels of the greatest monarchs; to interpose in all secular affairs; and to obtrude his dictates as sovereign laws on his obsequious disciples. It was a sufficient motive to Alexander II. the reigning pope, for embracing William's quarrel, that he had made an appeal to his tribunal, and rendered him umpire of the dispute between him and Harold; but there were other advantages which that pontiff foresaw must result from the conquest of England by the Normans. That kingdom, though at first converted by Romish missionaries, though it had afterwards advanced some farther steps towards subjection to Rome, maintained still a considerable independence in its ecclesiastical administration; and forming a world within itself, entirely separated from the rest of Europe, it had hitherto proved inaccessible to those exorbitant claims which supported the grandeur of the papacy. Alexander therefore hoped, that the French and Norman barons, if successful in their enterprize, might import into that country a more devoted reverence to the holy see, and bring the English churches to a nearer conformity with those of the continent. He declared immediately in favour of William's claim; pronounced Harold a perjured usurper; denounced excommunication against him and his adherents; and the more to encourage the duke of Normandy in his undertaking, he sent him a consecrated banner, and a ring with one of St. Peter's hairs in it. Thus were all the ambition and violence of that invasion covered over safely with the broad mantle of religion.

The greatest difficulty which William had to encounter in his preparations, arose from his own subjects in Normandy. The states of the duchy were assembled at Lisle-bonne; and supplies being demanded for the intended enterprize, which promised so much glory and advantage to their country, there appeared a reluctance in many members, both to grant sums so much beyond the common measure of taxes in that age, and to set a precedent of performing their military service at a distance from their own country. The duke, finding it dangerous to solicit them in a body, conferred separately with the richest individuals in the province; and beginning with those on whose affections he most relied, he gradually engaged all of them to advance the sums demanded. The count of Longueville seconded him in this negociation; as did the count of Mortaigne, Odo bishop of Baieux (brother to the duke,) and especially William Fitz-Osborne, count of Breteuil, and constable of the duchy. Every person, when he himself was once engaged, endeavoured to bring over others; and at last the states themselves, after stipulating that this concession should be no precedent, voted that they would assist their prince to the utmost in his intended expedition.

William had by this time collected a fleet of three thousand vessels, and assembled an army of sixty thousand men; among whom were more than five thousand nobles, four hundred and fifty of whom were of the first rank. The most celebrated were Guy, count of Ponthieu; Alain Fergeant, count of Dol; Amaury, viscount of Thouars; the lords of Vetré, Châteaugiron, Gael, and Loheac; all of them Bretons. The chief of the Normans were Odo, bishop of Baieux; the count of Mortaigne, and his son Geoffrey de Rotrou; Roger, count of Beaumont, and his son Robert; the count of Longueville; with the lords of Avranches, Touques, Etouteville, Arques, Gournay, and St. Sauveur de Cotentin, an old general of eighty, who was resolved to terminate a life of glory in the field of honour. There were also Eustace, count of Boulogne; Hugh, count of Estaples; William Fitz-Richard, count of Evreux; William de Warrenne; Hugh de Grentmesnil; Charles Martel; Roger de Montgomery; and Walter Giffard. To these courageous chieftains William promised the spoils of England, as a reward for their valour; and, pointing to the British coast, told them that was the field in which they must render their names immortal, and procure themselves honourable establishments.

While he was making these immense preparations, the duke, that he might increase the number of Harold's enemies, excited the inveterate rancour of Tosti, and encouraged him, in concert with Harold Harfager, king of Norway, to infest the coasts of England. Tosti, having collected about sixty vessels in the ports of Flanders, put to sea; and after committing some depredations on the south and east coasts, about the beginning of September, he sailed to Northumberland, where he was joined by Harfager, who came over with an armament of three hundred sail. The combined fleets entered the Humber, and disembarked the troops, who began to extend their depredations on all sides; when Morcar earl of Northumberland, and Edwin earl of Mercia, the king's brothers-in-law, having hastily collected some forces, ventured to oppose their progress; and the two armies meeting at Fulford near York, on the 19th of September, an obstinate engagement ensued; but the numbers and discipline of the enemy at length prevailing, the English sustained a total defeat.

The Norwegians then marched to York, which was compelled to open its gates to them: but their triumph was of short duration; for Harold, being apprized of their descent, marched with an army to the protection of his people, who flocked to his standard from all quarters; so that by the time he reached the enemy he found himself in a condition to give them battle. The action took place on the 24th of September, near Stanford Bridge, since called Battle Bridge, situated on the river Derwent, at a small distance from York. Here the Norwegians had thrown up strong entrenchments, and taken possession of an advantageous post on the opposite banks of the river, being masters of the only bridge by which they could possibly be attacked. When Harold approached, he saw that this important passage must be gained at all events; and therefore ordered the attack to be made without delay. The Norwegians long defended the bridge with great courage; but were at last compelled to yield to the more vigorous efforts of the English. A single Norwegian, however, is said, by many historians, to have maintained his post against the whole army of the English for a considerable time. Brompton affirms, that he killed forty men with his own hand, and continued to fight till slain by an arrow. When Harold had gained possession of the bridge, he crossed the river with his army, and attacked the enemy in their entrenchments. The battle lasted from seven in the morning till three in the afternoon, and was sustained with obstinate valour on both sides; but the English obtained a decisive victory. Both Harfager and Tosti were slain, and almost the whole of the Norwegian army cut to pieces. All the spoils which they had made were retaken; and their whole fleet fell into the hands of Harold, who generously granted prince Olaus, the son of Harfager, his liberty, and suffered him to depart with twenty vessels. But Harold had scarcely time to rejoice for this victory when he received intelligence that the duke of Normandy was landed with a powerful army on the southern coast.

The Norman fleet and army had been assembled, early in the summer, at the mouth of the small river Dive, and all the troops had been instantly embarked; but the winds proved long contrary, and detained them in that harbour. The authority, however, of the duke, the good discipline maintained among the seamen and soldiers, and the great care in supplying them with provisions, had prevented any disorder; when at last the wind became favourable, and enabled them to sail along the coast, till they reached St. Valori. There were, however, several vessels lost in this short passage; and as the wind again proved contrary, the army began to imagine that Heaven had declared against them, and that, notwithstanding the pope's benediction, they were destined to certain destruction. These bold warriors, who despised real dangers, were very subject to the dread of imaginary ones; and many of them began to mutiny, some of them even to desert their colours; when the duke, in order to support their drooping hopes, ordered a procession to be made with the reliques of St. Valori, and prayers to be said for more favourable weather. The wind fortunately changed: and as this incident happened on the eve of the feast of St. Michael, the tutelar saint of Normandy, the soldiers, fancying they saw the finger of Providence in all these concurring circumstances, set out with great alacrity: they met with no opposition on their passage: a great fleet, which Harold had assembled, and which had cruised all summer off the Isle of Wight, had been dismissed, on his receiving false intelligence that William, discouraged by contrary winds and other accidents, had laid aside his preparations. The Norman armament, proceeding in great order, arrived, without any material loss, at Pevensey in Sussex; and the army disembarked without opposition. The duke himself, as he leaped on shore, happened to stumble and fall; but had the presence of mind, it is said, to turn this omen, which might otherwise have discouraged his superstitious forces, to his advantage, by calling aloud that he had thus taken possession of the country. And a soldier, running to a neighbouring cottage, plucked some thatch, which, as if giving him seizine of the kingdom, he presented to his general. The joy and alacrity of William and his whole army was great, and they were in nowise dismayed when they heard of Harold's victory over the Norwegians.

After a short stay at Pevensey, he marched along the sea coast to Hastings; where he caused a fort to be erected, and published a manifesto, containing the motives which induced him to invade the island, in hopes that some of the English might be prevailed upon to espouse his cause. He declared that he came to revenge the death of prince Alfred, brother to Edward; to effect the restoration of Robert the Norman to the see of Canterbury; and to assist the English in inflicting a punishment on Harold for having usurped the crown, in direct violation of the oath he had taken at the Norman court. Reasons more frivolous and absurd could not well have been suggested: it is not surprizing, therefore, that they were not able to procure him a single partizan (l).

Harold's victory over the Norwegians, though great and honourable had proved in the main prejudicial to his interests, and may be regarded as the immediate cause of his ruin. He lost many of his bravest officers and soldiers in the action; and he disgusted the rest, by refusing to distribute the Norwegian spoils among them: a conduct which was little agreeable to his usual generosity of temper; but which his desire of sparing the people, in the war that impended over him from the duke of Normandy, had probably occasioned. He hastened, by quick marches, to reach this new invader; but though he was reinforced at London and other places with fresh troops, he found himself also weakened by the desertion of his old soldiers, who from fatigue and discontent secretly withdrew from their colours. His brother Girth, a man of bravery and conduct, began to entertain apprehensions of the event; and remonstrated with the king, that it would be better policy to prolong the war; at least, to spare his own person in the action. He urged to him, that the desperate situation of the duke of Normandy made it requisite for that prince to bring matters to a speedy decision, and put his whole fortune on the issue of a single battle; but that (l) It is worthy of remark, that in this manifesto not the smallest mention was made of any will executed, or intended to be executed, by Edward, in favour of William, nor even of any verbal promise, though it is natural to suppose that William would not have neglected to promulgate every possible reason that could tend to afford the smallest colour of justice to his pretensions. See above, p. 60. note (k).

the king of England, in his own country, beloved by his subjects, provided with every supply, had more certain and less dangerous means of ensuring to himself the victory: that the Norman troops, elated on the one hand with the highest hopes, and seeing, on the other, no resource in case of a discomfiture, would fight to the last extremity; and being the flower of all the warriors of the continent, must be regarded as formidable to the English: that if the first fire, which is always the most dangerous, were allowed to languish for want of action; if they were harassed with small skirmishes, straitened in provisions, and fatigued with the bad weather and deep roads during the winter season, which was approaching, they must fall an easy and a bloodless prey to their enemy: that if a general action were delayed, the English, sensible of the imminent danger to which their properties, as well as liberties, were exposed from those rapacious invaders, would hasten from all quarters to his assistance, and would render his army invincible: that, at least, if he thought it necessary to hazard a battle, he ought not to expose his own person; but reserve, in case of disastrous accidents, some resource to the liberty and independence of the kingdom: and that having once been so unfortunate as to be constrained to swear, and that upon the holy reliques, to support the pretensions of the duke of Normandy, it were better that the command of the army should be entrusted to another, who, not being bound by those sacred ties, might give the soldiers more assured hopes of a prosperous issue to the combat.

These remonstrances, though founded in prudence, were rejected by Harold; who, elated with his past prosperity, as well as stimulated by his native courage, resolved to give battle in person; and for that purpose drew near to the Normans, who had removed their camp and fleet to Hastings, where they fixed their quarters. He was so confident of success, that he sent a message to the duke, promising him a sum of money if he would depart the kingdom without effusion of blood; but his offer was rejected with disdain; and William, not to be behind with his enemy in vaunting, sent him a message by some monks, requiring him either to resign the kingdom, or to hold it of him in fealty, or to submit their cause to the arbitration of the pope, or to fight him in single combat. Harold replied, that the God of battles would soon be the arbiter of all their differences.

The English and Normans now prepared themselves for this important decision; but the aspect of things, on the night before the battle, was very different in the two camps. The English spent the time in riot, and jollity, and disorder; the Normans in silence, and in prayer, and in the other functions of their religion. On the morning, the duke called together the most considerable of his commanders, and made them a speech suitable to the occasion. He represented to them, that the event, which they and he had long wished for, was approaching; the whole fortune of the war now depended on their swords, and would be decided in a single action: that never army had greater motives for exerting a vigorous courage, whether they considered the prize which would attend their victory, or the inevitable destruction which must ensue upon their discomfiture: that if their martial and veteran bands could once break those raw soldiers, who had rashly dared to approach them, they conquered a kingdom at one blow, and were justly entitled to all its possessions as the reward of their prosperous valour: that, on the contrary, if they remitted in the least their wonted prowess, an enraged enemy hung upon their rear, the sea met them in their retreat, and an ignominious death was the certain punishment of their imprudent cowardice: that, by collecting so numerous and brave a host, he had ensured every human means of conquest; and the commander of the enemy, by his criminal conduct, had given him just cause to hope for the favour of the Almighty, in whose hands alone lay the event of wars and battles: and that a perjured usurper, anathematized by the sovereign pontiff, and conscious of his own breach of faith, would be struck with terror on their appearance, and would prognosticate to himself that fate which his multiplied crimes had so justly merited. The duke next divided his army into three lines: the first, led by Montgomery, consisted of archers and light-armed infantry: the second, commanded by Martel, was composed of his bravest battalions, heavy-armed, and ranged in close order: his cavalry, at whose head he placed himself, formed the third line; and were so disposed, that they stretched beyond the infantry, and flanked each wing of the army. He ordered the signal of battle to be given; and the whole army, moving at once, and singing the hymn or song of Roland, the famous peer of Charlemagne, advanced in order and with alacrity towards the enemy.

Harold had seized the advantage of a rising ground, and having likewise drawn some trenches to secure his flanks, he resolved to stand upon the defensive, and to avoid all action with the cavalry, in which he was inferior. The Kentish men were placed in the van; a post which they had always claimed as their due: the Londoners guarded the standard; and the king himself, accompanied by his two valiant brothers, Girth and Leofwin, dismounting, placed himself at the head of his infantry, and expressed his resolution to conquer, or to perish in the attempt. The first attack of the Normans was desperate, but was received with equal valour by the English; and after a furious combat, which remained long undecided, the former, overcome by the difficulty of the ground, and hard pressed by the enemy, began first to relax their vigour, then to retreat; and confusion was spreading among the ranks, when William, who found himself on the brink of destruction, hastened with a select band to the relief of his dismayed forces. His presence restored the action; the English were obliged to retire with loss; and the duke, ordering his second line to advance, renewed the attack with fresh forces, and with redoubled courage. Finding that the enemy, aided by the advantage of ground, and animated by the example of their prince, still made a vigorous resistance, he had recourse to a stratagem, which was very delicate in its management, but which seemed advisable in its desperate situation, where, if he gained not a decisive victory, he was completely undone: he commanded his troops to make a hasty retreat, and to allure the enemy from their ground by the appearance of flight. The artifice succeeded, and the English followed the Normans into the plain. William gave orders, that at once the infantry should face about upon their pursuers, and the cavalry make an assault upon their wings, and both of them pursue the advantage, which the surprize and terror of the enemy must give them in that critical juncture. The English were repulsed with great slaughter, and driven back to the hill; where, being rallied by the bravery of Harold, they were able, notwithstanding their loss, to maintain the post, and continue the combat. The duke tried the same stratagem a second time with the same success; but even after this double advantage, he still found a great body of the English, who, maintaining themselves in firm array, seemed determined to dispute the victory to the last extremity. He ordered his heavy-armed infantry to make an assault upon them; while his archers, placed behind, should gall the enemy, who were exposed by the situation of the ground, and who were intent in defending themselves against the swords and spears of the assailants. By this disposition he at last prevailed: Harold was slain by an arrow, which entering the eye, penetrated his brain, while he was combating with great bravery at the head of his troops: his two brothers shared the same fate; and the English, discouraged by the fall of those princes, gave ground on all sides, and were pursued with great slaughter by the victorious Normans. A few troops, however, of the vanquished had still the courage to turn upon their pursuers; and attacking them in deep and miry ground, obtained some revenge for the slaughter and dishonour of the day. But the appearance of the duke obliged them to seek their safety by flight; and darkness saved them from any farther pursuit of the enemy.

Thus was gained by William, duke of Normandy, the great and decisive victory of Hastings, on the 14th of October, 1066, after a battle which was fought from morning till sunset, and which seemed worthy, by the heroic valour displayed by both armies, and by both commanders, to decide the fate of a mighty kingdom. William had three horses killed under him; and there fell near fifteen thousand men on the side of the Normans: the loss was still more considerable on that of the vanquished; besides the death of the king and his two brothers. The succeeding morning his soldiers were employed in burying their dead; while the neighbouring peasants were allowed to perform the same sad office to their mangled countrymen. The body of Harold, defaced with wounds, was discovered with difficulty, and carried to William, who ordered it to be restored without a ransom, together with those of his brothers Girth and Leofwin, to their mother Githa, by whom it was interred, with due honours, in the Abbey of Waltham, which Harold himself had founded.

Thus

Thus perished Harold, in defence of his own rights, and those of his subjects, against the lawless ambition of a foreign usurper. Though he prepared his way to the throne by unjustifiable attempts to acquire popularity, yet he certainly enjoyed it by the best of all possible titles—the unanimous suffrages of the people; and the wisdom and equity of his administration, during his short reign of nine months and nine days, proved him truly worthy of the elevated station to which he had been raised. Harold, doubtless, possessed many virtues; and though resolute and undaunted in the hour of danger, he was liberal, affable, and humane.

Harold was twice married.—By his first wife, whose name is unknown, he had three sons, Edmund, Godwin, and Magnus, who retired into Ireland after the death of their father. By his second wife, Edgiva, sister of Morcar and Edwin, he had a son named Wulf, who was afterwards knighted by William Rufus; and two daughters, the eldest of whom, Gunilda, being deprived of her sight, retired to a nunnery, where she remained till her death: the youngest was married to Waldemar, king of Russia; by whom she had a daughter, who was married to Waldemar, king of Denmark.

The death of Harold put an end to the dominion of the Anglo-Saxons in England, which had been continued for more than six hundred years since the accession of Hengist, the first monarch of Kent.

CHAP. IV.

History of the ENGLISH CHURCH, from the Union of the Heptarchy under EGBERT to the NORMAN INVASION—Brief View of the State of LEARNING.

ON the dissolution of the Heptarchy, in 827, the ecclesiastical bodies of the different kingdoms had reason to expect, that the union of the church under one temporal head would conduce to the interests of that establishment, in the same proportion in which the coalition of the several states would tend to the general benefit of the united nation. The event did not deviate from these expectations. But the flourishing state of the church was soon impaired by the invasion of the Danes, who were Pagans, and made a practice of plundering and burning the churches and monasteries, and who committed the most inhuman acts of unprovoked cruelty on the clergy, whom they frequently massacred with barbarous triumph. The constant repetition of their ravages proved detrimental to the church in other respects, by checking the spirit of agriculture, and impoverishing the people, who were consequently incapacitated from contributing to the maintenance of their clerical instructors. The parochial priests were unable to procure the regular allowance to which they were entitled; and such of the monks as were spared by the invaders, entered into a military or mechanical life, or fled to the continent. These disorders did not take place in their full extent till the reign of Ethelred I. when the Danes penetrated further into the inland parts of the kingdom than they had before done, and reduced the people to misery and despair. In the time of his successor Alfred, they repeated their devastations with such ferocious perseverance, that, notwithstanding all the efforts of that able prince for the deliverance of his country, both the church and state were violently convulsed: but, after his great victory at Eddington, in 878, a new scene presented itself. The churches were rebuilt; new monasteries were founded; and those which had not been entirely destroyed underwent a substantial repair. The ecclesiastical laws, which could not be properly enforced amidst the rage of extensive hostilities, were renewed, augmented, and improved. And, as learning was then at a low ebb, to which the distractions of the times had greatly contributed, the revival of it, particularly among the ministers of religion, employed a great portion of Alfred's attention. He filled the bishoprics and other preferments with men of competent literature, among whom Grimbald, (a French monk,) Asser of St. David's, (the writer of Alfred's life,) Plegmund archbishop of Canterbury, St. Neot the abbot, Werefrid and Wulfrig, bishops of Worcester and London, were the most distinguished.

In the reign of Alfred's son Edward, the king and his people are said to have been excommunicated by the pope, for suffering some bishoprics to continue several years unfilled. However this be, the king did not only fill up the vacant prelacies, but erected three new bishoprics, one at Crediton, another at Padstow, and the third at Wells, in 909. The Northumbrian and East-Anglian Danes having deserted Christianity in this prince's reign, at the time of their revolting from his authority, he testified his regard for that religion by making their re-conversion one of the conditions on which he granted them peace.

Athelstan, the successor of Edward the Elder, was not inattentive to the prosperity of the church. He held several councils for the regulation of ecclesiastical affairs, in one of which, in 928, the payment of tithes to the clergy was strictly enjoined. Hence we may suppose that king Ethelwulf's ordinance for that purpose had not been sufficiently observed; and the new edict does not appear to have met with general acquiescence, as the same point was afterwards strongly inculcated by Odo archbishop of Canterbury, in a collection of canons which he published in his capacity of primate, in 943. In the following year, some ecclesiastical statutes were promulgated with a better sanction than the sole authority of the metropolitan; a great council, consisting both of clergy and laity, being convoked by Edmund at London. One of the canons of this council ordained, that the tithes, church-scot, and alms-fee (m), should be regularly paid to the clergy on pain of excommunication; whence it appears, that the tenth part of the produce of the land was not deemed sufficient, but that eleemosynary fees and church-scot were still required. In a subsequent assembly convened by this monarch, in 946, some matrimonial regulations were enacted, though this was rather an enforcement of former customs, than the introduction of any novelties. It was ordered, that whoever wished to enter into the state of matrimony, should first obtain the consent of the lady's guardian (for every woman was subject to the guardianship or protection of a person of the opposite sex;) that he should give security for the proper treatment of his future wife; that he should immediately settle a certain dowry on her, of which she might retain the usufruct during marriage; and that he should then fix the amount of her jointure; with respect to which, the synod recommended half the husband's estate as not more than an adequate settlement. After these stipulations, for which securities were given, the nuptial ceremony was performed by the mass-priest. It was a custom more generally observed than at present, for all the relatives of the bride and bridegroom, within the third degree of consanguinity, testified their satisfaction by presents proportioned to their circumstances; and, at the same time, the bride's guardian (who was her father, or, in case of his death, her elder brother, otherwise the nearest male kinsman) presented the bridegroom with his wife's fortune.

In the reign of Edred, the rigid rules of St. Benedict were introduced into some of the English monasteries by the influence of the celebrated St. Dunstan, abbot of Glastonbury, who had reduced that devout prince under the most implicit subjection. The views of this aspiring priest were indeed checked by Edwy, the successor of Edred, by whom he was banished; but, in the reign of Edgar, he shone after his eclipse with redoubled lustre. On the death of Odo (n), in 958, who had been a warm advocate for Dunstan's scheme of making celibacy an indispensable requisite of the monkish character, Elfsin

(m) The church-scot, was a tax of a Saxon penny on every house rented at thirty pence, and it increased in a regular proportion. The alms-fee was a certain offering which the clergy annually required of the laity.

(n) The conduct of the clergy in the unhappy times of which we are speaking, exclusive of their readiness to profit by the ignorance of the laity, seems to have been swayed by a spirit of violence and rapine, and wholly devoid of that meekness and humility which a strict attention to the three principles of the Christian religion could not have failed to inspire. The justice of this accusation is amply evinced by the following passage from "The Constitutions of Odo," archbishop of Canterbury, which were published in the year 943.—"I strictly command and charge," says that haughty and tyrannical primate, "that no man presume to lay any tax on the possessions of the clergy, who are the sons of God, as the sons of God ought to be exempt from all earthly impositions in every kingdom of the globe. If any man shall dare to disobey the discipline of the church in this particular, he will be possessed of more wickedness and presumption than the soldiers who crucified Christ. I command the king, the princes, and all those who are in authority, to obey, with great humility, the archbishops and bishops, for they have the keys of the kingdom of Heaven."—A more imperious and arrogant rhapsody scarcely ever fell from the pen of an ecclesiastical despot!

bishop of Winchester was translated by Edwy to the primacy; but this prelate dying while he was on his journey to Rome for the pall, Brithelm was preferred, in 959, by the same prince, from the see of Wells to that of Canterbury. The new primate, however, being hostile to the encroachments of the Benedictine monks on the married clergy, who were on the point of being ejected by Dunstan from the monasteries and cathedrals, for which marriage had not hitherto been regarded as a disqualification, all the artifice and interest of that intriguing abbot were employed to remove Brithelm from his metropolitan dignity. Edgar, whose revolt against his brother had been cordially encouraged by the monks, remembered their exertions with gratitude, after he had obtained the full sovereignty of England by the death of Edwy; and was eager to serve their leader Dunstan, in whose favour he consented to the deposition of Brithelm, in 960, as a prelate who was destitute of that knowledge, spirit, and ability, which the important station of primate required.

The principal feature of the ecclesiastical government under archbishop Dunstan, was the expulsion of the married clergy from the monastic foundations; a design which was attended with such success, that, by the end of Edgar's reign, there was scarcely a monastery unfilled with Benedictine monks, the professed followers of a life of celibacy. In this reign, several councils were holden, in one of which the annual payment of Peter-pence was enjoined under a heavy penalty. In another synod, a great number of penitential canons, supposed to have been framed by Dunstan himself, were enacted; some of which are pregnant with the grossest absurdity and superstition.

The progress of the dispute between the monks and secular clergy, and the methods pursued by Dunstan in the reign of Edward the Martyr so fully promoted the triumph of the former over the latter, that it is hardly necessary to observe, that the monasteries to the southward of the Humber were at length completely appropriated to unmarried ecclesiastics (o).

The long reign of Ethelred II. was particularly unfortunate, both with regard to the church and state. While the renewal of Danish invasions convulsed and impoverished the kingdom, the payment of ecclesiastical dues could not be expected to proceed in a regular train; and the plundering and burning of the churches and monasteries augmented the distress of the clergy, who at the same time lost many individuals of their order by the sword of the Danes. After a series of destructive ravages, the metropolitan city of Canterbury was invested by these barbarians, and taken on the twentieth day of the siege, its capture being accelerated by the treachery of an archdeacon named Elmer. The greater part of it was reduced to ashes; and nine-tenths of the inhabitants, whether monks, secular priests, or lay citizens, were massacred in various modes of torture. Alphage, who then filled the archiepiscopal see, was carried in fetters on board the Danish fleet; and when he had remained in confinement for seven months, he was murdered in a council of chieftains, in 1012, because he was either unwilling or unable to pay the sum of three thousand pounds, which they demanded for his ransom.

The return of peace, on the accession of Canute, in 1017, contributed to the retrieval of the affairs of the church. That prince was a zealous promoter, in his new dominions, of the interests of religion. He procured the enactment of many ecclesiastical laws: he erected several new churches, and repaired the ruined monasteries: he increased the endowments of some of these foundations, and confirmed the privileges which they had before enjoyed: he assumed the deportment of a pious Christian, that his example might encourage the devotions of his people. Egelnoth, the second archbishop of Canterbury after Alphage, was in high favour with this monarch, whose views for the benefit of the church he prompted by his advice and exhortations.

Among the canons enacted in the reign of Canute, there were some extremely favourable to priests; it being ordained by one, in particular, that if a priest should be accused of a crime by only three persons, he should be at liberty to purge himself by his single oath at mass; and that, if he should have six accusers, his own oath, taken at the eucharist, should be corroborated by similar attestations from two other priests. In the former of these contingencies, the escape depended solely on the conscience of the delinquent, who would not perhaps be very scrupulous of adding perjury to his prior offence; and, in the latter case, he might easily, in an age when breaches of faith and violations of conscience were frequent, procure two individuals of his own fraternity to join in his exculpation. Another canon, however, which was adopted by the same council, was less indulgent to his priestly order, as it enjoined celibacy to the clergy in general, but more particularly to priests. This statute, being inimical to the animal propensities of our nature, appears to have been little regarded, as it required occasional enforcement in succeeding times.

From this time to the invasion of England by William duke of Normandy, few facts of moment occur in the annals of the English church. The reign of Edward the Confessor produced, indeed, some variations in the laws by which it was governed; but, of the canons now extant which are justly attributed to him, neither the novelty nor the importance can be deemed sufficient to claim the attention of the general reader. The attachment of the prince to the Normans, and their continental neighbours, induced him to favour them in the disposal of ecclesiastical preferments. He elevated Robert of Jumieges, a man of learning and ability, to the bishopric of London, whence he translated him to the see of Canterbury: he preferred two other Normans, William and Wulf, to the sees of London and Dorchester: he conferred on Herman, a Fleming, the bishopric of Ramsbury, which was soon united to that of Sherborne, for the emolument of this foreigner: he promoted to the sees of Crediton and Padstow one Leofric, a native of Lorrain, who immediately removed his episcopal seat to Exeter, and gave an early display of his authority by the expulsion of the monks from the abbey of St. Peter, in that city, in whose room he substituted secular clergy or canons. Robert was afterwards expelled by the interest of earl Godwin, in 1051, as were also Wulf and William, though the mild virtues of the last mentioned ecclesiastic soon procured his restoration to his prelacy; and some are of opinion that Wulf was permitted to return to his see.

Edward, being a prince of a religious turn of mind, was strongly disposed to augment the endowments of the church, and extend the privileges of the clergy; and his favours and benefactions to their order, added to those which so many of his predecessors had conferred on them, were highly detrimental to the state. The ecclesiastical lands being exempt from taxation, the government lost those considerable contributions which would have been reaped from the same property, if it had continued in the hands of the laity; and the only return which the nation received for this dereliction of a fair claim, consisted of the prayers of the clergy for public success, offered up with all the mummery of superstition, at a time when actual service was most essentially requisite (p). If the assertion of an eminent antiquary be true, that the clergy

(o) St. Dunstan died in 988, leaving behind him the character of the most active and enterprising churchman that had appeared in England since the days of Wilfred, bishop of York. Making every reasonable deduction from the very pompous and extravagant encomiums which the monkish authors have lavished on the memory of this celebrated ecclesiastic, we may conclude that he was a man of talent and address, possessed of some mechanical ingenuity, and not unskilled in the learning of the times; that he was ambitious, violent, and vindictive; that he had little piety, and less virtue; and was more studious of the aggrandizement of his own order than of the general interests of the kingdom.

(p) Superstition indeed seems to have been at its height during the former part of the eleventh century. It may be in some measure accounted for from the general ignorance which pervaded the kingdom, and from the vast increase and astonishing influence of the monks. The consequence of this degenerate spirit was natural. A scrupulous observance of external ceremonies was deemed an ample discharge of religious duty; hoards of reliques were more highly valued than precepts of morality; munificence to the clergy was more strongly inculcated than charity to mankind; and a pilgrimage to Rome was regarded as the ne plus ultra of fervent piety. So great was the concourse of English vagrants, during this period, who repaired to that metropolis of bigotry, that the revenues of those princes whose territories lay on the road from England to Rome received an important increase from the mere exaction of tolls. That city was also the grand emporium for the toys of superstition, of which the pope and his clergy were furnished with inexhaustible stores. The cross was disposed of by retail, at an exorbitant price, to kings, princes, and prelates, whose fortunes were as great as their credulity; and such was the pious eagerness of the purchasers, that as much of it was disposed of in the course of two centuries, as would have sufficed to build a formidable fleet! The limbs of the apostles were likewise reserved for persons of opulence and distinction, though as many of them were constantly kept ready for sale as would have amply supplied all the cabinets of Europe! but the venders seem to have acted on that wary principle of commerce which forbids them to overstock the market, lest the value of the commodity should suffer diminution: subordinate bigots were therefore compelled to be satisfied with the limbs of subordinate saints. Some idea of the value of these clergy had a third part of the cultivated lands of the whole kingdom in their possession, about the middle of the eleventh century, it will evidently appear, that the government must have been ill provided with effective support, and little calculated, after a long interval of peace, to resist so formidable an invasion as that of the Normans, reinforced as they were by the most celebrated warriors of the continent.

WITH respect to the literature of the period to which the present chapter refers, a few remarks will be sufficient. From what is affirmed by Alfred the Great of the wretched state of ignorance in which the English were immersed at the time of his accession, we may conclude that the gleam of light which irradiated the republic of letters in the days of Bede, though it did not wholly lose its lustre till nearly the middle of the ninth century, had then given way to the shades of profound darkness. This decline of learning may be chiefly ascribed to the ravages of the Danes, who vented their fury on the monastic and episcopal edifices, the only seats of mental instruction in those times.

The success of Alfred's military efforts against the Danes, gave him an opportunity of restoring the arts of peace, and of reviving literature and science. The learned churchmen who flourished under his auspices, having been mentioned in the former part of this chapter, we proceed to treat of those persons who were most distinguished by their erudition during the remainder of the Anglo-Saxon government. But, though Edward and Athelstan, the son and grandson of that prince, were patrons of learning, and prevented it from being entirely lost in their reigns, we do not read of any of their subjects who deserve mention as literati. From the death of Athelstan to that of the last Anglo-Saxon prince (a space of one hundred and twenty-five years, the only Englishmen celebrated for their learning were Odo, archbishop of Canterbury, St. Dunstan, his successor, and Alfric, a grammarian and translator of homilies; and their erudition was only remarkable from their appearing in times of ignorance, as a faint glimmering of light is conspicuous amidst the contrast of surrounding darkness.

THE NORMAN LINE.

FROM THE NORMAN CONQUEST TILL THE ACCESSION OF HENRY II.

COMPRIZING THE REIGNS OF

WILLIAM I. WILLIAM II. SURNAMED RUFUS, HENRY I. AND STEPHEN.

WILLIAM I. STYLED THE CONQUEROR.

HAVING got possession of the sovereignty, by appearing to accept the crown as a free gift from the English, William retired to Barking, in Essex; for he suspected the fidelity of the Londoners, and the fortresses which he had ordered to be erected, were not yet completed. At Barking he received the submissions of such of the nobility as had not been present at his coronation. Earl Coxo, a man renowned for his valour; Edric, grandnephew to Edric Streon; who was distinguished for his perfidy in former reigns; even Edwin and Morcar, came and swore fealty to him, together with many others of the principal nobility: they were all received into favour, and confirmed in the possession of their honours and their estates. By such means was William released from all apprehension of farther opposition; and, by a succession of occurrences, as fortunate as they were unexpected, he obtained the entire possession of a country, which, by a moderate exertion of its powers, might have resisted his utmost efforts, and have turned his glory into ignominy and disgrace.

William having accepted the crown, fixed on the approaching festival of Christmas for his coronation; and while the preparations for that ceremony were making, he resided at Barking, where he amused himself with the sports of the field. On the morning of Christmas day he repaired to the abbey of Westminster in magnificent procession, accompanied by many of the English nobility, and the principal of the Norman chieftains who had attended him in his expedition to this country. The prelate who officiated on this occasion was Aldred, archbishop of York, whom the new king preferred to Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, for he regarded the latter as an illegal occupant of that see (q). Aldred commenced the business of the day by a short oration addressed to the English, at the close of which he enquired of them whether they would permit William to be crowned as their king. They testified their assent by general shouts of applause; and the Normans received with equal approbation a similar question put to them by Gothofred bishop of Coutances. After this form of election, which the success of William's arms had previously decided, he took the usual oath, purporting that he would be a protector of the church, would enact just laws, repress all violence and rapine, and govern with equity and impartiality. He then underwent the royal unction, and being placed on the throne, was invested with the diadem of the Anglo-Saxon kings. The acclamations which took place on this occasion were so loud and vehement, and the confused sounds of English and foreign voices were so alarming to the Norman soldiers who had been stationed round the abbey for the security of their master, that, apprehensive of the sinister intentions and the treachery of the natives, they resolved on immediate revenge. In the first ebullition of their fury, they set fire to the adjacent houses; and the tumult that ensued so terrified the spectators of the coronation, that they ran in haste out of the abbey church; but the exertions of William at length put a period to a riot, in which the aggressors exhibited a strong proof of the precipitancy and violence of the Norman character, and kindled the jealousy already entertained of them by the English into no small degree of animosity and hatred.

The first act of William's sovereignty was to seize on the treasure of Harold, at Winchester: by which important acquisition, and the valuable presents he received from many of his new subjects, he was enabled to distribute several sums among his troops; so that they were induced to wait patiently for those more solid rewards which he had promised them before their embarkation. He had likewise received assistance, both from the ecclesiastics of England and the continent, in the prosecution of his favourite scheme; therefore, he presented them with such tokens of his gratitude as he well knew would be acceptable. Harold's standard (remarkable for its elegant workmanship, and enriched with gold and jewels), was sent to the pope, with many valuable presents, not only as an acknowledgment of past obligation, but as a mean of procuring his future protection. All the monasteries and churches in France, where prayers had been put up for his success, were rewarded for their pious supplications. The English monks were promised countenance and support; and, to establish his sanctity, he built a convent near Hastings, in Sussex, which he called Battle Abbey, and to which he granted an exemption from episcopal jurisdiction (r).

He introduced into England that rigid execution of justice these articles of religious traffic may be formed from the price given by Agelnoth, archbishop of Canterbury, for an arm of St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo, which he purchased from the pope when he was at Rome, in the year 1021. It was no less than one hundred talents, or six thousand pounds weight of silver, and one talent, or sixty pounds weight of gold! Since bishops, who at this period were the most strenuous advocates for monachism, were able to make such expensive purchases, we may reasonably conclude, that, however rigid their tenets might be in point of celibacy, they did not rank poverty in the class of monastic virtues.

(q) William of Newburgh, Brompton, and several other writers, assert that Stigand refused to crown William.

(r) At this convent, which was built in commemoration of his victory, prayers were continually offered up for his own soul and for that of justice which had distinguished his government in Normandy. He enjoined his officers to be circumspect in their conduct to the English, to treat them with humanity, and to respect them as fellow-subjects. The strictest orders were issued to the army, to hinder the soldiers from violating the chastity of the women, and committing other outrages which the insolence of conquest is too apt to produce; and he published an edict to confirm the privileges of the people, and to fulfil the promises he made at his coronation. He appeared anxious to unite the English and the Normans by intermarriages and alliances; and all his new subjects that approached his person were received with respect. He displayed an appearance of unlimited confidence, and even confirmed Edgar Atheling, the lawful heir to the crown, in the earldom of Oxford, which Harold had conferred on him; and affected to treat him with great kindness, as the nephew of Edward the Confessor, whom he considered as his friend and benefactor. He granted a new charter to the city of London, secured its ancient privileges and immunities, and expressed his intention to preserve the Saxon laws and constitution. The better to reconcile the English to his authority, he made a progress through some parts of England; and by his majestic deportment, and the splendour of his court, he acquired a considerable portion of the esteem of the people, which he heightened by an artful display of justice and lenity.

Notwithstanding this appearance of clemency, he confiscated the estates, not only of Harold and his brothers, but of all those nobles who had perished at the battle of Hastings in defence of their country. To justify this act of injustice and violence, he represented Harold as an usurper: a subterfuge too trifling to impose on ignorance itself, and too contemptible for a monarch to employ; but fraud and rapine can only be supported by falsehood and chicanery. And beneath the confidence which he assumed, he harboured suspicion and mistrust; so that he took every precaution to secure by force what he had originally obtained by violence. Although he had confirmed the privileges of the citizens of London, he deprived them of their arms; as he did those of several other populous places which he feared might make a formidable resistance in case of a revolt. He also built the Tower of London, and caused citadels to be erected at Norwich, Winchester, Hereford, and other cities rendered important by their situation; all of which he garrisoned with Norman troops, since on them alone he could rely. The forfeited estates he bestowed on his most distinguished officers, and established funds for the payment of his forces. By these various proceedings he attempted to reconcile the civil administration of a legal sovereign with the military institutions of an arbitrary tyrant.

Finding his authority firmly established, he resolved to revisit Normandy. He therefore appointed his uterine brother Odo, bishop of Baieux, and William Fitz Osborne, to be regents of England during his absence. He embarked at Pevensey, in Sussex, about the close of March, 1067, and soon after arrived in his native country with a numerous fleet, and a splendid train of followers (s), whom he took with him, as much to prevent danger from revolt, as to add to the splendour of his court. During his stay in Normandy he was visited at the Abbey of Fescamp, where he resided for some time, by Rodolph, uncle to the king of France, and many other princes and nobles, who had contributed to his expedition against England, and were now anxious to congratulate him on its success. The English courtiers, willing to do him honour, strove to outvie each other in the splendour of their dress and the magnificence of their equipages; and by an ostentatious display of their riches they excited the astonishment and admiration of the Normans, who could not be restrained from displaying their insolence and pride; which mortified the English nobles, who considered themselves as honourable captives, led to Normandy to grace the triumph of an insolent conqueror.

But while William was gratifying his vanity in his native land, a spirit of revolt discovered itself in England. Murmurs and discontents were heard on every side; conspiracies were formed; hostilities actually commenced in some places; and every thing seemed to threaten a revolution as rapid as that which seated William on the throne. This sudden change was in consequence of the tyranny and oppression of the regents, who encouraged every species of disorder and excess; while the chief officers of the Norman army abused their power, and treated the English with great indignity (t).

The inhabitants of Kent, who had been the first to submit to the dominion of William, were more immediately exposed to the extortions and encroachments of Odo and his colleague in the regency; and these were the first to attempt to throw off the yoke. After repeated remonstrances without redress, they applied to Eustace, count of Boulogne, who assisted them in an attack upon the garrison of Dover, during the absence of Hugh de Montfort, governor of the castle: but the Normans repulsed the assailants with some slaughter, and took the nephew of count Eustace prisoner. This miscarriage, however, did not deter Edric the Forester, whose possessions lay on the banks of the Severn, from forming an alliance with Blethyn and Rhyvallon, two princes of Wales, and repelling the depredations of Richard Fitz Scrope, and others, and, in his turn, laying waste their possessions. But though these open hostilities were not very considerable, the disaffection among the English was general, and the people began, too late, to perceive that strength will ever give laws to justice. A secret conspiracy was therefore formed for destroying all the Normans, as the Danes had formerly been cut off; and this was prosecuted with so much animosity, that earl Coxo was put to death by his own vassals for refusing to head them in an insurrection, and persisting in his fidelity to William.

News of the insurrection having reached Normandy, William hastened to England, where he arrived on the 6th of December, just in time to prevent the execution of this sanguinary enterprize (v). His presence quickly disconcerted their schemes; those who had been more open in their mutiny betrayed their guilt by flight; and this served to confirm the proofs of an accusation against those who remained. William now began to lose all confidence in his English subjects, and to regard them as inveterate and implacable enemies. He had already raised such a number of fortresses in the kingdom, that he no longer dreaded the tumultuous efforts of a discontented multitude; he therefore determined to treat them as a conquered nation, to indulge his own avarice, and that of his followers, by numerous confiscations, and to secure his power by humbling all who were able to make any resistance. The first signal of his arbitrary power was manifested in renewing the odious tax of Danegeld, which had been abolished by Edward the Confessor. This measure produced remonstrances, complaints, and even insurrections, in different parts of the kingdom; but William, conscious of his power, marched against such as were most formidable, and soon compelled them to sue for mercy. In this manner the inhabitants of Exeter and Cornwall excited his resentment, and experienced his lenity (u).

Having quelled this revolt, he marched to Winchester, where he was joined by his consort Matilda, who now visited England for the first time. By William's order the ceremony of her coronation was performed by Aldred, on Whitsunday 1068. Soon after she was delivered of her fourth son, who was named Henry. Her three elder sons, Robert, Richard, and William, still remained in Normandy.

of Harold; thus seeking to cover his vanity by the specious mask of devotion. Among other privileges with which he endowed this abbey, one was, that if any murderer or other felon took sanctuary there, he should be free from punishment.

(s) Among these were Edgar Atheling; Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury; the earls Edwin and Morcar; Waltheof, the son of earl Siward; and many others, distinguished from the extent of their possessions, the greatness of their families, or for their dignities either ecclesiastical or civil.

(t) It has been supposed, perhaps with some degree of probability, that this line of conduct was pursued in pursuance of secret instructions given by William himself to his brother the bishop of Baieux; that he might have an opportunity of rewarding his Norman followers by confiscating their estates.

(v) The conspirators had already taken the resolution, and fixed the day for their intended massacre, which was to have been on Ash-Wednesday, during the time of divine service, when the Normans always attended barefoot and unarmed, as penitents, according to the superstition of the times.

(u) When the king advanced against Exeter in 1068, he was met at some distance from the city by the magistrates, who, sensible of the inequality of the contest, had persuaded the people to submit, and to deliver hostages for their obedience. But a meeting among the populace broke this agreement, and the gates of the town were shut against William; who, appearing before the walls, ordered the eyes of one of the hostages to be put out in view of the rebels; which act of barbarity so intimidated them, that they sent another deputation to him, which being favourably received, the town was surrendered at discretion; and the conqueror evinced his clemency by pardoning the rebels, and setting guards at all the gates to protect the city from plunder.

But

But the insurrections in the west were slight, compared with that which broke out in the north in 1068, which seemed to threaten the most important consequences. This was excited by the intrigues of the two brothers, Edwin and Morcar, who were by far the most powerful of all the English nobles that had survived the battle of Hastings. These were joined by Blethyn, prince of North Wales, Malcolm, king of Scotland, and Sweyn, king of Denmark; and were resolved to make one great effort for the recovery of their ancient liberties. But the vigour and celerity of William destroyed their projects before they were ripe for execution; for, advancing towards them at the head of a powerful army, by forced marches, the two earls were so intimidated, that, instead of opposing, they had recourse to the conqueror's clemency, by submission. He did not think proper to reject their advances, and therefore pardoned them without hesitation. Archil, another powerful nobleman of the north followed their example, and delivered his son as a pledge for his future fidelity. A peace which William made with Malcolm, king of Scotland, shortly after, deprived them of all hopes of future assistance from that quarter.

Notwithstanding the successes of William, the inhabitants, whether English or Normans, were at that time in a most dreadful situation. All the miseries that insolence on the one hand, and hatred on the other; that tyranny and treason, suspicion and assassination, could bring upon a people, were there united. The Normans committed continual insults on the English, and these in vain sought redress from their partial masters. Thus legal punishment being denied, they had recourse to private vengeance; and a day seldom passed, but the bodies of assassinated Normans were found in the woods and highways, without any possibility of bringing the perpetrators to justice. Thus, at length, the conquerors themselves began to wish for the tranquility and security of their native land; and several of them, though entrusted with great commands, desired to be dismissed the service. In order to hinder these desertions, which William highly resented, he was obliged to induce others to stay, by the largeness of his bounties. These brought on fresh exactions, and new insurrections were the natural consequence.

Three sons of the late king Harold, viz. Godwin, Edmund, and Magnus, who had fled to Ireland after the fatal battle of Hastings, where they had met with a favourable reception from Dermot, prince of that country, now projected an invasion of England; and having found means to collect a body of forces, and a fleet of sixty ships, resolved to make an attempt to retrieve the ruined fortune of their family. They landed in Devonshire about the beginning of 1069; but being opposed by Briaux, son of Eudo, count of Bretagne, at the head of some foreign troops, they were defeated, and obliged to re-embark by night, and return to Ireland, with the loss of seventeen hundred men.

The efforts of the Normans were now directed to the North, where a general confusion prevailed. William had dispatched Robert de Comyn, with seven hundred men, to take possession of Durham, to the government of which he had been previously appointed; and that officer, neglecting the caution he had received from bishop Egelwin, who advised him to be upon his guard against the animosity of the inhabitants, suffered his troops to range about the city in small parties, committing every species of rapine, and even allowed them to extend their depredations into the adjacent country. The Northumbrians,' justly incensed at these acts of unprovoked violence, assembled in great numbers, and, taking the city by surprize, slew all the Normans they could meet with: they then proceeded to the bishop's castle, where the governor resided, and experienced such a vigorous resistance, that, being unable to force the gates, they were induced to set fire to it; and Robert de Comyn, with all his attendants, perished in the flames. The Norman governor of York, Robert Fitz-Richard, was likewise put to death; and the insurgents, being reinforced by a Danish army, commanded by Osborne, brother to Sweyn, king of Denmark, accompanied by his two brothers Harold and Canute, who had landed from a fleet of three hundred sail, laid siege to the castle, which was defended by William Mallet, on whom the command devolved after the death of Fitz-Richard. The castle was defended by a garrison of three thousand men. Mallet, the governor, that he might the better provide for its defence, set fire to some houses that lay contiguous; but the conflagration spreading, the whole city was quickly in flames. This proved the cause of his destruction; for the enraged inhabitants, joining in the assault, entered the citadel sword in hand, and butchered the whole garrison without mercy (w). This transient gleam of success seemed to spread a general spirit of insurrection. The counties of Somerset, Dorset, Cornwall, and Devon, united in the common cause, and determined to attempt the regaining of their former freedom.

William had been employed in suppressing the insurrections in the south, when he first received intelligence of the commotions in the north, and, in the excess of his passion, he uttered the most bitter imprecations of vengeance against the Northumbrians, swearing that he would extirpate them from the face of the earth. He therefore advanced with his army towards the north, confident that his presence alone would be sufficient to repress these rude efforts of unadvised indignation. Accordingly, wherever he appeared, the insurgents either submitted or retired. The Danes were content to return to their ships, without committing any farther hostilities (x). The king then invested York castle, and ordered an assault to be made; but, though the attack was furious, the place was so well defended by the English, who were commanded by the valiant Waltheof, that the Normans were repulsed with great slaughter. Such was the conduct and vigilance of this intrepid governor, that William despaired of reducing the castle, when famine compelled Waltheof to capitulate. The king not only granted him honourable terms, but received him into favour, and bestowed his own neice, Judith, on him in marriage. Having gained possession of York, he remained there till the beginning of the ensuing year.

At the commencement of 1070, William marched northward with his army, resolving to execute his menaces against the Northumbrians. This was a task congenial to his soul, and was performed with a severity that afforded him the highest satisfaction. All that fertile tract of land which, for the extent of sixty miles, lies between the Humber and the Tees, was entirely desolated; every house, church, and monastery, reduced to ashes, and the wretched inhabitants put to the sword. In the same cruel manner did this execrable and sanguinary tyrant proceed as far as Hexham, marking his progress with indiscriminate destruction. All the implements of husbandry were destroyed; the cattle seized and driven away by these merciless ravagers, with their king at their head; and the few who escaped from the sword, by retiring to the neighbouring woods, perished by famine. Not less than one hundred thousand persons are computed to have fallen victims to the ferocity of the Normans in this memorable expedition, in which the whole tract of country from York to Durham was changed into one continual scene of dreary desolation, and for some succeeding years remained without a house or an inhabitant. Indeed so great was the devastation, that even now, at the distance of nearly seven hundred and fifty years, it is but thinly inhabited.

From this time Edgar Atheling and his followers perceived that all their hopes of future resistance were now totally destroyed; and therefore they thought it high time to escape from the fury of the enraged monster: they accordingly retired to Scotland; but Cospatric had recourse to his clemency, and, paying a sum of money as an atonement for his offence, was again received into favour, and was even invested with the earldom of Northumberland. All the English insurgents, in other parts of the country, except Hareward, who still kept his fastnesses, returned to their obedience, and left the Normans undisputed masters of the kingdom.

William, now finding himself absolute master of England, determined to throw off the mask of justice which he had hitherto occasionally worn; and to gratify the natural severity of his temper, by proceeding to extremities against his vanquished subjects, in order to reduce them

(w) The English were also joined by Edgar Atheling, who brought with him Cospatric, Waltheof, Siward, Bearne, Marleswain, Adelin, and other leaders.

(x) It is confidently asserted, that when the king had advanced with his army into Yorkshire, he found the Danes had taken possession of an important post, situated between the rivers Ouse and Trent, from whence he perceived it would be difficult to dislodge them; and as the attempt must evidently be attended with danger, and if it failed must have proved fatal, he wisely determined to have recourse to a more easy expedient. He entered into a secret negociation with the Danish commander; and prevailed on him, by means of a considerable bribe, and permission to plunder the sea-coast, to withdraw his army, and to return to Denmark in the spring.

to such a state as would totally relieve him from all fears of molestation, or future disturbance to his government. The numerous insurrections and conspiracies which had recently occurred in various parts of the kingdom, had involved the greatest number of the landed proprietors in the guilt of treason, and had consequently subjected them to those forfeitures and attainders which were so favourable to William's darling plan, and which were therefore enforced with the utmost rigour and violence. His tyranny, indeed, did not always extend to the infliction of a capital punishment; it was sometimes contented with a deprivation of the means of subsistence, and the confiscation of estates, which were bestowed on foreigners with unbounded profusion. As he had openly avowed his intention of effecting the ruin of all the English nobility and gentry, the accusations preferred against the objects of his revenge were not investigated with that scrupulousness that justice requires. In fact, it would have been useless to affect an appearance of equity in the prosecution of his tyrannical schemes: vague suspicions, therefore, were substituted for convincing proofs; and rank, opulence, and power, were considered as crimes of the highest magnitude. Thus the policy of the king, coinciding with the rapacity of foreign adventurers, operated almost a total revolution in the landed property of the kingdom. By this means all the ancient and honourable families of England were deprived of their hereditary possessions, and reduced to beggary. Their castles and manors were bestowed on Normans of the meanest birth and lowest stations; and they had the additional mortification of finding themselves excluded from every path that could lead to wealth, honour, or preferment.

Farther to confirm his authority, and to retain that military power which had enabled him to subdue the kingdom, William extended the feudal system of government, which had been long established in France and Normandy, over his British dominions. The feudal system indeed was not altogether unknown in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, but William made such considerable additions to it, that it may be justly asserted, that the introduction of the feudal laws was entirely owing to him. The sovereign of a feudal state was supposed to be the proprietor of all the lands in his dominions; part of which he retained in his own possession, for the maintenance of his family and the support of his dignity; and the remainder he distributed to his subjects, as fees for certain stipulated services to be performed by them, or on such other conditions as he chose to require, and they to accept. On similar terms did William distribute the lands of England, which he had obtained by violence from their legal possessors, to the most considerable of his Norman adventurers (y).

It must not, however, be supposed that, in the general distribution of lands, William neglected the interest of the crown, for he reserved to himself fourteen hundred and twenty-two manors, besides a proportionable number of forests, parks, chaces, farms, and houses, in various parts of the country.

The great barons, or chief tenants, of which the kingdom contained about seven hundred, who held immediately of the crown, retained that part of their lands which lay contiguous to their castles in their own possession; and granted the rest to other foreigners, who were called knights, or vassals, and who paid their lords the same services and prestations which he himself owed to his sovereign. In short, a feudal baron was a subordinate monarch, and his barony a subordinate kingdom. Even the vassals of barons sometimes granted subinfeudations, but always on a similar plan; so that the oppressive impositions of the feudal system descended from the first subject in the realm to the meanest possessor of land by military tenure. It is true, indeed, that some of these landholders, (who were called socmen, because they followed the soc or plough), were exempted from several of the feudal servitudes; such as personal attendance, wardship, marriages, &c. But this was owing to their insignificancy, and to the contempt bestowed on them by their sovereign and his imperious barons, who refused them admittance to their courts and company. Yet many of these socmen were not less slaves than the military vassals of the king and his chief tenants; for they were subjected to a baser and more laborious species of servitude, being compelled, on various occasions, to furnish a number of men, horses, and carriages, and also to plough and sow the lands of their lords. Thus William may be said to have rendered the feudal laws universal in England, and by that means to have extinguished every remaining mark of civil liberty.

The introduction of the feudal system also produced many important changes in the administration of justice. Every baron had a court in which he presided in person, to settle all disputes between his own immediate vassals; to compel the payment of debts, and the performance of contracts; to redress wrongs, and to punish crimes. His power even extended to the infliction of capital punishments. The military vassals of the barons had also similar courts within their respective manors, endowed with the same privileges, except that of life and death.

(y) To Hugh de Abrencis, the son of his sister, he granted the whole county of Chester; to Robert, count of Mortaigne, and Odo, bishop of Baieux, his two uterine brothers, he gave to the first nine hundred and seventy-three manors and lordships, and to the last four hundred and thirty-nine; to Alain Fergeant, duke of Bretagne, and earl of Richmond, four hundred and forty-two; to William de Warrenne, two hundred and ninety-eight, besides twenty-eight towns or hamlets in Yorkshire; to Geoffrey, bishop of Coutance, two hundred and eighty; to Roger Bigod, one hundred and twenty-three; to Walter Giffard, earl of Buckingham, one hundred and seven; to Richard de Clare, one hundred and seventy-one; to William de Percy, one hundred and nineteen; to Todenei, eighty-one; to Robert, earl of Eu, one hundred and nineteen; to Roger Mortimer, one hundred and ninety manors, besides several hamlets; to Robert de Stafford, one hundred and thirty; to Walter de Ewins, earl of Salisbury, forty-six; to Geoffrey de Mandeville, one hundred and eighteen; to Hugh de Beauchamp, forty-seven; to Baldwin de Riglvers, one hundred and sixty-four; to Henry de Ferrers, two hundred and twenty-two; and to Norman d'Arcy, thirty-three. Besides these liberal grants, he bestowed on Roger de Montgomery, first, the towns of Arundel and Chichester; and afterwards the county of Salop. Hereford was given to William Fitz Osborne; and the castle of Tutbury to Henry de Ferrers: and all the other chieftains were rewarded according to the importance of their services, or the degree of favour they enjoyed.

All the lands thus distributed by William were subject to a variety of obligations, of two kinds, viz. personal and military services; and certain payments, or prestations, which constituted a considerable part of the royal revenue. The services consisted in homage and fealty; in personal attendance on the king in his court, at the grand festivals of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, and at other times in his parliament, whenever regularly summoned; and in military service, either in the field, or in defence of his castles, for a fixed time, with a stipulated number of followers, according to the extent of their estates.

The pecuniary prestations were chiefly these: reserved rents, wardships, marriages, reliefs, scutage, and aids.—Reserved rents, were certain annual payments, generally inconsiderable, exacted from the vassals of the crown, to remind them that the property, or dominium directum of their lands, were vested in the sovereign. These were collected by the sheriffs of the counties in which the lands were situated. When any vassal of the crown died, and left his heir a minor, and consequently incapable of performing those personal services to his sovereign to which he was bound by his tenure, the king took possession of his estate, that he might support the heir, and provide another person to perform his services. This right of Wardship was productive of great profits to the king, who sometimes employed them to enrich his favourites, by transferring to them the guardianship of some of his most opulent wards.—The king's female wards were restrained from Marriage without the consent of their royal guardian, that they might not bestow an estate derived from the crown on a person who was disagreeable to the sovereign. By this cruel and ignominious servitude heiresses were obliged to purchase from the king the liberty of bestowing themselves in marriage upon the objects of their affections. No less than ten thousand marks, equivalent in value to upwards of one hundred thousand pounds of our present money, were paid to the king for the wardship and marriage of a single heiress. This oppressive servitude was afterwards extended to male heirs.—Besides the guardianship of heirs, the king always obtained from them a sum of money when they came of age, and were admitted to the possession of their estates: he also received the same from such heirs as were of age at the death of the vassal from whom they inherited. This last was called Relief, because it relieved their lands from the possession of their sovereign, to whom they were supposed to devolve upon the death of every proprietor. Hence are derived our present copyhold tenures, the only reliques of feudal slavery that now remain in England.—Scutage, or shield money, was another payment to which all the military vassals of the crown were subjected. It was a pecuniary fine, paid in lieu of actual service in the field by those who were either unable or unwilling to perform it in person, or to provide a substitute. The rate of this commutation was not fixed, and therefore gave rise to frequent oppression, as kings would sometimes engage, or pretend to engage, in expeditions to distant parts, or at times when they knew it would be inconvenient for their vassals to attend, merely for the purpose of demanding scutage.—Besides these payments there were certain pecuniary Aids exacted, on particular occasions, from the immediate vassals of the crown. The purposes for which these aids were demanded by the king were, to make his eldest son a knight; to marry his eldest daughter; or to ransom his own person when taken prisoner in battle.

That all these different services and imposts, so pregnant with oppression and ignominious slavery, were first imported into England by William, is a fact too firmly established to admit of doubt. To add still farther to the strength and security of his kingdom, that politic prince subjected the lands of the spiritual barons, such as archbishops, bishops, abbots, and priors, to the same military services as those of his temporal vassals. The wisdom of this measure will be evident, when we consider the extent of their possessions; for on the famous survey of England, recorded in Doom's-day Book, it appeared, that of sixty thousand, two hundred and fifteen knight's fees which the kingdom was found to contain, no less than twenty-eight thousand, one hundred and fifteen belonged to the church.

There was likewise the county-court, as in the Saxon times, to judge between the subjects of different baronies. This was a court of great power and dignity, in which the earl presided with the bishop of the diocese, and where all the freeholders of the county; and even the most powerful barons, were obliged to attend, and assist in the administration of justice. But, during the reign of William, the authority of this court suffered considerable diminution, by the encouragement of appeals to the supreme court, which tended to increase the power and influence of the crown.

The highest court was that of the king, called Curia, or Aula Regis, because it was always held in the great hall of the king's palace, wherever he happened to reside. He there heard causes, and pronounced judgement; and though he was assisted by the advice of the other members, it will easily be conceived that his word was law. In his absence the chief justiciary presided, who was the first magistrate in the state, and regent of the kingdom when the sovereign was abroad. The other chief officers of the crown, the Constable, Seneschal, Mareschal, Chamberlain, Treasurer, and Chancellor, were members, together with such feudal barons as chose to attend; and the barons of the Exchequer, who were at first feudal barons, appointed by the king. The Chancellor's office was to keep the great seal, which he affixed to all charters; a custom that was introduced by the Normans. This court, which was sometimes called the King's Court, sometimes the Court of Exchequer, judged in all cases, civil and criminal; and comprehended the whole business which is now divided among four courts; the Chancery, the King's Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer.

By these various innovations, and the consequent accumulation of power to the sovereign, the Norman dominion appeared to have acquired a solid footing, which its most formidable enemies could not destroy. The subjection of the ecclesiastical revenues to the rigours of the feudal law, though the least oppressive of William's new regulations, excited greater clamours than all his other arbitrary proceedings. The pope and the clergy, whose tenets, at this period, were favourable to slavery, inveighed against this as an exertion of insupportable tyranny. But William's absolute command over his army so effectually secured his authority, and shielded him from every hostile attempt, that even the formidable shafts of superstition fell powerless at his feet.

But to obviate any possible effects of ecclesiastical resentment within his dominions, he resolved to expel all the English from the dignities they enjoyed in the church, and to supply their places with foreigners. Many of the English sees were indeed already possessed by Normans, who had owed their promotion to the partiality of Edward the Confessor: but still many of the prelates were natives; and among them was Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury; who by his vigour and address, the greatness and power of his connections, the extent of his possessions, as well as by the dignity of his office, and conseqent influence over the English, had become an object of jealous apprehension to William. He had, however, been careful to conceal his suspicions of that prelate; and had even treated him with signal marks of esteem and affection, being determined not to betray his tyrannical designs till a favourable opportunity should occur for rendering them effective. His recent success in the adoption of violent measures now led him to believe that the time was arrived when any instance of oppression, however strong, would be unable to excite the least popular clamour: but he wisely considered, that the better way would be to sanction his proceedings by a colour of justice, and, to promote his own purpose, by paying court to the pope of Rome.

The supremacy of the pope, and the authority annexed to it, had always been strenuously resisted by the English church: but this ridiculous doctrine had diffused itself over the southern parts of Europe; and pope Alexander, who had assisted William in his invasion, sent Hermanfrede, bishop of Sion, as his legate into England, who, in return for the favourable reception he had experienced from William, became the instrument of that monarch's tyranny, assisting him in the degradation of the English prelates, which he knew would tend to advance the authority of the pope. For this purpose he summoned a council of the prelates and abbots to meet at Winchester, in 1070; and being assisted by two cardinals, Peter and John, he cited Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, to attend and answer for his conduct (z). At this council, the primate, and several of the suffragan bishops were deprived of their livings, and the vacant sees were immediately filled by foreigners. Lanfranc, a Milanese, and abbot of Caen in Normandy, a man distinguished for his learning and piety, was appointed to succeed Stigand in the primacy; Thomas, canon of Baieux, was promoted to the archbishopric of York; while Walkelin, Walkerine, Harefact, Stigand, Peter, Herman, and Remigius, all of them Normans, were placed in the sees of Winchester, Durham, Norwich, Chichester, Litchfield, Salisbury, and Lincoln. Thus the power of the pope soon attained to the same height in England which it had previously reached in France and Italy.

The king, thinking he could not oppress the English too much, attempted even the abolition of their language; and to promote the knowledge of the French tongue, he ordered that it should be taught in all schools throughout the kingdom: a practice which continued to prevail till the reign of Edward III. The pleadings in the supreme court of judicature were in French; indeed the Norman justiciary, who occasionally presided there, knew no other language. Law-deeds were drawn in French; the laws were composed in that idiom; it was the only tongue spoken at court; and soon became the language of all fashionable company. From this, and the continual intercourse between the inhabitants of England and Normandy, proceeded that mixture of French which is still to be found in the language of this country. Notwithstanding the oppressive measures adopted by William, he restored a part of the laws of Edward the Confessor; which afforded the English great satisfaction, though it by no means tended to rescue them from the rigours of feudal slavery.

The situation of the two powerful earls, Morcar and Edwin, was now become very disagreeable. Though they retained their allegiance to William during the insurrections of their countrymen, they did not gain the king's confidence, and were therefore exposed to the malignity of his courtiers, who treated them, in common with the English, with the utmost contempt. Sensible that they could not remain long in safety, they resolved to rescue their country, or perish in the attempt. While Edwin retired to his estate in the north, in 1071, to commence an insurrection, Morcar repaired to the Isle of Ely, to join the brave Hereward de Wake, who, secured by the situation of the place, which was surrounded by a morass, still defended himself against the Normans. But this attempt only served to accelerate the ruin of the few English, who had hitherto preserved their rank or fortune during the convulsions. William having surrounded the Isle of Ely with flat-bottomed boats, and made a causeway through the morasses two miles in length, after an obstinate resistance; obliged the besieged to surrender at discretion. Hereward alone forced his way, sword in hand, through the king's troops; and then continued his hostilities by sea against the Normans, till at last William, charmed with his bravery, received him into favour, and restored him to his estate. Earl Morcar, and Egelwin, bishop of Durham, who had joined the insurgents, were thrown into prison, where the latter soon after died. Edwin, attempting to escape into Scotland, was slain by a party of Normans, to the great affliction of the English: even the cruel William himself, though long inured to scenes of blood, could not refrain from tears, when the head of this youth was presented to him by his perfidious assassins, who claimed the reward of their treachery, which was justly bestowed, in a sentence of perpetual banishment. The extensive estates of Edwin and Morcar were immediately confiscated; and

(z) The primate was accused of three crimes: the holding of the see of Winchester, together with that of Canterbury; the officiating in the pall of Robert, his predecessor; and the having received his own pall from Benedict IX. who had usurped the papacy, and had afterwards been dethroned for simony. It would be superfluous to expatiate on the futility of these accusations: the ruin of Stigand was determined on, and therefore he was prosecuted with the most unremitting severity. The legate, by virtue of his office, degraded him from his dignity; and the king confiscated his estate, and cast him into prison, where the wretched Stigand continued, in poverty and want, during the remainder of his life. Agilmare, bishop of Norwich, and Agilric, bishop of Chichester, were deposed and imprisoned; as were also many powerful abbots. The bishops of Lincoln and Durham fled into Scotland; and Wulstan, bishop of Worcester, a man of a tranquil disposition, was the only prelate that escaped this general proscription, and was suffered to retain his dignity. Aldred, archbishop of York, who had placed the crown on the head of William, had lately died of grief and vexation; and, with his parting breath, had bestowed a malediction on the king for the breach of his coronation oath, and for those acts of tyranny and oppression which daily marked his conduct to the English.

being informed that many of the English had secreted their money and most valuable effects in different monasteries, he ordered a general search, and seized all that could be found. Of the prisoners which he took in the Isle of Ely, he commanded the hands of many of them to be cut off, and their eyes to be put out; in which miserable condition he dispersed them throughout the country, to deter others from incurring a similar punishment by a similar conduct.

While William was employed in quelling this insurrection, Malcolm, king of Scotland, was ravaging the northern counties. Cospatrick, governor of Northumberland, was too weak to oppose the progress of the Scottish monarch, and sought to create a diversion, by invading his English territories; and accordingly entering the province of Cumberland, he ravaged it in a cruel manner. At length William determined to chastise Malcolm, and marched an army into Scotland, whither that monarch had retired with a considerable booty. On his arrival he found Malcolm so advantageously situated, that an attempt to dislodge him would have been extremely hazardous. The two armies lay opposite each other for several days, neither being willing to risk an engagement which must probably have proved fatal to the one or the other. A negociation was therefore entered upon, and a peace was concluded, by which Malcolm consented to renew his homage to William for his English possessions, and the king agreed to receive Edgar Atheling into favour, to allow him a competent subsistence, and permit him to live in England unmolested. On his return from Scotland, William deprived Cospatrick of the government of Northumberland, under pretence that he had maintained a correspondence with the enemy, and bestowed it on Waltheof, who now enjoyed a great portion of his confidence and favour. Cospatrick retired to Scotland, and Malcolm conferred on him the earldom of Dunbar.

The province of Maine in France had, by the will of Herbert, the last count, fallen under the dominion of William previous to his conquest of England; but the inhabitants becoming dissatisfied with the Norman government, and instigated by Fulk, count of Anjou, (who pretended he had a right to succeed to that province), rose in rebellion, and expelled the magistrates whom the king had placed over them. William having quelled the insurrections in England had now leisure to attend to his affairs in France. Thinking it unsafe to remove his Norman forces from England, he took with him an army composed almost entirely of English, which he joined to some troops levied in Normandy, and with these forces entered the revolted province. The English appeared desirous to retrieve the national reputation for valour, which had lately suffered degradation by their submission to the Normans; and by their assistance he speedily triumphed over all opposition: the inhabitants submitted, and the count of Anjou relinquished his pretensions to the sovereignty of that province. William, however, passed the whole of 1073, and the greater part of the following year in Normandy, to regulate his domestic affairs.

During these transactions, and the long absence of the king, the government of England was greatly disturbed; and that too by those very foreigners, who had experienced his liberality, and who were the exclusive objects of his esteem. The Norman barons, in the true spirit of feudal tyranny, though anxious to impose the yoke of servitude on their inferiors, were always impatient to bear it themselves. The spirit of discontent became general among those haughty nobles; and even Roger, earl of Hereford, son and heir of William's chief favourite Fitz-Osborne, having promised his sister in marriage to Ralph de Guader, earl of Norfolk, had thought it his duty to make application to the king for his consent; but meeting with a refusal, he proceeded nevertheless to solemnize the marriage, and invited his friends, and those of Guader, to attend the celebration. The two earls, disgusted by the denial of their request, and dreading William's resentment for their disobedience, here prepared measures for a revolt; and during the gaiety of the festival, while the company was heated with wine, they opened the design to their guests. They inveighed against the king as an imperious tyrant, complained of his cruelty to the English, whose misfortunes they affected to commiserate; his haughty behaviour to his barons of the noblest birth; and his apparent intention to reduce the victors and the vanquished to a like ignominious servitude. Amidst their complaints, the indignity of submitting to a bastard (a), whom they determined to dethrone, was not forgotten; the certain prospect of success in a revolt, by the assistance of the Danes, the Welsh, and the discontented English, was insisted on. The plan was immediately adopted; and the whole company entered into a solemn engagement to promote its accomplishment. Even earl Waltheof, who was present, after some hesitation, gave his consent.

But earl Waltheof, when the fumes of the liquor had subsided, reflected on the futility of an engagement made in the ardour of intoxication, which was big with the most fatal consequences both to himself and to his country. In this state of anxiety and perturbation he had recourse to his wife Judith, who was the king's niece, and without the least reserve unbosomed himself to her; for he had the most firm reliance on her fidelity: but, alas, he was deceived; for his treacherous consort had secretly fixed her affections on another, and only wanted an opportunity of getting rid of her husband at any rate. She therefore communicated the whole affair to the king, and represented her husband's conduct in the most disadvantageous point of view, aggravating every circumstance which she thought might incense William against him. In the mean time Waltheof himself confessed the whole conspiracy to Lanfranc, who exhorted him, by all means, to reveal it to the king; which he was at last persuaded to do; but it was not till the whole had been divulged by his faithless spouse. He went over to Normandy for that purpose, and was apparently well received by the king, who coolly thanked him for his fidelity, but was secretly resolved to punish him.

During this interval, the conspirators being informed that Waltheof was gone over to Normandy, justly concluded that their designs were betrayed, and flew to arms before their schemes were ripe for execution. The earl of Hereford was checked by Walter de Lacy, a great baron in the king's interest. The earl of Norfolk was defeated by Odo, the king's brother; and the prisoners who were taken had each a right foot cut off, in order to deter others from a similitude of treason. The earl himself retired to Denmark; so that William, upon his arrival in England, found that nothing remained for him to do, but to punish the criminals, which was performed with unusual severity. Many of the rebels were hanged, some had their eyes put out, and others their hands cut off. The unfortunate Waltheof, who had imprudently entered into the conspiracy, but attempted to atone for his fault by an early confession, found no mercy. He was rich, and he was an Englishman, two faults that served to aggravate his guilt; he was accordingly tried, condemned and executed, April 29, 1075. His infamous wife did not long enjoy the fruits of her perfidy; but falling some time after under the king's displeasure, was abandoned by the world, and passed the rest of her life in contempt, remorse, and misery. Fitz-Aubert, a noble Norman, who was also beheaded on this occasion, were the only two persons of note that were executed during the reign of William the First. Having thus extinguished the embers of rebellion with blood, William returned once more to the continent, in order to pursue Guader, who, escaping from England, had taken refuge with the count of Bretagne. Finding, him, however, too powerfully protected by that prince, instead of prosecuting his vengeance, he wisely came to a treaty with the count, in which Guader was included. The better to strengthen this alliance, a marriage was proposed between the princess Constance, William's eldest daughter, and Alain Fergeant, son to the count of Bretagne, which was celebrated at Caen, in Normandy, with great magnificence.

England, during the absence of William, remained in tranquility; and nothing remarkable occurred, except two ecclesiastical synods which were summoned, one at London, another at Winchester. In the former, the precedency among the episcopal sees was settled, and the seat of some of them was removed from small villages to the most considerable town within the diocese. In the second was transacted a business of more importance, viz. that concerning investitures, which took place in 1076.

The industry and perseverance are surprising, with which the popes had been treasuring up powers and pretensions during so many ages of ignorance; while each pontiff employed every fraud for advancing purposes of imaginary piety, and cherished all claims which might turn to the advantage of his successors, though he himself could not expect ever to reap any benefit from them. All this immense store of spiritual and civil authority was now devolved on Gregory VII. of the name of Hildebrand, the most enterprising pontiff that had ever filled the papal chair, and the least restrained by fear, decency, or moderation. Not content with shaking off the yoke of the emperors, who had hitherto exercised the power of appointing the pope on every vacancy, at least of ratifying his election, he undertook the arduous task of entirely disjoining the ecclesiastical from the civil power, and of excluding profane laymen from the right which they had assumed, of filling the vacancies of bishoprics, abbies, and other spiritual dignities. The sovereigns, who had long exercised this power, and who had acquired it, not by encroachments on the church, but on the people to whom it originally belonged, made great opposition to this claim of the court of Rome; and Henry IV. the reigning emperor, defended this prerogative of his crown with a vigour and resolution suitable to its importance. The few offices, either civil or military, which the feudal institutions left the sovereign the power of bestowing, made the prerogative of conferring the pastoral ring and staff the most valuable jewel of the royal diadem; especially as the general ignorance of the age bestowed a consequence on the ecclesiastical offices, even beyond the great extent of power and property which belonged to them. Superstition, the child of ignorance, invested the clergy with an authority almost sacred; and as they ingrossed the little learning of the age, their interposition became requisite in all civil business, and a real usefulness in common life was thus superadded to the spiritual sanctity of their character.

When the usurpations, therefore, of the church had come to such maturity as to embolden her to attempt extorting the right of investitures from the temporal power, Europe, especially Italy and Germany, was thrown into the most violent convulsions, and the pope and the emperor waged implacable war on each other. Gregory dared to fulminate the sentence of excommunication against Henry and his adherents, to pronounce him rightfully deposed, to free his subjects from their oaths of allegiance; and, instead of shocking mankind by this gross encroachment on the civil authority, he found the stupid people ready to second his most exorbitant pretensions. Every minister, servant, or vassal of the emperor, who received any disgust, covered his rebellion under the pretence of principle; and even the mother of this monarch, forgetting all the ties of nature, was seduced to countenance the insolence of his enemies. Princes themselves, not attentive to the pernicious consequences of those papal claims, employed them for their present purposes: and the controversy, spreading into every city of Italy, engendered the parties of Guelf and Ghibbelin; the most durable and most inveterate factions that ever arose from the mixture of ambition and religious zeal. Besides numberless assassinations, tumults, and convulsions, to which they gave rise, it is computed that the quarrel occasioned no less than sixty battles in the reign of Henry IV. and eighteen in that of his successor, Henry V. when the claims of the sovereign pontiff finally prevailed.

But the bold spirit of Gregory, not dismayed with the vigorous opposition which he met with from the emperor, extended his usurpations all over Europe; and well knowing the nature of mankind, whose blind astonishment ever inclines them to yield to the most impudent pretensions, he seemed determined to set no bounds to the spiritual, or rather temporal monarchy, which he had undertaken to erect. He pronounced the sentence of excommunication against Nicephorus, emperor of the east; Robert Guiscard, the adventurous Norman who had acquired the dominion of Naples, was attacked by the same dangerous weapon: he degraded Boleslaus, king of Poland, from the rank of king; and even deprived Poland of the title of a kingdom: he attempted to treat Philip, king of France with the same rigour which he had employed against the emperor: he pretended to the entire property and dominion of Spain; and he parcelled it out amongst adventurers, who undertook to conquer it from the Saracens, and to hold it in vassalage under the see of Rome: even the Christian bishops, on whose aid he relied for subduing the temporal princes, saw that he was determined to reduce them to servitude; and by assuming the whole legislative and judicial power of the church, to centre all authority in the sovereign pontiff.

William, king of England, the most potent, the most haughty, and the most vigorous prince in Europe, was not, amidst all his splendid successes, secure from the attacks of this enterprising pontiff. Gregory wrote him a letter, requiring him to fulfil his promise in doing homage for the kingdom of England to the see of Rome, and to send him over that tribute, which all his predecessors had been accustomed to pay to the vicar of Christ. By the tribute, he meant Peter pence; which, though at first a charitable donation of the Saxon princes, was interpreted, according to the usual practice of the Romish court, to be a badge of subjection acknowledged by the kingdom. William replied, that the money should be remitted as usual; but that neither had he promised to do homage to Rome, nor was it his intention to impose that servitude on his state. And the better to shew Gregory his independence, he ventured, notwithstanding the frequent complaints of the pope, to refuse to the English bishops the liberty of attending a general council which that pontiff had summoned against his enemies.

But though the king displayed this vigour in supporting the royal dignity, he was infected with the general superstition of the age, and he did not perceive the ambitious scope of those institutions, which, under colour of strictness in religion, were introduced or promoted by the court of Rome. Gregory, while he was throwing all Europe into combustion by his violence and impostures, affected an anxious care for the purity of manners; and even the chaste pleasures of the marriage-bed were inconsistent, in his opinion, with the sanctity of the sacerdotal character. He had issued a decree prohibiting the marriage of priests, excommunicating all clergymen who retained their wives, declaring such unlawful commerce to be fornication, and rendering it criminal in the laity to attend divine worship when such profane priests officiated at the altar. This point was a great object in the politics of the Roman pontiffs; and it cost them infinitely more pains to establish it, than the propagation of any speculative absurdity which they had ever attempted to introduce. Many synods were summoned in different parts of Europe, before it was finally settled; and it was there constantly remarked, that the younger clergymen complied cheerfully with the pope's decrees in this particular, and that the chief reluctance appeared in those who were more advanced in years: an event so little consonant to men's natural expectations, that it could not fail to be glossed on, even in that blind and superstitious age. William allowed the pope's legate to assemble, in his absence, a synod at Winchester, in order to establish the celibacy of the clergy; but the church of England could not yet be carried the whole length expected. The synod was content with decreeing, that the bishops should not thenceforth ordain any priests or deacons without exacting from them a promise of celibacy; but they enacted, that none, except those who belonged to collegiate or cathedral churches, should be obliged to separate from their wives.

Having secured the peace of his dominions, William now expected rest from his labours; and finding none either willing or powerful enough to oppose him, he hoped that the end of his reign would be marked with prosperity and peace. But such is the blindness of human hope, that he found enemies where he least expected them, and such too as served to embitter all the latter part of his life. His last troubles were excited by his own children, from the opposing of whom he could expect to reap neither glory nor gain. He had four sons, Robert, Richard, William, and Henry, besides several daughters. Robert, his eldest son, surnamed Curthose, from the shortness of his legs, was a prince who inherited all the bravery of his family and nation, but was rather bold than prudent, rather enterprising than politic. Earnest after fame, and even impatient that his father should stand in the way, he aspired at that independence to which his temper, as well as some circumstances in his situation, conspired to invite him. He had formerly been promised by his father the government of Maine, a province of France, which had submitted to William, and was also declared successor to the dukedom of Normandy. However, when he came to demand the execution of these engagements, he received an absolute denial; the king shrewdly observing, that it was not his custom to throw off his clothes till he went to bed. Richard openly declared his resentment, and was often heard to express his jealousy of his two surviving brothers, William and Henry, for Richard was killed, in hunting, by a stag. These, by greater assiduity, had wrought upon the credulity and affections of the king, and consequently were the most noxious to Robert. A mind, therefore, so well prepared for resentment, soon found or made a cause for an open rupture. The princes were one day in sport together, and, in the idle petulance of play, took it in their heads to throw water upon their eldest brother as he passed through the court, on leaving their apartment. Robert, all alive to suspicion, quickly turned this idle frolic into a studied indignity; and having these jealousies still farther inflamed by Alberic de Grentmesnil (b), one of his favourites, he drew his sword, and ran up stairs with an intent to take revenge. The whole castle was quickly filled with tumult, and it was not without some difficulty that the king himself was able to appease it. But he could not allay the animosity, which, from that moment, ever after prevailed in his family. Robert, attended by several of his confederates, withdrew to Roüen the same night, hoping to surprize the castle, but his design was defeated by the governor, Roger de Ivery.

The flame being thus kindled, the popular character of the prince, and a sympathy of manners, engaged all the young nobility of Normandy and Maine, as well as of Anjou and Bretagne, to espouse his quarrel; even Matilda, his mother, it is said, supported him by secret remittances, and aided him in this obstinate resistance by private encouragement. This unnatural contest continued for several years to inflame the Norman state; and William was at last obliged to have recourse to England for supporting his authority against his son. Accordingly, drawing an army of Englishmen together, he led them over into Normandy, in 1079, where he soon compelled Robert and his adherents to quit the field, and he was quickly reinstated in all his dominions. As for Robert, he being no longer able to resist his father, took shelter in the castle of Gerberoy, in the Beauvoisis, which the king of France had provided for him, where he was shortly after besieged by his father. As the garrison was strong, and conscious of guilt, they made a most gallant defence; and many were the skirmishes and duels that were fought under its walls. In one of these, accident brought the king and his son together; but, being both concealed by their helmets, they attacked each other with mutual fury. A fierce and dreadful combat ensued between them, till at last the young prince wounded his father in the arm, and threw him from his horse. The next blow would, in all probability, have put an end to the king's life, had he not cried out for assistance. Robert then immediately recollected his father's voice; and at once stung with a consciousness of his crime, he leaped from his horse, and raised the fallen monarch from the ground. He then prostrated himself in his presence, and craved pardon for his offences, promising for the future a strict adherence to his duty. The resentment harboured by the king was not so easily appeased; perhaps his indignation at being overcome added to his anger; instead therefore of pardoning his son, he gave him his malediction, and departed for his own camp on Robert's horse, which the prince had assisted him to mount. However, the conduct of the son served, after some recollection, to appease the father. As soon as William was returned to Roüen, he became reconciled to Robert, and carried him with him into England, where he was successfully employed in retaliating an invasion of Malcolm king of Scotland.

William, being thus freed from foreign and domestic enemies, began to have sufficient leisure for a more attentive application to the duties of peace. For this purpose, the compilation of the Domesday Book was begun by his order, in 1081, which contains a general survey of all the lands in the kingdom; their extent in each district; their proprietors, tenures, value, the quantity of meadow, pasture, wood, and arable land, which they contained; and in some counties, the number of tenants, cottagers, and people of all denominations, who lived upon them. The detail enabled him to regulate the taxations in such a manner, that all the inhabitants were compelled to bear their duties in proportion to their abilities (c).

William was no less careful of the methods of saving money than of accumulation. He reserved a very ample revenue for the crown; and, in the general distribution of land among his followers, he kept possession of no less than fourteen hundred and twenty-two manors in different parts of the country. Such was his income, that it has been said to have exceeded that of any English prince either before or since his time (d). No king of England was ever so opulent; none so able to support the splendor and magnificence of a court; none had so many places of trust and profit to bestow; and none, consequently had his commands attended with such implicit obedience.

There was one pleasure, to which William, as well as all the Normans and ancient Saxons, was addicted, which was hunting. To indulge this in its utmost extent, he depopulated the county of Hants for thirty miles, turning out the inhabitants, destroying all the villages, and making the wretched out-casts no compensation for such injury. In the time of the Saxon kings, all noblemen, without distinction, had a right to hunt in the royal forests; but William appropriated all these to himself, and published very severe laws to prohibit his subjects from encroaching on this part of his prerogative. The killing of a deer, a boar, or even a hare, was punished with the loss of the delinquent's eyes, at a time when the killing of a man might be atoned for by paying a moderate fine or composition.

As the king's wealth and power were so great, it may be easily supposed that the riches of his ministers were in proportion. Those of his uterine brother Odo, bishop of Baieux, were so great that he resolved to purchase the papacy. For this purpose, taking the opportunity of William's absence, he equipped a vessel at the Isle of Wight, on board of which he sent immense treasures, and prepared for his embarkation; but he was detained by contrary winds. In the mean time William, having had intimation of his design, resolved to prevent the exportation of so much wealth from his dominions. Accordingly returning from Normandy, where he was then employed, he came into England at the very instant his brother was stepping on board, and immediately ordered him to be made prisoner. His attendants, however, respecting the immunities of the church, scrupled to execute his commands; so that the king himself was obliged with his own hands to seize him. Odo, disconcerted at so unexpected an intervention, appealed to the pope; who, he alledged, was the only person upon earth to try a bishop. To this the king replied, that he did not seize him as bishop of Baieux, but as earl of Kent; and in that capacity he expected, and would have, an account of his administration. He was, therefore, sent prisoner into Normandy; and, notwithstanding all the remonstrances and threats of Gregory, he was detained in custody during the remainder of William's reign.

In the year 1083, the king made a voyage to Normandy, to visit his queen Matilda (e), who was seized with a lingering disorder, which brought her to the grave on the 2nd of November, that year.

William's return to England was hastened by the in-

(b) Son of Hugh de Grentmesnil, whom William had formerly deprived of his fortune, when that baron deserted him during his greatest difficulties in England.

(c) This work was six years in compiling, but the more northern counties, perhaps from their wild and uncultivated state at that period, were not comprehended in the survey. Domesday Book is certainly the most valuable piece of antiquity possessed by any nation, and is still preserved in the Exchequer. It has, however, been transcribed, and since printed and published in two volumes folio, and serves to illustrate, in many particulars, the ancient state of England. The great Alfred had finished a like survey of the kingdom in his time, which was long kept at Winchester, and which probably served as a model to William in this undertaking.

(d) An ancient historian computes, that the xed annual revenue of William, besides escheats, fines, reliefs, and oth er casual profits to a great value, amounted to near four hundred thousand pounds a year; a sum which, if all circumstances be attended to, will appear enormous. A pound in William's time contained three times the weight of silver that it does at present; and the same weight of silver, by the most probable computation, would purchase twelve times more of the necessaries of life, though not in the same proportion of the finer manufactures. His revenue, therefore, would be equal to between fourteen and fifteen millions at present; and as that prince had neither fleet nor army to support, the former being only an occasional expence, and the latter being maintained, without any charge to him, by his military vassals, we may readily conclude, that no emperor or prince, in any age or nation, can be compared to William for opulence and riches.

(e) Queen Matilda is represented as a person of amiable manners, strict virtue, and deep learning; and, notwithstanding the ferocious disposition of her husband, she had lived with him, in the utmost harmony, for three and thirty years. William, it is said, entertained the highest esteem for her, and was greatly afflicted at her death.

telligence he received of an intended invasion of the island by Canute IV. king of Denmark, who had some distant pretensions to the crown of England. To counteract this decision, William collected a powerful army on the continent, which he brought to England, and quartered on the maritime provinces; where they remained for several months, committing numerous acts of insolence and oppression. At length William was relieved from his apprehensions, by the information which was given to him of Canute's having relinquished his intention, owing to contrary winds, which hindered his fleet from sailing, and some violent dissensions among his nobles. The king now dismissed his mercenary troops, to the great joy of his subjects: but he omitted to restore a considerable sum of money which he had levied to defray the expences of the war, by imposing a severe tax of six shillings on every hide of land; which was three times as much as the ordinary Danegeld.

William, king of England, and Philip, king of France, had long acted with coolness towards each other, which, in 1087, was converted into an open rupture, by the incursions of some powerful French barons, who resided on the borders of Normandy, into the territories of William. These depredations increased to an alarming height, and William suspected that the barons were countenanced by the French king. Hubert de Beaumont, in particular, had put several Norman barons to death, and enriched himself with their spoils. William therefore revisited Normandy, that he might check the progress of this daring invader, and take revenge for the injuries which his subjects had sustained. But, previous to his departure, he summoned all his prelates, nobles, and knights, to meet him at Salisbury on the first of August; when he compelled them to renew their oaths of fealty, and to grant him extraordinary aids to a considerable amount. From thence he proceeded to the Isle of Wight, and embarked for Normandy, taking with him Edgar Atheling; who being greatly beloved by the English, was still an object of William's jealousy. That unfortunate prince, justly disgusted with his precarious and dependent situation, and aware of the danger to be apprehended from the king's suspicious temper, asked his permission to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land; to which William gladly assented.

William's displeasure against Philip was increased by the account he received of some railleries which that monarch had used against him. The king was become corpulent, and had been confined to his bed some time by sickness; upon which Philip jocosely said, that he hoped his brother of England would soon be delivered of his big belly, and be enabled to quit his chamber. This sarcasm threw him into a violent passion, and he swore, "by the splendour and resurrection of God," his usual oath, that the first time he should go abroad, he would at his churching present such a number of tapers in the church of Notre Dame, as would set the kingdom of France in a flame: alluding to the usual practice, at that time, of women after childbirth; who, when they were churched, always presented a number of lighted candles. Nor did he fail to put this menace in execution; for, immediately on his recovery, he levied an army, with which he entered the Isle of France, at a time when the harvest was ripe for gathering, and laid waste the whole country with fire and sword. He took the town of Mante by assault, which he first plundered and then reduced to ashes, with all the churches and monasteries it contained. But the progress of these hostilities was stopped by an accident, which soon after put an end to William's existence. His horse suddenly started, and he bruised his belly on the pommel of the saddle. Being in a bad habit of body, as well as advanced in years, he began to apprehend the consequences, and desired to be carried on a litter to the monastery of St. Gervais. Finding his infirmity increase, and being sensible of the approach of death, he discovered at last the vanity of all human grandeur, and was struck with remorse for those horrible cruelties and acts of violence, which, in the attainment and defence of, he had committed during the course of his reign over England. He endeavoured to make atonement by presents to churches and monasteries; and issued orders that earl Morcar, Siward Bearne, and Ulnoth, brother to Harold, whom he had detained prisoner since he had first received him to keep as an hostage for Edward the Confessor; but it was with great difficulty that he could be persuaded to restore to liberty his brother Odo, bishop of Baieux, against whom he was greatly incensed. He at length, however, yielded to the importunities of his brother, the count of Mortagne, and signed the order for his release; prognosticating, at the same time, that his liberty would be productive of considerable mischief.

He next made his will; and bequeathed Normandy and Maine to his eldest son Robert: he wrote to Lanfranc, desiring him to crown William king of England: he left Henry nothing but the possessions of his mother Matilda; but foretold, that he would one day surpass both his brothers in power and opulence. Having settled his affairs, he expired at the monastery of St. Gervais, near Roüen, on the ninth of September, 1087, in the sixty-third year of his age, in the twenty-first year of his reign over England, and in the fifty-fourth of that over Normandy. His body was conveyed to Caen, where it was buried, in compliance with his own request, in a church which he had himself founded (f).

Although historians greatly differ in their delineation of the character of William the First, the smallest degree of attention to his conduct, in the various transactions of his reign, will enable a person of the plainest understanding to form as just an opinion of it as the most refined philosopher. It is abundantly evident that avarice and ambition were the predominant passions of his soul; and to their gratification he sacrificed every moral and religious duty. From these contaminated sources, cruelty and extortion naturally sprang; and revenge, the sure token of a vicious mind, being added to the dark catalogue of his vices, rendered his government arbitrary, tyrannical, and oppressive. Yet has William been termed, by historians of established reputation, a great and wise monarch. If by wisdom is meant that political sagacity which induced him to secure the fruits of his usurpation by a regular system of oppression, we readily admit the justice of the assertion: but, if we adhere to the true import of the term, no man had ever more feeble pretensions to wisdom than William the First. Were we to consider him only as a general, his claim to greatness might appear well founded; for no one can doubt his native courage and military skill: but, as a monarch, in whose breast self was the prevailing principle, and in whose reign it would be difficult to discover a single transaction in which public good was not sacrificed to private interest, we cannot, with justice, assent to bestow on him the smallest portion of praise, except such as he may be entitled to for his temperance, the only virtue he seemed to possess. In short, from a review of his life, after he became seated on the throne of England, the cool historian and true philosopher cannot but consider him as a cruel and rapacious tyrant (g).

WILLIAM

(f) By his wife Matilda, (daughter of Baldwin, fifth earl of Flanders), William had four sons: Robert, who succeeded his father in the dukedom of Normandy; Richard, who was killed by a stag in the New Forest; William, who succeeded to the throne of England; and Henry, who was born at Selby in Yorkshire, and was afterwards king of England. He had also five daughters, viz. Cicely, a nun in the monastery of Fescamp, and afterwards abbess of the convent of the Holy Trinity, at Caen, in Normandy, where she died, in 1127; Constance, who was married to Alain Fergeant, duke of Bretagne; Agatha, contracted to Harold in her infancy, and afterwards betrothed to Alphonso, king of Galicia, but who died before the marriage was consummated, in her way to Spain; Alice, who died in her infancy; and Adela, married to Stephen, count of Blois.

(g) The revolution effected by the accession of William to the throne of England was as complete as any that is recorded in history, except that which followed the conquest of this country by the Saxons, who attempted a total extermination of the natives. Though William, by appearing to accept the crown as a free gift of the people, renounced all pretensions to rule by the right of conquest; yet his subsequent conduct shews that he regarded his power as acquired by force of arms, and exercised it accordingly. He treated the English as a conquered people, and thought no state of subjection too bad for them. The consequence was, that, before the conclusion of his reign, there was not a single Englishman who enjoyed the rank of earl, baron, bishop, or abbot: even the English name became a term of reproach; and several generations elapsed before one family of Saxon pedigree attained the possession of any considerable honours.

The predilection which William had for the laws of his native country urged him to frequent violations of his coronation oath, by the introduction of many of them into England: a measure which could not fail to give great dissatisfaction to his English subjects, since he had sworn to preserve the laws of Edward the Confessor.

The introduction of the Curfew, or Couvre-feu, about 1070, in this king's reign, was extremely disgusting to the English. This was a law which enacted, that at the sounding of a bell, which was rung at eight o'clock at night, all companies should disperse, and the fire and candles be extinguished in every house. The original intent of this law was to prevent accidents from fire, which indeed frequently occurred in the large

WILLIAM II. SURNAMED RUFUS (h).

WILLIAM, the favourite son of the Conqueror, who was present in Normandy, had no sooner received his father's recommendatory epistle to Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, than he hastened over to England to take measures for securing to himself the government of that kingdom. Sensible that a deed so unformal, and so little prepared, which violated Robert's right of primogeniture, might meet with opposition, he trusted entirely for success to his own celerity; and having left St. Gervais, while William was breathing his last, he arrived in England before intelligence of his father's death had reached that kingdom. Pretending orders from the king, he secured the royal treasure at Winchester, amounting to sixty thousand pounds, while some faithful friends, who had accompanied him from the continent, found means to get possession of the fortresses of Dover, Pevensey, and Hastings, whose situation rendered them of the greatest importance. The primate, whose rank and reputation in the kingdom gave him great authority, had been entrusted with the care of his education, and had conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and being connected with him by these ties, and probably deeming his pretensions just, declared that he would pay a willing obedience to the last will of the Conqueror, his friend and benefactor. Having assembled some bishops, and some of the principal nobility, whom he prevailed upon to espouse the cause of William, he instantly proceeded to crown the new king, which ceremony he performed in Westminster abbey, September 26, 1087 (i). By this dispatch he endeavoured to prevent all faction and resistance. At the same time Robert, who had been already acknowledged successor to Normandy, took peaceable possession of that duchy.

But though this partition appeared to have been made without any violence or opposition, there remained in England many causes of discontent, which seemed to menace that kingdom with a sudden revolution. The barons, who generally possessed large estates both in England and in Normandy, were uneasy at the separation of those territories; and foresaw, that as it would be impossible for them to preserve long their allegiance to two masters, they must necessarily resign either their ancient patrimony or their new acquisitions. Robert's title to the duchy they esteemed incontestible; his claim to the kingdom plausible; and they all desired that this prince, who alone had any pretensions to unite these estates, should be put in possession of both. A comparison also of the personal qualities of the two brothers led them to give the preference to the elder. The duke was brave, open, sincere, generous: even his predominant faults, his extreme indolence and facility, were not disagreeable to those haughty barons who affected independence, and submitted with reluctance to a vigorous administration in their sovereign. The king, though equally brave, was violent, haughty, tyrannical, and seemed disposed to govern more by the fear than by the love of his subjects. Odo, bishop of Baieux, now released from his confinement, had been restored by William Rufus to the earldom of Kent; but he and Robert, earl of Montagne, maternal brothers of the Conqueror, envying the great credit of Lanfranc, which was increased by his late services, enforced all these motives with their partisans, and engaged them in a formal conspiracy in 1088, to dethrone the king. They communicated their design to Eustace, count of Bologne, Roger, earl of Shrewsbury and Arundel, Robert de Belesme, his eldest son, William, bishop of Durham, Robert de Moubray, Roger Bigod, and Hugh de Grentmesnil; so that they easily procured the assent of these potent noblemen. The conspirators, retiring to their castles, hastened to put themselves in a military posture; and expecting to be soon supported by a powerful army from Normandy, they had already began hostilities in many places.

William, sensible of his perilous situation, endeavoured to engage the affections of the native English. As that people were now so thoroughly subdued that they no longer aspired to the recovery of their ancient liberties, and were content with the prospect of some mitigation in the tyranny of the Norman princes, they zealously embraced William's cause, upon receiving general promises of good treatment, a diminution of taxes, a revival of the Anglo-Saxon laws, and of enjoying the licence of hunting in the royal forests. By the plausibility of his professions he conciliated their attachment and support: and an army of nearly thirty thousand English soon enlisted under his banners. The king was soon in a situation to take the field; and as he knew the danger of delay, he suddenly marched into Kent; where his uncles had already seized the fortresses of Pevensey and Rochester. These places he successively reduced by famine; and though he was prevailed on by the earl of Chester, William de Warrenne, and Robert Fitz Hammon, who had embraced his cause, to spare the lives of the rebels, he confiscated all their estates, and banished them the kingdom. This success gave authority to his negociations with Roger, earl of Shrewsbury, whom he detached from the confederates: and as his powerful fleet, joined to the indolent conduct of Robert, prevented the arrival of the Norman succours, all the other rebels found no resource but in flight or submission. Some of them received a pardon; but the greater part were attainted; and the king bestowed their estates on the Norman barons, who had remained faithful to his cause.

William, freed from the danger of these insurrections, took little care of fulfilling his promises to the English, who still found themselves exposed to the same oppressions which they had undergone during the reign of the Conqueror, and which were rather augmented by the violent temper of the present monarch. The death of Lanfranc (k), who retained great influence over him, gave soon after a full career to his tyranny. To the beneficial influence which Lanfranc possessed over Rufus, the pernicious counsels of Flambard, a person of very different character, succeeded. This minister was a Norman by birth, and had been enrolled among the feudal vassals of the Conqueror. By his fearless and enterprizing disposition, a great degree of insinuation and eloquence, and a dexterity in the management of affairs, he had attracted the notice of the present king, who at length entrusted him with the direction of his finances. To gratify his sovereign's avidity, he devised the most oppressive exactions, which rendered him so unpopular, that a plan was formed for his assassination. Being decoyed into a boat on the Thames, he was conveyed towards the mouth of the river, and obliged to embark in a ship, where two persons, hired by his enemies, waited to deprive him of life; but the confusion produced by a violent tempest gave rise to emotions of humanity and compassion, which, seconded by the address and the promises of Flambard, induced Gerold, the principal conspirator, to relinquish his design, and conduct the minister to shore. Ralph, rejoiced at his escape, hastened to London; while Gerold, not having sufficient confidence in the generosity or forbearance of so unprincipled a character, sought refuge in a voluntary exile.

In order to replenish the king's coffers, Flambard suggested to his majesty the idea of a new survey of the kingdom, which was immediately put in execution. The reason assigned for this measure was, that the survey in the late reign had been partially conducted, as the jurors, on whose oaths it had been registered, had frequently diminished the quantity and value of the lands. Wherever the new commissioners found any extenuation of large towns on the continent, where they were all built of wood, and covered with straw; from whence it was called La Loi du Couvre-feu. This law had long been in force in Normandy; and, according to some French authors, prevailed in all the cities of the north of Europe. Considered in this light merely, the regulations it tended to enforce were salutary; but as it had never been practised in England before, the English regarded it as useless and tyrannical. The general opinion is, that William adopted it from suspicion and mistrust, with a view to put an end to those nocturnal meetings in which the fate of kingdoms has been frequently decided, and which he feared might prove fatal to his own authority.

(h) Or The Red, from the colour of his hair.

(i) Immediately after his coronation, he returned to Winchester, and distributed a part of that monarch's treasures among the indigent inhabitants of every county in England, as well as among all the churches and monasteries. The proportions observed in this distribution were as follows: to the principal monasteries and cathedrals ten marks were given; to others six; to each of the parochial churches five shillings; and to every county a hundred pounds (nearly equal in value to the present sum of three thousand pounds) were sent for the benefit of the poor. From the same source he bestowed considerable largesses on many of the military members of the community, that he might depend on their support of his interests against the attempts of any competition.

(k) The archbishop died of a fever in 1089.

this kind, William took possession of the surplus, and augmented the taxes on the remainder. Though some acts of oppression were practised in this survey, it excited less clamour than that which arose from the king's constant custom of retaining the profits of vacant sees and abbacies in his own hands, sometimes for one year, and sometimes even for four years; for that was the period between Lanfranc's death and his appointing a successor to him. Although the Conqueror was extremely desirous of wealth, he always took early opportunities to supply the vacant ecclesiastical preferments. Had Rufus resumed, with the consent of a national council, for the necessary exigencies of government, a part of the opulent church endowments, his conduct would not have been reprehensible; but he employed in riot and prodigality the sums which he derived from the income of vacant dignities; and when he felt an inclination to supply them, he generally disposed of them by sale; a practice which did not tend to fill the church with those pure and disinterested characters that were the most qualified to reflect credit on the establishment. Though the murmurs of the ecclesiastics, which were quickly propagated to the nation, rose high against this grievance, the terror of William's authority, confirmed by the suppression of the late insurrections, retained every one in subjection, and preserved general tranquillity in England.

In the year 1090, the king thought himself so firmly established on the throne, that he apprehended he was enabled to disturb his brother in the possession of Normandy. The loose and negligent administration of Robert had emboldened the Norman barons to affect a degree of independency; and their mutual quarrels and devastations had rendered that whole territory a scene of violence and outrage. Two of them, Walter and Odo, were bribed by William to deliver the fortresses of St. Valori and Aumale (or Albemarle) into his hands: others soon after imitated the example of revolt; while Philip, king of France, who ought to have protected his vassal in the possession of his fief, was, after making some efforts in his favour, engaged by large presents from William Rufus to remain neuter. The duke had also reason to apprehend danger from the intrigues of his brother Henry. This young prince, who had inherited nothing of his father's great possessions, but some of his money, had furnished Robert, while he was making his preparations against England, with the sum of three thousand marks; and, in return for so slender a supply, had been put in possession of the Cotentin, which comprehended nearly a third of the duchy of Normandy. Robert afterwards, upon suspicion, threw him into prison; but finding himself exposed to invasion from the king of England, and dreading the conjunction of the two brothers against him, he now gave Henry his liberty, and even made use of his assistance in suppressing the insurrections of his rebellious subjects. Conan, a rich burgess of Roüen, who had been won by William's gold, entered into a conspiracy to deliver that city to him; but Henry, on the detection of his guilt, carried the traitor up to a high tower, and with his own hands flung him from the battlements.

The king appeared in Normandy, in 1091, at the head of an army which he disembarked near the Ville d'Eu; and affairs seemed to have come to extremity between the brothers; when the nobility on both sides, strongly connected by interest and alliances, interposed and mediated an accommodation. The chief advantage of this treaty accrued to William, who obtained possession of the county of Eu, the towns of Aumale, the town and abbey of Fescamp, and other places: but in return he promised that he would assist his brother in subduing Maine, which had rebelled; and that the Norman barons, attainted in Robert's cause, should be restored to their estates in England. The two brothers also stipulated, that, on the demise of either without issue, the survivor should inherit all his dominions; and twelve of the most powerful barons on each side swore, that they would employ their power to insure the effectual execution of the whole treaty.

Henry, however, disgusted that so little care had been taken of his interests in this accommodation, retired to St. Michael's Mount, a strong fortress on the coast of Normandy, and infested the neighbourhood with his incursions. Robert and William, with their joint forces, besieged him in this place for several weeks, and had nearly reduced him by the scarcity of water; when Robert, hearing of his distress, granted him permission to supply himself, and also sent him some pipes of wine for his own table. Being reproved by William for this ill-timed generosity, he replied, "What, shall I suffer my brother to die of thirst? Where shall we find another when he is gone?" The king also, during this siege, performed an act of generosity which was less suitable to his character. Riding out one day alone, to take a survey of the fortress, he was attacked by two soldiers and dismounted. One of them drew his sword in order to dispatch him: when the king exclaimed, "Stop, fellow! I am the king of England." The soldier suspended his blow; and respectfully raising the king from the ground, received a handsome reward, and was taken into his service. Prince Henry was soon after obliged to capitulate; and being despoiled of all his patrimony, wandered about the continent with a retinue composed of one knight, three esquires, and a chaplain; and in the course of his peregrinations, he occasionally laboured under great penury and distress.

To this Norman war succeeded hostilities with Scotland, which were not of long duration. William, after he had settled his new acquisitions in Normandy, and procured the expulsion of Edgar Atheling from that duchy, returned to England with duke Robert, and prepared a powerful fleet and a large army for the invasion of Malcolm's dominions. But the equinoctial storms so damaged and dispersed his fleet, to which he trusted for supplies of provisions, that his army felt all the inconveniencies of want, which, added to the attacks of cold and fatigue, considerably diminished his numbers, and darkened his prospect of victory. In this emergency, Robert, who commanded William's army on this occasion, proposed to his brother that affairs should be accommodated with the Scots; and the wreck of his fleet, conspiring with the wretched condition of his forces, softened the mind of Rufus into acquiescence. By the mediation of the duke and of Edgar Atheling, who had by this time joined his brother-in-law Malcolm, peace was concluded between the two kings (l).

The peace with Scotland was, however, but of short duration; for William appeared unwilling to execute the stipulations of the treaty; and Malcolm, resenting this conduct, repaired to the English court in 1093, to demand the performance of the conditions. But William refused to admit the Scottish monarch to an interview, unless he would consent to refer the dispute to the decision of his barons sitting in judicature. This, as may be supposed, was an appeal which Malcolm disclaimed as unreasonable and unjust, affirming that the only equitable mode of determining their difference was, by submitting the contested points to a council composed both of Scotch and English nobility, who should be assembled on the frontiers of the two kingdoms. The arrogant behaviour of William occasioned a renunciation of the treaty on the part of Malcolm, who, returning into Scotland from Gloucester, (the place where the court of England then resided,) levied an army, and made an irruption into Northumberland. After a course of devastation, he invested the castle of Alnwick; but, during the siege, one Morel, at the head of the military vassals of Robert de Mowbray, earl of Northumberland, attacked him by surprize, and the action which ensued proved fatal both to the king himself and his eldest son Edward. The Scots immediately raised the siege, and carried home the unwelcome information of the death of their sovereign and his heir apparent, which had so violent an effect on the conjugal and maternal feelings of Margaret his queen, that she died on the third day after receiving the melancholy intelligence. This incident interrupted for some years the regular succession to the Scottish crown. Though Malcolm (m) left legitimate sons, his brother Donald, on account of the youth of these princes, was (l) The terms of the treaty were, that Malcolm should do homage to the sovereign of England for the territories which had formerly belonged to that kingdom; that William should restore to him the twelve English manors which he had enjoyed under the Conqueror, and allow him an annuity of twelve marks; and that Edgar Atheling should be received into favour by the English monarch.

(m) Concerning Malcolm we may observe, that he was a prince of courage and ability, who contributed in many respects to the improvement was advanced to the throne; but did not long keep possession of it. That prince had not reigned above six months, when, in 1094, Duncan, natural son of Malcolm, formed a conspiracy against him; and being assisted by William with a small force, made himself master of the kingdom.

The frank, open, and remiss temper of Robert duke of Normandy was ill fitted to withstand the interested and rapacious character of William, who, supported by greater power, was still encroaching on his brother's possessions, and instigating his turbulent barons to rebellion against him. The king, having gone over to Normandy in 1094, to support his partizans, ordered an army of twenty thousand men to be levied in England, and to be conducted to the sea-coast, as if they were instantly to be embarked. Here Ralph Flambard, the king's minister, and the chief instrument of his extortions, enacted ten shillings a-piece from them, in lieu of their service, and then dismissed them into their several counties. This money was so skilfully employed by William, that it rendered him better service than he could have expected from the army. He engaged the French king by new presents to depart from the protection of Robert; and he daily bribed the Norman barons to desert his service: but was prevented from pushing his advantages by an incursion of the Welsh, which obliged him to return to England. He found great difficulty in repelling the enemy, and was not able to make any considerable impression on a country guarded by its mountainous situation; and having sustained a considerable diminution of his force, he was glad to return, in the spring 1095, from so unsuccessful an expedition.

During William's absence in Normandy, a conspiracy of his own barons, which was formed at this time, engrossed all his attention. Robert de Mowbray, earl of Northumberland, was at the head of this combination; and he engaged in it William count d'Eu, Richard de Tunbridge, Roger de Lacey, Hugh earl of Shrewsbury, and many others. The purpose of the conspirators was to dethrone the king, and to advance in his stead Stephen, count of Aumale, nephew to the Conqueror. William's dispatch prevented the design from taking effect, and disconcerted the conspirators. Mowbray made some resistance; but being taken prisoner, was attainted, and thrown into confinement, where he died about thirty years after. The count d'Eu denied his concurrence in the plot; and to justify himself fought, in 1096, in the presence of the court at Old Sarum, a duel with Geoffrey Bainard who accused him; but being worsted in the combat, he was condemned to be castrated, and to have his eyes put out. William de Alderi, the count's cousin and steward, was treated with more rigour; for he was sentenced to be hanged, though it was generally believed he had not taken any part in the conspiracy.

The noise of these petty wars and commotions was quite sunk in the tumult of the crusades, which engrossed the attention of Europe about this time, and have ever since engaged the curiosity of mankind, as the most signal and most durable monument of human folly that ever appeared in any age or nation. After Mohammed had, by means of his pretended revelations, united the dispersed Arabians under one head, they issued forth from their deserts in great multitudes; and being animated with zeal for their new religion, and supported by the vigour of their new government, they made deep impression on the eastern empire, which was far in the decline, with regard both to military discipline and to civil policy. Jerusalem, by its situation, became one of their most early conquests; and the Christians had the mortification to see the holy sepulchre, and the other places, consecrated by the presence of their religious founder, fallen into the possession of infidels. But the Arabians or Saracens were so employed in military enterprizes, by which they spread their empire in a few years from the banks of the Ganges in the east, to the Streights of Gibraltar in the west, that they had no leisure for theological controversy: and though the Koran, the original monument of their faith, seems to contain some violent precepts, they were much less infected with the spirit of bigotry and persecution, than the indolent and speculative Greeks, who were continually refining on the several articles of their religious system. They gave little disturbance to those zealous pilgrims, who daily flocked to Jerusalem; and they allowed every man, after paying a moderate tribute, to visit the holy sepulchre, to perform his religious duties, and to return in peace. But the Turcomans or Turks, a tribe of Tartars, who had embraced Mahomedanism, having wrested Syria from the Saracens, and having, in the year 1065, made themselves masters of Jerusalem, rendered the pilgrimage much more difficult and dangerous to the Christians. The barbarity of their manners, and the confusions attending their unsettled government, exposed the pilgrims to many insults, robberies, and extortions; and these zealots returning from their fatigues and sufferings, filled all Christendom with indignation against the infidels, who, it was pretended, profaned the holy city by their presence, and derided the sacred mysteries in the very place of their completion. Gregory VII. among the other vast ideas which he entertained, had formed the design of uniting all the western Christians against the Mohammedans; but the egregious and violent invasions of that pontiff on the civil power of princes, had created him so many enemies, and had rendered his schemes so suspicious, that he was not able to make great progress in this undertaking. The work was reserved for a meaner instrument, whose low condition in life exposed him to no jealousy, and whose folly was well calculated to coincide with the prevailing principles of the times.

Peter, commonly called the Hermit, a native of Amiens in Picardy, had made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Being deeply affected with the dangers to which that act of piety now exposed the pilgrims, as well as with the instances of oppression under which the eastern Christians laboured, he entertained the bold, and in all appearance impracticable project of leading into Asia, from the farthest extremities of the West, armies, sufficient to subdue those potent and warlike nations which now held the holy city in subjection. He proposed his views to Urban II. who filled the papal chair, and who, though sensible of the advantages which the head of the Christian religion must reap from a religious war, and though he esteemed the blind zeal of Peter a proper means for effecting the purpose, resolved not to interpose his authority, till he saw a greater probability of success. He summoned a council at Placentia, which consisted of four thousand ecclesiastics, and thirty thousand seculars; and which was so numerous that no hall could contain the multitude, and it was necessary to hold the assembly in a plain. The harangues of the pope, and of Peter himself, representing the dismal situation of their brethren in the east, and the indignity suffered by the Christian name, in allowing the holy city to remain in the hands of infidels, here found the minds of men so well prepared, that the whole multitude suddenly and violently declared for the war, and solemnly devoted themselves to perform this service, so meritorious as they believed it, to God and the true faith.

Although Italy seemed thus to have zealously embraced the enterprize, Urban knew, that, in order to insure success, it was necessary to enlist the greater and more warlike nations in the same engagement; and having previously exhorted Peter to visit the chief cities and sovereigns of Christendom, he summoned another council at Clermont, in Auvergne. The fame of this great and pious design, being now universally diffused, procured the attendance of the greatest prelates, nobles, and princes; and when the pope and the hermit renewed their pathetic exhortations, the whole assembly, as if impelled by an immediate inspiration, not moved by their preceding impressions, exclaimed with one voice, "It is the will of God! It is the will of God!" Words deemed so memorable, and so much the result of a divine influence, that they were employed as the signal of rendezvous and battle in all the future exploits of those adventurers. Men of all ranks flew to arms with the utmost ardour; and an exterior symbol too, a circumstance of chief moment, was here chosen by the devoted combatants. The sign of the cross, which had been hitherto so much revered among Christians, and which, the more it was an object of reproach among the Pagan world, was the more passionately cherished by them, became the badge of union, and was affixed to their right shoulder, by all who enlisted themselves in this sacred warfare.

Europe was at this time sunk into profound ignorance provement of his country; but all his hostilities against England were conducted in such a manner, as to have rendered him more deserving the character of a barbarian depredator, than that of a great and magnanimous warrior.

and superstition: the ecclesiastics had acquired the greatest ascendant over the human mind: the people, who, being little restrained by honour, and less by law, abandoned themselves to the worst of crimes and disorders, knew of no other expiation than the observances imposed on them by their spiritual pastors; and it was easy to represent the holy war as an equivalent for all penances, and an atonement for every violation of justice and humanity. But, amidst the abject superstition which now prevailed, the military spirit also had universally diffused itself; and though not supported by art or discipline, was become the general passion of the nations governed by the feudal law. All the great lords possessed the right of peace and war: they were engaged in perpetual hostilities with each other; the open country was become a scene of outrage and disorder: the cities, still mean and poor, were neither guarded by walls nor protected by privileges, and were exposed to every insult: individuals were obliged to depend for safety on their own force, or their private alliances; and valour was the only excellence which was held in esteem, or gave one man the pre-eminence above another. When all the particular superstitions, therefore, were here united in one great object, the ardour for military enterprizes took the same direction; and Europe, impelled by its two ruling passions, was loosened, as it were, from its foundations, and seemed to precipitate itself in one united body upon the east.

All orders of men, deeming the crusades the only road to heaven, enlisted themselves under these sacred banners, and were impatient to open the way with their sword to the holy city. Nobles, artisans, peasants, even priests, enrolled their names; and to decline this meritorious service was branded with the reproach of impiety, or what perhaps was esteemed still more disgraceful, of cowardice. The infirm and aged contributed to the expedition by presents and money; and many of them, not satisfied with the merit of this atonement, attended it in person, and were determined, if possible, to breathe their last in sight of that city where their Saviour had died for them. Women themselves, concealing their sex under the disguise of armour, attended the camp; and commonly forgot still more the duty of the sex, by prostituting themselves, without reserve, to the army. The greatest criminals were forward in a service, which they regarded as a propitiation for all crimes; and the most enormous disorders were, during the course of those expeditions, committed by men enured to wickedness, encouraged by example, and impelled by necessity. The multitude of the adventurers soon became so great, that their more sagacious leaders, Hugh, count of Vermandois, brother to the French king, Raymond, count of Toulouse, Godfrey of Bouillon, prince of Brabant, and Stephen, count of Blois, became apprehensive lest the greatness itself of the armament should disappoint its purpose; and they permitted an undisciplined multitude, computed at three hundred thousand men, to go before them, under the command of Peter the Hermit and a knight named Walter. These men took the road towards Constantinople through Hungary and Bulgaria; and trusting that Heaven, by supernatural assistance, would supply all their necessities, they made no provision for subsistence on their march. They soon found themselves obliged to obtain by plunder, what they had vainly expected from miracles; and the enraged inhabitants of the countries through which they passed, gathering together in arms, attacked the disorderly multitude, and put them to slaughter without resistance. The more disciplined armies followed after; and passing the streights at Constantinople, they were mustered in the plains of Asia, and amounted in the whole to the number of seven hundred thousand combatants.

Amidst this universal frenzy which spread itself by contagion throughout Europe, especially in France and Germany, men were not entirely forgetful of their present interests; and both those who went on this expedition, and those who staid behind, entertained schemes of gratifying, by its means, their avarice or their ambition. The nobles who enlisted themselves were moved, from the romantic spirit of the age, to hope for opulent establishments in the east, the chief seat of arts and commerce during those ages; and in pursuit of these chimerical projects, they sold at the lowest price their ancient castles and inheritances, which had now lost all value in their eyes. The greater princes, who remained at home, besides establishing peace in their dominions by giving occupation abroad to the inquietude and martial disposition of their subjects, took the opportunity of annexing to their crown many considerable fiefs, either by purchase, or by the extinction of heirs. The pope frequently turned the zeal of the crusades from the infidels against his own enemies, whom he represented as equally criminal with the enemies of Christ. The convents and other religious societies bought the possessions of the adventurers; and as the contributions of the faithful were commonly entrusted to their management, they often diverted to this purpose what was intended to be employed against the infidels. But no one was a more immediate gainer by this epidemic fury than the king of England, who kept aloof from all connexions with those fanatical and romantic warriors.

Robert, duke of Normandy, impelled by the bravery and mistaken generosity of his spirit, had early enlisted himself in the crusade; but being always unprovided with money, he found that it would be impracticable for him to appear in a manner suitable to his rank and station at the head of his numerous vassals and subjects, who, transported with the general rage, were determined to follow him into Asia. He resolved, therefore, to mortgage, or rather to sell, his dominions, which he had not talents to govern; and he offered them to his brother William, for the very unequal sum of ten thousand marks. The bargain was soon concluded: the king raised the money by violent extortions on his subjects of all ranks, even on the convents, who were obliged to melt their plate in order to furnish the quota demanded from them (n): he was put in possession of Normandy and Maine, and Robert, providing himself with a magnificent train, set out for the Holy Land, in pursuit of glory, and in full confidence of securing his eternal salvation.

The fury of the crusades, during this age, less infected England than the neighbouring kingdoms; probably because the Norman conquerors, finding their settlement in that kingdom still somewhat precarious, durst not abandon their houses in quest of distant adventures. The selfish interested spirit also of the king, which kept him from heightening the general flame, checked its progress among his subjects; and as he is accused of open profaneness, and was endued with a sharp wit, it is likely that he made the romantic chivalry of the crusaders the object of his perpetual raillery (o).

William had the misfortune about this time to be engaged in quarrels with the ecclesiastics, particularly with Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury; and it is no wonder his memory should be blackened by the historians of that order, so that we must admit their aspersions with caution. After the death of Lanfranc, the king for several years retained in his own hands the revenues of Canterbury, as he did those of many other vacant bishoprics (which we have before noticed); but falling into a dangerous sickness, he was seized with remorse, and the clergy represented to him, that he was in danger of eternal perdition, if before his death he did not make atonement for those multiplied impieties and sacrileges, of which he had been guilty. He resolved therefore to supply instantly the vacancy of Canterbury; and for that purpose he sent for Anselm, a Piedmontese by birth, abbot of Bec, in Normandy, who was much celebrated for his learning and piety. The abbot earnestly refused the dignity, fell on his knees, (n) The smallness of this sum, with the difficulties which William found in raising it, suffices alone to refute the account which is heedlessly adopted by historians, of the enormous revenue of the Conqueror. Is it credible, that Robert would consign to the rapacious hands of his brother such considerable dominions, for a sum, which, according to that account, made not a week's income of his father's English revenue alone? Or that the king of England could not on demand, without oppressing his subjects, have been able to pay him the money? The Conqueror, it is agreed, was frugal as well as rapacious; yet his treasure, at his death, exceeded not sixty thousand pounds, which hardly amounted to his income for two months: another certain refutation of that exaggerated account.

(o) As an instance of his irreligion, we are told, that he once accepted of sixty marks from a Jew, whose son had been converted to Christianity, and who engaged him by that present to assist him in bringing back the youth to Judaism. William employed both menaces and persuasion for that purpose; but finding the convert obstinate in his new faith, he sent for the father and told him, that as he had not succeeded, it was not just that he should keep the present; but as he had done his utmost, it was but equitable that he should be paid for his pains; and he would therefore retain only thirty marks of the money. At another time, it is said, he sent for some learned Christian theologians and some rabbies, and bade them fairly dispute the question of their religion in his presence. He was perfectly indifferent between them; had his ears open to reason and conviction; and would embrace that doctrine which upon comparison should be found supported by the most solid arguments.

knees, wept, and entreated the king to change his purpose; and when he found the prince obstinate, in forcing the pastoral staff upon him, he kept his fist so fast clenched, that it required the utmost violence of the by-standers to open it, and force him to receive that ensign of spiritual dignity. William soon after recovered; and his passions regaining their wonted vigour, he returned to his former violence and rapine. He detained in prison several persons whom he had ordered to be freed during the time of his penitence; he still preyed upon the ecclesiastical benefices; the sale of spiritual dignities continued as open as ever; and he kept possession of a considerable part of the revenues belonging to the see of Canterbury. But he found in Anselm that persevering opposition which he had reason to expect from the ostentatious humility which that prelate had displayed in refusing his promotion. The opposition made by Anselm was the more dangerous on account of the character of piety which he soon acquired in England, by his great zeal against all abuses, particularly those in dress and ornament (p). He was extremely averse to the long hair and curled locks which were then fashionable among the courtiers, and zealously preached against them; he even refused the ashes on Ash-Wednesday to those who were so accoutred; and his authority and eloquence had such influence that the young men universally abandoned that ornament, and appeared in the cropped hair, which was recommended to them by the sermons of the primate (q).

When William recovered his health, he became engaged in controversies with this austere prelate. There was at that time a schism in the church between Urban and Clement, who both pretended to the papacy; and Anselm, who, as abbot of Bec, had already acknowledged the former, was determined, without the king's consent, to introduce his authority into England. William, who, imitating his father's example, had prohibited his subjects from recognizing any pope whom he had not previously received, was enraged at this attempt; and summoned a synod at Rockingham, with an intention of deposing Anselm: but the prelate's suffragans declared, that, without the papal authority, they knew of no expedient for inflicting that punishment on their primate. The king was at last engaged by other motives to give the preference to Urban's title; Anselm received the pall from that pontiff, who sent it to England by the bishop of Albano; and matters seemed to be accommodated between the king and the primate, when the quarrel broke out afresh from a new cause. William had undertaken an expedition against Wales in the summer of 1097, and required the archbishop to furnish his quota of soldiers for that service; but Anselm, who regarded the demand as an oppression on the church, and yet durst not refuse compliance, sent them so miserably accoutred, that the king was extremely displeased, and threatened him with a prosecution. Anselm, on the other hand, demanded positively that all the revenues of his see should be restored to him; appealed to Rome against the king's injustice; and affairs came to such extremities, that the primate, finding it dangerous to remain in the kingdom, frequently solicited permission to go to Rome, which the king as often refused: at length he extorted the royal consent, couched, however, in the form of a peremptory order for his speedy departure. He had no sooner quitted the kingdom than William declared all his archiepiscopal acts null and void, and seized all the estates belonging to the see which he had occupied. Anselm was received with great respect by Urban, who considered him as a martyr in the cause of religion, and even menaced the king, on account of his proceedings against the primate and the church, with the sentence of excommunication. Anselm assisted at the council of Bari, where, besides fixing the controversy between the Greek and Latin churches concerning the procession of the Holy Ghost, the right of election to church preferments was declared to belong to the clergy alone, and spiritual censures were denounced against all ecclesiastics, who did homage to laymen for their sees or benefices, and against all laymen who exacted it. The rite of homage, by the feudal customs, was, that the vassal should throw himself on his knees, should put his joined hands between those of his superior, and should in that posture swear fealty to him. But the council declared it execrable, that pure hands, which could create God, and could offer him up as a sacrifice for the salvation of mankind, should be put, after this humiliating manner, between profane hands, which, besides being enured to rapine and bloodshed, were employed day and night in impure purposes, and obscene contacts. Such were the reasonings prevalent in that age; reasonings which, though they cannot be passed over in silence, without omitting the most curious, and, perhaps, not the least instructive part of history, can scarcely be delivered with the requisite decency and gravity.

William's attention was now called to the affairs of Scotland. Duncan, to whose accession he had greatly contributed, had become extremely unpopular, from his partiality to the English and Normans, and had lost his life by a conspiracy of some of the Scottish nobles. On the assassination of this prince, Donald had been raised to the throne; but his subserviency to Magnus, king of Norway, by whose support he had been enabled to procure the crown, gave great dissatisfaction to the Scots, among whom a strong party was formed against him. Edgar, the eldest surviving son of Malcolm and Margaret, was invited to his paternal throne by Donald's opponents; and, as William had assisted in the first deposition of Donald, he now lent his aid to the second dethronement of that prince, and furnished Edgar Atheling with a body of troops, that he might place his nephew on the throne of Scotland. As soon as this army appeared on the borders, it was reinforced by the disaffected Scots; the king was defeated and taken prisoner; and young Edgar, by the efforts of his uncle, conspiring with his father's merits, obtained the crown, which he wore in peace and reputation.

The cession of Normandy and Maine by duke Robert increased the king's territories; but brought him no great increase of power, because of the unsettled state of those countries, the mutinous disposition of the barons, and the vicinity of the French king, who supported them in all their insurrections. Even Helie, lord of la Flêche, a small town in Anjou, was able to give him inquietude; and this great monarch was obliged to make several expeditions abroad, particularly in 1098, without being able to prevail over so petty a baron, who had acquired the confidence and affections of the inhabitants of Maine. He was, however, so fortunate as at last to take him prisoner, and the count of Anjou took arms in his vassal's cause; but he soon consented to make peace with William, on terms very advantageous to that monarch. He agreed to cede to him the whole county of Maine, on condition of his granting liberty to Helie and all the prisoners whom he had taken. Thus deprived of Maine, Helie offered his service to the king of England, who was inclined to accede to the request of so gallant a warrior, but was dissuaded from it by the jealousy of the earl of Meulant, one of his favourite courtiers. Finding his offer rejected, Helie boldly intimated to William, that, as he had refused the tender of his friendship and service, he ought not to be surprized if he should act as his enemy, and exert all his efforts for the recovery of the territories which he had lost. A timid and suspicious prince would have seized the person of any one who, at the instant of being restored to liberty, uttered so haughty a menace; but William, with a magnanimity worthy of a king, replied, "Be gone, and do whatever you think proper! I fear not your utmost resentment." He then furnished Helie with a safe-conduct to La Flêche, where he employed himself in strengthening his fortifications; while the king, regardless of his threats, passed the winter in Normandy, and returned to England in the spring of 1099. Here he celebrated the festival of Whitsuntide in the spacious and magnificent hall of Westminster, which had lately been erected at his expence, and which he affected to undervalue as being scarcely of sufficient dimensions for a king's bed-chamber. Amidst (p) There was a mode, which, in that age, prevailed throughout Europe, both among men and women, to give an enormous length to their shoes, to draw the toe to a sharp point, and to affix to it the figure of a bird's bill, or some such ornament, which was turned upwards, and which was often sustained by gold or silver chains tied to the knee. The ecclesiastics took exception at this ornament, which they said was an attempt to bely the scripture, where it is affirmed that no man can add a cubit to his stature; and they declaimed against it with great vehemence, nay assembled some synods, who absolutely condemned it. But, such are the strange contradictions in human nature! though the clergy, at that time, could overturn thrones, and had authority sufficient to send above a million of men on their errand to the deserts of Asia, they could never prevail against these long-pointed shoes; on the contrary, that caprice, contrary to all other modes, maintained its ground during several centuries; and if the clergy had not at last desisted from their persecution of it, it might still have been the prevailing fashion in Europe.

(q) Eadmer, the historian of Anselm, who was also his companion and secretary, celebrates highly this effort of his zeal and piety, in p. 23 of his life of the primate.

the jollity of this season, he conferred the bishopric of Durham, which he had kept in his own hands for three years, on Ralph Flambard, who had long acted as his prime minister and chief justiciary of the realm; and who still retained the favour of his sovereign by the same means that entailed on him the hatred of the people; by a fertility of invention in the arts of raising money on the subject, and by an uncommon perseverance in bringing his schemes to issue, notwithstanding all the effusions of popular clamour, and all the menaces of public indignation. Helie, being introduced by the citizens into the town of Mans, besieged the garrison in the citadel: William, who was hunting in the New Forest, when he received intelligence from the earl of Shrewsbury (r) of this hostile attempt, was so provoked, that he immediately turned his horse, and galloped to the sea-shore at Dartmouth; declaring, that he would not stop a moment till he had taken vengeance for the offence. He embarked on board a crazy vessel, with a very small number of followers, but found the weather so cloudy and tempestuous, that the mariners thought it dangerous to put to sea: yet the king hurried on board, and ordered them to set sail instantly; telling them, that they never yet heard of a king that was drowned. The next morning he landed at Barfleur, rode with the utmost speed to Bonneville, levied an army of Normans, and advanced towards Mans. By this vigour and celerity, he delivered the citadel of Mans from its present danger; and pursuing Helie into his own territories, he laid siege to Majol, a small castle in those parts; but a wound, which he received before this place, obliged him to raise the siege; and he returned to England in the autumn.

The weakness of the greatest monarchs, during this age, in their military expeditions against their nearest neighbours, appears the more surprizing, when we consider the prodigious numbers, which even petty princes, seconding the enthusiastic rage of the people, were able to assemble, and to conduct in dangerous enterprizes to the remote provinces of Asia. William, earl of Poictou and duke of Guienne, enflamed with the glory, and not discouraged by the misfortunes, which had attended former adventurers in the crusades, had put himself at the head of an immense multitude, computed by some historians to amount to sixty thousand horse, and a much greater number of foot (s), and he purposed to lead them into the Holy Land, against the infidels. He wanted money to forward the preparations requisite for this expedition, and he offered to mortgage all his dominions to William, without entertaining any scruple on account of that rapacious and iniquitous hand, to which he resolved to consign them. The king accepted the offer; and had prepared a fleet and an army, in order to escort the money, and take possession of the rich provinces of Guienne and Poictou; when an accident put an end to his life, and to all his ambitious projects, on the 2nd of August, 1100. He was engaged in hunting, in the New Forest, the sole amusement, and indeed the chief occupation of princes in those rude times, when society was little cultivated, and the arts afforded few objects worthy of attention. Walter Tyrrel, a knight of Pontoise, remarkable for his address in archery, attended him in this recreation; and Tyrrel, impatient to show his dexterity, let fly an arrow at a stag, which suddenly started before him. The arrow, glancing from a tree, struck the king in the breast, and instantly slew him; while Tyrrel, without informing any one of the accident, put spurs to his horse, hastened to the sea-shore, embarked for France, and joined the crusade in an expedition to Jerusalem; a penance which he imposed on himself, for this involuntary crime. The body of William was found in the forest by the country-people, and was buried without any pomp or ceremony in the cathedral at Winchester. His courtiers were negligent in performing the last duties to a master who was so little beloved; and every one was too much occupied in the interesting object of fixing his successor, to attend the funeral of a dead sovereign. The age of William Rufus at the time of his death did not exceed forty-two years; and he had nearly completed the thirteenth year of his reign.

The memory of this monarch is transmitted to us with little advantage by the churchmen, whom he had offended (t); and though we may suspect, in general, that their account of his vices is somewhat exaggerated, his conduct affords little reason for contradicting the character which they have assigned him, or for attributing to him any very estimable qualities. He seems to have been a violent and tyrannical prince; a perfidious, encroaching, and dangerous neighbour; an unkind and ungenerous relation. He was equally prodigal and rapacious in the management of his treasury; and if he possessed abilities, he lay so much under the government of impetuous passions, that he made little use of them in his administration; and he indulged, without reserve, that domineering policy, which suited his temper, and which, if supported, as it was in him, with courage and vigour, proves often more successful in disorderly times, than the deepest foresight and most refined artifice.

The most laudable foreign enterprize which William undertook, was the sending of Edgar Atheling, three years before his death, into Scotland with a small army, to restore prince Edgar, the true heir of that kingdom, son of Malcolm, and of Margaret, sister of Edgar Atheling; and the enterprize proved successful. It was remarked in that age, that Richard, an elder brother of William's, perished by an accident in the new forest; Richard, his nephew, natural son of duke Robert, lost his life in the same place, after the same manner; and all men, upon the king's fate, exclaimed, that, as the Conqueror had been guilty of extreme violence, impelling all the inhabitants of that large district to make room for his game, the just vengeance of Heaven was signalized, in the same place, by the slaughter of his posterity. As he was never married, he left no legitimate issue. The monuments which remain of this prince in England, are Westminster-Hall, and London-Bridge, which he built.

In the eleventh year of this reign, Magnus, king of Norway, made a descent on the isle of Anglesea, but was repulsed by Hugh, earl of Shrewsbury. This is the last attempt made by the northern nations upon England. That restless people seem about this time to have learned the practice of tillage, which thenceforth kept them at home, and freed the other nations of Europe from the devastations spread over them by those piratical invaders. This proved one great cause of the subsequent settlement and improvement of the southern nations.

In the year 1092, a great part of London was consumed by fire; and soon after considerable damage was done to the coast of Kent by an extraordinary inundation of the sea, which entirely overflowed the lands which had belonged formerly to the powerful family of earl Godwin; from whence the place received the appellation of Godwin's Sands.

CHAP. III.

HENRY I.

THE adventurers in the holy war being assembled on the banks of the Bosphorus, opposite to Constantinople, proceeded on their enterprize; but soon experienced those difficulties which their zeal had concealed from them. The Greek emperor, Alexis Comnenus, who had applied to the western Christians for succour against the Turks, entertained hopes of obtaining a moderate supply, which, acting under his command, might enable him to repulse the enemy: but he was astonished to see his dominions suddenly overwhelmed by an inundation of licentious barbarians, who, under the pretence of friendship, despised his subjects as unwarlike, and detested them as heretical. By all the arts of policy he endeavoured to divert the torrent; but while he employed professions, caresses, civilities, and seeming services towards the leaders of the crusade, he secretly regarded those imperious allies as more dangerous than the open enemies by whom his empire had been formerly invaded. Having effected that difficult point of disembarking them safely in Asia, he entered into a private correspondence with Soliman, emperor of the Turks; and practised every art, which his genius, his power, or his situation, enabled him to employ, for disappointing the enterprize, and discouraging the Latins from making thenceforward any such prodigious migrations. His dangerous policy was seconded by the disorders inseparable from so vast a multitude, who were not united under one head, and were conducted by leaders of the most independent intractable spirit, unacquainted with military discipline, and determined enemies to civil authority and submission. The scarcity of provisions, the excesses of fatigue, the influence of unknown climates, joined to the want of concert in their operations, and to the sword of a warlike enemy, destroyed the adventurers by thousands, and would have abated the ardour of men impelled to war by less powerful motives. Their zeal however, their bravery, and their irresistible force, still carried them forward, and continually advanced them to the great end of their expedition. After an obstinate siege, they took Nice, the seat of the Turkish empire; they defeated Soliman in two great battles; they made themselves masters of Antioch; and entirely broke the force of the Turks, who had so long retained those countries in subjection. The sultan of Egypt, whose alliance they had courted, recovered, on the fall of the Turkish power, his former authority in Jerusalem, and informed them by his ambassadors, that if they came disarmed to that city, they might perform their religious vows, and that all Christian pilgrims, who should afterwards visit the holy sepulchre, might expect the same good treatment which they had ever received from his predecessors. The offer was rejected; the sultan was required to deliver the city to the Christians; and on his refusal, the champions of the cross advanced to the siege of Jerusalem, which they regarded as the consummation of their labours. By the detachments which they had made, and the disasters which they had undergone, they were diminished to the number of twenty thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse; but these were still formidable, from their valour, their experience, and the obedience which, from past calamities, they had learned to pay to their leaders. After a siege of five weeks, they took the city by assault; and, impelled by a mixture of military and religious rage, they put the numerous garrison and inhabitants to the sword without distinction. Neither arms defended the valiant, nor submission the timorous: no age nor sex was spared: infants on the breast were pierced by the same blow with their mothers, who sued for mercy: even a multitude, to the number of ten thousand persons, who had surrendered themselves prisoners, and were promised quarter, were butchered in cool blood by those ferocious conquerors. The streets of Jerusalem were covered with dead bodies; and the triumphant warriors, after every enemy was subdued and slaughtered, immediately turned themselves, with the sentiments of humiliation and contrition, towards the holy sepulchre. They threw aside their arms, still streaming with blood: they advanced with reclined bodies, and naked feet and heads, to that sacred monument: they sung anthems to their Saviour, who had there purchased salvation by his death and agony; and their devotion, enlivened by the presence of the place where he had suffered, so overcame their fury, that they dissolved in tears, and bore the appearance of every soft and tender sentiment. So inconsistent is human nature with itself! and so easily does the most effeminate superstition ally, both with the most heroic courage and with the fiercest barbarity! This great event happened on the 5th of July, 1100. The Christian princes and nobles, after chusing Godfrey of Bouillon king of Jerusalem, began to settle themselves in their new conquests; while some of them returned to Europe, in order to enjoy at home that glory, which they had acquired in this popular and (in their eyes) meritorious enterprize. Among these was Robert duke of Normandy, who, as he had relinquished the greatest dominions of any prince that attended the crusade, had all along distinguished himself by the most intrepid courage, as well as by that affable disposition and unbounded generosity which gain the hearts of soldiers, and qualify a prince to shine in a military life. In passing through Italy, he became acquainted with Sibylla, daughter of the count of Conversana (u), a young lady of great beauty and merit, whom he espoused: indulging himself in this new passion, as well as fond of enjoying ease and pleasure, after the fatigues of so many rough campaigns, he lingered a twelvemonth in that delicious climate; and though his friends in the north looked every moment for his arrival, none of them knew when they could with certainty expect it. By this delay he lost the kingdom of England, which the great fame he had acquired during the crusades, as well as his undoubted title, both by birth and by the agreement with his deceased brother, (solemnly confirmed by the principal nobles of England and Normandy,) would, had he been present, have infallibly secured to him.

Prince Henry was hunting with William Rufus in the New Forest, when intelligence of that monarch's death was brought him; and being sensible of the advantage attending dispatch, he hastened to Winchester castle, in order to secure the royal treasure, which he knew to be a necessary implement for facilitating his designs on the crown. He had scarcely reached the place when William de Breteuil, keeper of the treasure, arrived, and opposed himself to Henry's pretensions. This nobleman, who had been engaged in the same party of hunting, had no sooner heard of his master's death, than he made the utmost expedition to take care of his charge; and he told the prince, that this treasure, as well as the crown, belonged to his elder brother, who was now his sovereign; and that for his part, he was determined, in spite of all other pretensions, to maintain his allegiance to him, whom he had sworn to support. But Henry, drawing his sword, threatened him with instant death if he dared to disobey him; and as others of the late king's retinue, particularly the earls of Warwick and Meulant, who came every moment to Winchester, joined the prince's party, Breteuil was obliged to withdraw his opposition, to acquiesce in this violence, and to put him in possession of the royal treasure.

Henry, without losing a moment, hastened with the money to London; and having assembled some noblemen and prelates, whom his address, or abilities, or presents, gained to his side, he was suddenly elected, or rather saluted king; and immediately proceeded to the exercise of royal authority. On the 5th of August, three days after his brother's death, the ceremony of his coronation was performed by Maurice, bishop of London; thus, by his courage and celerity, he got possession of the vacant throne. No one had sufficient spirit to appear in defence of the absent prince: all men were seduced or intimidated: present possession supplied the defects in Henry's title; and the barons, as well as the people, acquiesced in a claim, which, though it could neither be justified nor comprehended, could now, they found, be opposed only through the perils of civil war and rebellion.

But as Henry foresaw that a crown, usurped against all rules of justice, would sit unsteadily on his head, he resolved, by fair professions at least, to gain the affections of all his subjects. Besides taking the usual coronation-oath to maintain the laws and execute justice, he passed a charter, on the day of his coronation, which was calculated to remedy many of the grievous oppressions which had been complained of during the reigns of his father and brother. He there promised, that, at the death of any bishop or abbot, he never would seize the revenues of the see or abbey during the vacancy, but would leave the whole to be reaped by the successor; and that he would never let to farm any ecclesiastical benefice, nor dispose of it for money (v). He promised that, upon the death of any earl, baron, or military tenant, his heir should be admitted to the possession of his estate, on paying a just and lawful relief; without being exposed to such violent exactions as had been usual during the late reigns: he remitted the wardship of minors, and allowed guardians to be appointed, who should be answerable for the trust: he promised not to dispose of any heiress in marriage, but by the advice of all the barons; and if any baron intended to give his daughter, sister, niece, or kinswoman in marriage, it should only be necessary for him to consult the king, who promised to take no money for his consent, nor ever to refuse permission, unless the person, to whom it was purposed to marry her, should happen to be his enemy: he granted his barons and military tenants the power of bequeathing, by will, their money or personal estates; and if they neglected to make a will, he promised that their heirs should succeed to them: he renounced the right of imposing moneyage, and of levying taxes at pleasure on the farms which the barons retained in their own hands: he made some general professions of moderating fines; he offered a pardon for all murders and offences committed previous to his coronation; and he remitted all debts due to the crown: he required that the vassals of the barons should enjoy the same privileges which he granted to his own baronies; and he promised a general confirmation and observance of the laws of Edward the Confessor, as improved by William I. (w). This is the substance of the chief articles contained in that famous charter.

(u) The count of Conversana was a nobleman of Norman extraction.

(v) By this master-piece of policy he gained the good will of the clergy, whose services he thought he might one day stand in need of.

Henry's next measure tended farther to increase his popularity; he degraded and committed prisoner to the Tower of London Ralph Flambard, bishop of Durham, who had been the chief instrument of oppression under his brother, William II. but this act was followed by another, which was a direct violation of his own charter, and was a bad prognostic of his sincere intentions to observe it: he kept the see of Durham vacant for five years, and during that time retained possession of all its revenues. Sensible of the great authority which Anselm had acquired by his character of piety, and by the persecutions which he had undergone from William, he sent to him at Lyons, where he resided, and invited him to return and take possession of his dignities. On the arrival of the prelate, he proposed to him the renewal of that homage which he had done his brother, and which had never been refused by any English bishop: but Anselm had acquired other sentiments by his journey to Rome, and gave the king an absolute refusal. He objected the decrees of the council of Bari, at which he himself had assisted; and declared, that so far from doing homage for his spiritual dignity, he would not so much as communicate with any ecclesiastic who paid that submission, or who accepted of investitures from laymen. Henry, who expected, in his present delicate situation, to reap great advantages from the authority and popularity of Anselm, durst not insist on his demand.

There immediately occurred an important affair, in which the king was obliged to have recourse to the authority of Anselm. Matilda, daughter of Malcolm III. king of Scotland, and niece to Edgar Atheling, had, on her father's death, and the subsequent revolutions in the Scottish government, been brought to England, and educated under her aunt Christina, in the nunnery of Rumsey. This princess Henry purposed to marry; but as she had worn the veil, though never taken the vows, doubts might arise concerning the lawfulness of the act; and he was careful not to shock the religious prejudices of his subjects. The affair was examined by Anselm, in a council of the prelates and nobles which was summoned at Lambeth: Matilda there proved that she had put on the veil, not with a view of entering into a religious life, but merely in consequence of a custom familiar to the English ladies who protected their chastity from the brutal violence of the Normans, by taking shelter under that habit, which, amidst the horrible licentiousness of the times, was yet generally revered. The council, sensible that even a princess had otherwise no security for her honour, admitted this reason as valid: they pronounced that Matilda was still free to marry; and her espousals with Henry were celebrated by Anselm with great pomp and solemnity. No act of the king's reign rendered him equally popular with his English subjects, or tended more to establish him on the throne.

But the policy and prudence of Henry, which, if time had been allowed for these virtues to produce their full effect, would have secured him possession of the crown, ran great hazard of being frustrated by the sudden appearance of Robert, who returned to Normandy about a month after the death of his brother William. He took possession, without opposition, of that duchy; and immediately made preparations for recovering England, of which, during his absence, he had by Henry's intrigues been defrauded. The great fame which he had acquired in the crusade forwarded his pretensions; and the Norman barons, sensible of the consequences, expressed the same discontent at the separation of the duchy and kingdom, which had appeared on the accession of William. Robert de Belesme, earl of Shrewsbury and Arundel, William de Warrenne, earl of Surrey, Arnulf de Montgomery, Walter Giffard, Robert de Pontefract, Robert de Mallet, Yvo de Grentmesnil, and many others of the principal nobility, invited Robert to make an attempt upon England, and promised, on his landing, to join him with all their forces. But the principal stimulator of the duke's ambition and resentment was Ralph Flambard, who, having escaped from the Tower, had fled to Normandy, where, by his eloquence and address, he had insinuated himself into the favour of Robert. Even the seamen were affected with the general popularity of his name, and they carried over to him, in 1101, the greater part of a fleet which had been equipped to oppose his passage. Henry, in this extremity, began to be apprehensive for his life, as well as for his crown; and had recourse to the superstition of the people, in order to oppose their sentiment of justice. He paid diligent court to Anselm, whose sanctity and wisdom he pretended to revere. He consulted him in all difficult emergencies; seemed to be governed by him in every measure; promised a strict regard to ecclesiastical privileges; professed a great attachment to Rome, and a resolution of persevering in an implicit obedience to the decrees of councils and to the will of the sovereign pontiff. By these caresses and declarations he entirely gained the confidence of the primate, whose influence over the people, and authority with the barons, were of the utmost service to him in his present situation. Anselm scrupled not to assure the nobles of the king's sincerity in those professions which he made, of avoiding the tyrannical and oppressive government of his father and brother: he even rode through the ranks of the army which was assembled at Pevensey, recommended to the soldiers the defence of their prince, represented the duty of keeping their oaths of allegiance, and prognosticated to them the greatest happiness from the government of so wise and just a sovereign. By this expedient, joined to the influence of the earls of Warwick and Meulant, of Roger Bigod, Richard de Redvers, and Robert Fitz-Hamon, powerful barons, who still adhered to the present government, the army was retained in the king's interest, and marched, with seeming union and firmness, to oppose Robert, who had landed with his forces at Portsmouth.

The two armies lay in sight of each other for several days without coming to action; and both princes, being apprehensive of the event, which would probably be decisive, hearkened to the counsels of Anselm and those who mediated an accommodation between them. After employing some negociation, it was agreed that Robert should resign his pretensions to England, and receive in lieu of them an annual pension of three thousand marks; that if either of the princes died without issue, the other should succeed to his dominions; that the adherents of each should be pardoned, and restored to all their possessions either in Normandy or England; and that neither Robert nor Henry should thenceforth encourage, receive, or protect the enemies of the other.

This treaty, though calculated so much for Henry's advantage, he was the first to violate. He restored indeed the estates of all Robert's adherents; but was secretly determined, that noblemen so powerful and so ill affected, who had both inclination and ability to disturb his government, should not long remain unmolested in their present opulence and grandeur. He began with Robert de Belesme, earl of Shrewsbury, who was watched for some time by spies, and then indicted on a charge, consisting of forty-five articles, which was delivered to him in writing in the king's court of judicature, and which he promised to answer; but instead of preparing his vindication, he prepared to defend himself by arms; but being soon sup-

(w) To give greater authenticity to these concessions, Henry lodged a copy of his charter in some abbey of each county; as if desirous that it should be exposed to the view of all his subjects, and remain a perpetual rule for the limitation and direction of his government: yet it is certain that, after the present purpose was served, he never once thought, during his reign, of observing one single article of it; and the whole fell so much into neglect and oblivion, that, in the following century, when the barons, who had heard an obscure tradition of it, desired to make it the model of the great charter which they exacted from king John, they could with difficulty find a copy of it in the kingdom. But as to the grievances here meant to be redressed, they were still continued in their full extent: and the royal authority, in all those particulars, lay under no manner of restriction. Reliefs of heirs, so capital an article, were never effectually fixed till the time of Magna Charta (x); and it is evident that the general promise here given, of accepting a just and lawful relief, ought to have been reduced to more precision, in order to give security to the subject. The oppression of wardship and marriage was perpetuated even till the reign of Charles II.: and it appears from Glanville, the famous justiciary of Henry II., that, in his time, where any man died intestate, an accident which must have been very frequent when the art of writing was so little known, the king, or the lord of the fief, pretended to seize all the movables, and to exclude every heir, even the children of the deceased; a sure mark of a tyrannical and arbitrary government.

(x) What is called a relief in the Conqueror's laws, preserved by Ingulf, seems to have been the heriot; since reliefs, as well as the other burdens of the feudal law, were unknown in the age of the Confessor, whose laws these originally were.

pressed

pressed by the activity and address of Henry, he was banished the kingdom, in 1102, and his estates were confiscated. His ruin involved that of his two brothers, Arnulf de Montgomery, and Roger, earl of Lancaster. Soon after followed the prosecution and condemnation of Robert de Pontefract and Robert de Mallet, who had distinguished themselves among Robert's adherents. William de Warenne was the next victim: even William, earl of Cornwall, son of the earl of Mortagne, the king's uncle, having given matter of suspicion against him, lost all the vast acquisitions of his family in England, in 1103.

Robert, enraged at the fate of his friends, imprudently ventured to come into England; and he remonstrated with his brother, in severe terms, against his breach of the treaty; but met with so bad a reception, that he began to apprehend danger to his own liberty, and was glad to purchase an escape, by resigning his pension. His indiscretion soon exposed him to more fatal injuries. This prince, whose bravery and candour procured him respect while at a distance, had no sooner attained the possession of power and enjoyment of peace, than all the vigour of his mind relaxed; and he fell into contempt among those who approached his person, or were subject to his authority. He was so remiss, both in the care of his treasure and the exercise of his government, that his servants pillaged his money with impunity, stole from him his very clothes, and proceeded thence to practice every species of extortion on his defenceless subjects. The barons gave reins to their unbounded rapine upon their vassals, and inveterate animosities against each other; and all Normandy, during the reign of this prince, was become a scene of violence and depredation. The Normans at last, in 1104, applied to Henry to use his authority for the suppression of these disorders; thereby affording him a pretext for interposing in the affairs of Normandy. Instead of employing his mediation to render his brother's government respectable, or to redress the grievances of the Normans, he made a visit to that duchy, and finding that the nobility were disposed to pay submission to him rather than to their legal sovereign, he collected, by arbitrary extortions on England, a great army and treasure, and returned in the spring of 1105 to Normandy, in a situation to obtain, either by violence or corruption, the dominion of that province. He landed at Barfleur, and proceeded to Carentan, where he encamped. Here he was soon joined by many of the Norman nobility, who, seduced by corruption, opened their fortresses for the admission of English garrisons. He was also reinforced by Helie de la Flèche, who, on the death of William Rufus, had recovered the county of Maine; and by a body of mercenaries from Bretagne. Before he entered on hostilities against his unfortunate brother, he pretended to have received dispatches from pope Pascal, encouraging him to deliver the Norman church from oppression, and re-establish, by vigorous measures, that tranquillity which the duke was unable to maintain. In the church of Carentan he was gratified with an elaborate discourse from the bishop of Seez, expatiating on the multiplied miseries of the Normans, oppressed as they were by inhuman tyrants, whom their sovereign was too weak and indolent to chastize; exaggerating the misconduct, incapacity, and debauchery of the duke; prognosticating a continuance of the same calamities and disorders, unless the duchy should speedily have a new master; and conjuring Henry to take active steps for rescuing his father's subjects from the horrors of anarchy and intestine commotion, by assuming the government of the duchy, which his brother had justly forfeited by a long series of impolitic management, and by withholding from his people that protection which alone entitled him to their allegiance. He then advanced against Baieux, which he took by storm after an obstinate siege, and revenged himself on the inhabitants by reducing it to ashes, and putting many of them to the sword. He made himself master of Caen by the voluntary submission of the inhabitants: but being repulsed at Falaise, and obliged by the winter season to raise the siege, he returned into England; after giving assurances to his adherents that he would persevere in supporting and protecting them.

In the year 1106 he opened the campaign with the siege of Tenchebrai, a fortress belonging to the earl of Mortagne; and it became evident, from his preparations and progress, that he intended to usurp the entire possession of Normandy. Robert was at last roused from his lethargy; and being supported by the earl of Mortagne and Robert de Belesme, the king's inveterate enemies, he raised a considerable army, and approached his brother's camp, with a view of finishing, in one decisive battle, the quarrel between them. He was now entered on that scene of action in which alone he was qualified to excel; and he so animated his troops by his example, that they threw the English into disorder, and had nearly obtained the victory; when the flight of Belesme spread a panic among the Normans, and occasioned their total defeat. Henry, besides doing great execution on the enemy, made near ten thousand prisoners; among whom was duke Robert himself, and all the most considerable barons who adhered to his interests. This battle was fought on the 28th of September. This victory was followed by the final reduction of Normandy: Roüen immediately submitted to the conqueror: Falaise, after some negociation, opened its gates; and by this acquisition, besides rendering himself master of an important fortress, he got into his hands prince William, the only son of Robert, whose age did not exceed five years. He assembled the states of Normandy; and having received the homage of all the vassals of the duchy, having settled the government, revoked his brother's donations, and dismantled the castles lately built, he returned into England in 1107, and carried along with him the duke as prisoner. That unfortunate prince was detained in custody during the remainder of his life, which was no less than twenty-eight years, and he died in the castle of Cardiff in Glamorganshire, when he had exceeded the eightieth year of his age; happy if, without losing his liberty, he could have relinquished that power which he was not qualified either to hold or exercise (y). Prince William was committed to the care of Helie de St. Saen; who had married Robert's natural daughter, and who being a man of probity and honour beyond what was usual in those ages, executed the trust with great affection and fidelity. Edgar Atheling, who had followed Robert in the expedition to Jerusalem, and who had lived with him ever since in Normandy, was another illustrious prisoner taken in the battle of Tenchebrai. Henry gave him his liberty, and settled a small pension on him, with which he retired; and he lived to a good old age in England, totally neglected and forgotten (z).

Having completed the conquest of Normandy, and settled the government of that province, Henry finished a controversy, which had been long depending between him and the pope, with regard to the investitures in ecclesiastical benefices; and though he was here obliged to relinquish some of the ancient rights of the crown, he extricated himself from the difficulty on easier terms than most princes, who in that age were so unhappy as to be engaged in disputes with the apostolic see. The king's situation, in the beginning of his reign, obliged him to pay great court to Anselm: the advantages which he had reaped from the zealous friendship of that prelate, had made him sensible how prone the minds of his people were to superstition, and what an ascendant the ecclesiastics had been able to assume over them. He had seen, on the accession of his brother William Rufus, that though the rights of promogeniture were then violated, and the inclinations of almost all the barons thwarted, yet the (y) Such was the severe fate which the unfeeling policy of a brother inflicted on Robert, duke of Normandy; a prince who inherited all the valour of his great ancestor Rollo, and who added, to his inherent courage, a profound knowledge of the art of war, according to the practice of the times in which he flourished. His natural capacity was far from being contemptible; and he possessed a fund of eloquence and vivacity. He was gay and prodigal in his personal expences, and immoderately lavish in his bounties to his friends. The principal cause of his ruin was his imprudent relaxation of the reins of government; a fault which he carried to such an excess as to render the condition of his subjects more miserable than if he had ruled them with all the rigour of a despot; for the number of petty tyrants who were fostered by his lenity of temper, could not but produce the most flagrant and general oppression. Though he was capable of giving judicious advice in the affairs of others, he had not the fortitude of mind which was necessary to apply it to the purposes of his own government. Upon the whole, he was an extraordinary compound of animal courage and political weakness; and, as his heart was too tender and humane to enforce even that moderate strictness of administration which is at all times necessary for the peace of the community, but is more particularly requisite in a licentious age, his greatest advocates must admit, that he was absolutely unqualified to exercise, with dignity or effect, the functions of sovereign power.

(z) This prince was distinguished by personal bravery; but nothing can be a stronger proof of his mean talents in every other respect, than that, notwithstanding he possessed the affections of the English, and enjoyed the only legal title to the throne, he was allowed, during the reigns of so many violent and jealous usurpers, to live unmolested, and go to his grave in peace.

authority of Lanfranc, the primate, had prevailed over all other considerations: his own case, which was still more unfavourable, afforded an instance in which the clergy had more evidently shewn their influence and power. These recent examples, while they made him cautious not to offend that mighty body, convinced him that it was his interest to retain the prerogative of the crown in filling offices of such vast importance, and to check the ecclesiastics in that independence to which they visibly aspired. The choice which his brother had made of Anselm, was so far unfortunate to the king's pretensions, that this prelate was celebrated for his piety and zeal, and austerity of manners; and though his monkish devotion, and narrow principles, prognosticated no great knowledge of the world or depth of policy, he was, on that very account, a more dangerous instrument in the hands of politicians, and retained a greater ascendant over the bigoted populace. The prudence and temper of the king appear in nothing more conspicuous than in the management of this delicate affair; where he was always sensible that it had become necessary for him to risque his whole crown, in order to preserve the most invaluable jewel of it. Anselm had no sooner returned from banishment, than his refusal to do homage to the king raised a dispute, which Henry evaded at that critical juncture, by promising to send a messenger, in order to compound the matter with Pascal II. who then filled the papal chair. The messenger, as was probably foreseen, returned with an absolute refusal of the king's demands; and that fortified by many reasons, which were well qualified to operate on the understandings of men in those ages. Pascal quoted the scriptures, to prove that Christ was the door; and thence inferred, that all ecclesiastics must enter into the church through Christ alone, not through the civil magistrates, or any profane laymen. "It is monstrous," added the pontiff, "that a son should pretend to beget his father, or a man to create his God—priests are called gods in scripture (a), as being the vicars of God; and will you, by your abominable pretensions to grant them their investiture, assume the right of creating them?" These arguments, however, could not cause Henry to resign so important a prerogative; and, as he was possessed of reflection and learning, he thought that the absurdity of a man's creating his God, even allowing priests to be gods, was not urged with the best grace by the pope. But as he wished to delay the coming to any dangerous extremity with the church, he persuaded Anselm, that he should be able, by farther negociation, to attain some composition with Pascal; and for that purpose he dispatched three bishops to Rome, while Anselm sent two messengers of his own, to be more fully assured of the pope's intentions. Pascal returned letters equally positive and arrogant, both to the king and primate; urging to the former, that by assuming the right of investitures, he committed a kind of spiritual adultery with the church, who was the spouse of Christ, and who must not admit of such a commerce with any other person; and insisting with the latter, that the pretension of kings to confer benefices was the source of all simony; a topic which had but too much foundation in those ages.

Henry suppressed the letter addressed to himself, and persuaded the three bishops to prevaricate, and the word of two monks was not deemed equal to that of three bishops; so that the king, as if he had finally gained his cause, proceeded to fill the sees of Hereford and Salisbury, and to invest the new bishops in the usual manner. But Anselm, who gave no credit to the asseveration of the king's messengers, refused not only to consecrate them, but even to communicate with them; and the bishops themselves, finding how odious they were become, returned to Henry the ensigns of their dignity. The quarrel every day increased between the king and the primate: the former, notwithstanding the prudence and moderation of his temper, threw out menaces against such as should pretend to oppose him in exerting the ancient prerogatives of the crown; and Anselm, sensible of his own dangerous situation, desired leave to make a journey to Rome, in order to lay the case before the pope. Henry, well pleased to be rid, without violence, of so inflexible an antagonist, readily granted him permission. The prelate was attended to the shore by infinite multitudes of all ranks, who thus declared for their primate against their sovereign, and who regarded his departure as the final abolition of religion in the kingdom. The king, however, seized all the revenues of his see; and sent William de Warelwast to negociate with Pascal, and to find some means of accommodation in this delicate affair.

The English minister told Pascal, that his master would rather lose his crown, than part with the right of granting investitures. "And I," replied Pascal, "would rather lose my head than allow him to retain it." Henry secretly prohibited Anselm from returning, unless he resolved to conform himself to the laws and usages of the kingdom; and the primate took up his residence at Lyons, in expectation that the king would at last be obliged to yield the point which was the present object of controversy between them. Soon after, he was permitted to return to his monastery at Bec, in Normandy; and Henry, besides restoring to him the revenues of his see, treated him with great respect, and held several conferences with him, in order to soften his opposition, and bend him to submission. The people of England, who thought all differences now accommodated, were inclined to blame their primate for absenting himself from his charge; and he daily received letters from his partizans, representing the necessity of his return. The total extinction, they told him, of religion and Christianity was likely to ensue from the want of his fatherly care: the most shocking customs prevail in England: and the dread of his severity being removed, sodomy, and the practice of wearing long hair, gain ground among all ranks of men, and these enormities openly appear every where, without sense of shame or fear of punishment (b).

Pascal had already excommunicated the earl of Meulant, and the other ministers of Henry, who were instrumental in supporting his pretensions: he daily menaced the king himself with a like sentence; and suspended the blow only to give him leisure to prevent it by a timely submission. The malcontents waited impatiently for the opportunity of disturbing his government by conspiracies and insurrections: the king's best friends were anxious at the prospect of an incident which would set their religious and civil duties at variance; and the countess of Blois, his sister, a princess of piety, who had great influence

(a) Eadmer, p. 61. I much suspect, that this text of scripture is a forgery of his holiness; for I have not been able to find it. Yet it passed current in those ages, and was often quoted by the clergy as the foundation of their power. See Epist. St. Thom. p. 169.

(b) The policy of the court of Rome has commonly been much admired; and men, judging by success, have bestowed the highest eulogies on that prudence by which a power, from such slender beginnings, could advance, without force of arms, to establish an universal and almost absolute monarchy in Europe. But the wisdom of so long a succession of men who filled the papal throne, and who were of such different ages, tempers, and interests, is not intelligible, and could never have place in nature. The instrument, indeed, with which they wrought, the ignorance and superstition of the people, is so gross an engine, of such universal prevalence, and so little liable to accident or disorder, that it may be successful, even in the most unskilful hands: and scarcely any indiscretion can frustrate its operations. While the court of Rome was openly abandoned to the most flagrant disorders, even while it was torn with schisms and factions, the power of the church daily made a sensible progress in Europe; and the temerity of Gregory and caution of Pascal were equally fortunate in promoting it. The clergy, feeling the necessity which they lay under of being protected against the violence of princes, or rigour of the laws, were well pleased to adhere to a foreign head, who, being removed from the fear of the civil authority, could freely employ the power of the whole church, in defending her ancient or usurped properties and privileges, when invaded in any particular country: the monks, desirous of an independence on their diocesans, professed a still more devoted attachment to the triple crown; and the stupid people possessed no science or reason, which they could oppose to the most exorbitant pretensions. Nonsense passed for demonstration; the most criminal means were sanctified by the piety of the end: treaties were not supposed to be binding, where the interests of God were concerned: the ancient laws and customs of states had no authority against a divine right: impudent forgeries were received as authentic monuments of antiquity: and the champions of holy church, if successful, were celebrated as heroes; if unfortunate, were worshipped as martyrs; and all events thus turned out equally to the advantage of clerical usurpations. Pascal himself, the reigning pope, was, in the course of this very controversy concerning investitures, involved in circumstances, and necessitated to follow a conduct, which would have drawn disgrace and ruin on any temporal prince that had been so unfortunate as to fall into a like situation. His person was seized by the emperor Henry V. and he was obliged, by a formal treaty, to resign to that monarch the right of granting investitures, for which they had so long contended. In order to add greater solemnity to this agreement, the emperor and pope communicated together on the same host; one half of which was given to the prince, the other taken by the pontiff: the most tremendous imprecations were publicly denounced on either of them who should violate the treaty: yet no sooner did Pascal recover his liberty, than he revoked all his concessions, and pronounced the sentence of excommunication against the emperor, who, in the end, was obliged to submit to the terms required of him, and to yield up all his pretensions, which he never could resume.

over him, was affrighted with the danger of her brother's eternal damnation. Henry, on the other hand seemed determined to run all hazards, rather than resign a prerogative of such importance, which had been enjoyed by all his predecessors; and it seemed probable, from his great prudence and abilities, that he might be able to sustain his rights, and finally prevail in the contest. While Pascal and Henry thus stood mutually in awe of each other, it was the more easy to bring about an accommodation between them, and to find a medium in which they might agree.

Before bishops took possession of their dignities, they had formerly been accustomed to pass through two ceremonies: they received from the hands of the sovereign a ring and crosier, as symbols of their office; and this was called their investiture: they also made those submissions to the prince which were required of vassals by the rites of the feudal law, and which received the name of homage. And as the king might refuse both to grant the investiture and to receive the homage, though the chapter had, by some canons of the middle age been endowed with the right of election, the sovereign had in reality the sole power of appointing prelates. Urban II. had equally deprived laymen of the rights of granting investiture and of receiving homage: the emperors never were able, by all their wars and negociations, to cause any distinction to be admitted between them: the interposition of profane laymen, in any particular, was still represented as impious and abominable; and the church openly aspired to a total independence on the state. But Henry had put England as well as Normandy in such a situation, as gave greater weight to his negociations; and Pascal was for the present satisfied with his resigning the right of granting investitures, by which the spiritual dignity was supposed to be conferred; and he allowed the bishops to do homage for their temporal properties and privileges. The pontiff was well pleased to have made this acquisition, which, he hoped, would in time involve the whole; and the king, anxious to procure an escape from a very dangerous situation, was content to retain some, though a more precarious authority, in the election of prelates.

After the principal controversy was accommodated, it was not difficult to adjust the other differences. The pope allowed Anselm to communicate with the prelates who had already received investitures from the crown; and he only required of them some submissions for their past misconduct. He also granted Anselm a plenary power of remedying every other disorder, which, he said, might arise from the barbarousness of the country. Such was the idea which the popes then entertained of the English; and nothing can be a stronger proof of the miserable ignorance in which the people of England were then plunged, than that a man who sat on the papal throne, and who subsisted by absurdities and nonsense, should think himself entitled to treat them as barbarians.

During the course of these controversies, a synod was held at Westminster, where the king, intent only on the main dispute, allowed some canons of less importance to be enacted, which tended to promote the usurpations of the clergy. The celibacy of priests was enjoined, a point which it was still found very difficult to carry into execution: and even laymen were not allowed to marry within the seventh degree of affinity (c). The synod also passed a vote, prohibiting the laity from wearing long hair. The aversion of the clergy to this mode was not confined to England. When the king went to Normandy, before he had conquered that province, the bishop of Seez, in a formal harangue, earnestly exhorted him to redress the manifold disorders under which the government laboured, and to oblige the people to poll their hair in a decent form. Henry, though he would not resign his prerogatives to the church, willingly parted with his hair: he cut it in the form which they required of him, and obliged all the courtiers to imitate his example.

In the year 1108 Henry endeavoured to remedy some civil grievances which had excited the murmurs of the nation. Whenever a royal progress was made into any of the countries, the king and his retinue were supplied with provisions and carriages by the tenants of the crown lands; and when they passed through such parts as were not comprehended among the demesnes of the crown, they purchased whatever they required at a low price. In the reign of William II. this practice of purveyance had been the source of much oppression: wherever the king appeared, the domestics of the court seized without distinction every thing which came in their way, treated the people with all the insolent tyranny of office, sold or destroyed what they could not consume, and rendered the whole country through which they passed a scene of devastation, outrage, and riot. These disorders had been so frequent, that many of the inhabitants of those parts in which the sovereign was expected, were accustomed to make their escape into the woods with whatever they could conveniently carry off; and the report of the royal approach produced a consternation nearly equal to that which would have arisen from the proximity of an invading army. As the royal attendants had continued to act with equal injustice in the present reign, Henry resolved to make some compensation to his subjects for his late grievous exactions in the prosecution of his attempts on Normandy, by repressing the enormous abuses which had accompanied his occasional progresses. He issued a proclamation, fixing the quantity of supplies which the king's servants should take, and the price should be paid in return; and inflicting, on all who should offend in the instances above mentioned, either the privation of sight, or the amputation of limbs. These punishments being enforced with great rigour, the continuance of the evil was effectually stopped throughout this reign. Another grievance which Henry redressed about the same time, was the adulteration of the current coin, which had become extremely frequent. To check this practice, he ordained that such as counterfeited the coin should be punished with the loss of their sight, as well as of their virility.

The acquisition of Normandy was a great point of Henry's ambition; being the ancient patrimony of his family, and the only territory, which, while in his possession, gave him any weight or consideration on the continent: but the injustice of his usurpation was the source of great inquietude, involved him in frequent wars, and obliged him to impose on his English subjects those many heavy and arbitrary taxes, of which all the historians of that age unanimously complain. His nephew William was but five years of age, when he committed him to the care of Helie de St. Saen; and it is probable, that his reason for entrusting that important charge to a man of so unblemished a character, was to prevent all malignant suspicions, in case any accident should befal the life of the young prince. He soon repented of his choice, and conceiving a desire of getting the young prince into his power, he went over to the continent, and commissioned Robert de Beauchamp to repair, with a party of cavalry, to the castle of St. Saen, (from which Helie was then absent,) and seize the object of royal jealousy. This scheme, however, was rendered abortive by the faithful vigilance of Helie's servants, who carried off young William while he was asleep, and delivered him into the hands of his guardian. The king, mortified at the ill success of this project, confiscated the estates of Helie; in consequence of which, that worthy nobleman was reduced to the necessity of wandering from the territories of one prince to those of another, accompanied by his pupil, whose interests he promoted with the most cordial eagerness.

During Henry's stay in Normandy, he was involved in hostilities with Louis le Gros, who had succeeded to the crown of France on the death of the first Philip, and whom Henry had irritated by the seizure of Gisors, a well-fortified town on the frontiers of the duchy of Normandy, contrary to the terms of a treaty between the two princes, which imported that this place should be in the possession of a third person, subject to neither of the sovereigns. Louis, enraged at the perfidy of the king of England, challenged him to single combat, which Henry thought proper to decline. A war was the consequence, in which the dukes of Burgundy and Guienne, and Theobald, earl of Blois, the nephew of Henry, supported that monarch's cause against Louis; while the latter was assisted by Fulk, count of Anjou and Robert, earl of Flanders, who had returned from the Holy Land with a high reputation for heroic achievements. Henry did not at first personally engage in this war, which was carried on with various success between his allies and the king of France; but when some French detachments had entered Normandy, he marched against them, and put them to the rout. A peace was then concluded, in 1109, by which Gisors was ceded to Henry, and an indemnity granted to those vassals of France who had joined him against their feudal lord.

(c) By this contrivance the pope augmented the profits which he reaped from granting dispensations; and likewise those from divorces, for as the art of writing was then rare, and parish registers were not regularly kept, it was not easy to ascertain the degrees of affinity even among people of rank; and any man who had money sufficient to pay for it, might obtain a divorce, on pretence that his wife was more nearly related to him than was permitted by the canons.

On his return to England, he received an embassy from the emperor Henry V. demanding in marriage his daughter Matilda (or Maud), who was then about seven years of age. The king treated the deputies with courtesy and magnificence, and acceded to their sovereign's request. The nuptial treaty being concluded, the young princess was sent over to the emperor in the succeeding year, 1110, with a handsome portion, produced by an impost of three shillings on every hide of land throughout the kingdom (d). By the customs of the feudal law the king was entitled to an extraordinary subsidy from his vassals, on the marriage of his eldest daughter, that he might give her a suitable portion; but as the people had very lately felt the oppressive exactions which Henry had imposed on them to assist him in acquiring dominion in France, the enormous tax he demanded of them on the present occasion was borne with discontent and murmuring.

Henry's continental dominions appearing to him to require his presence, he again crossed the channel in 1111, and renewed the war with the French monarch, who had encouraged Fulk, count of Anjou, in his views of opposition. Fulk having, on the death of Helie de la Flêche, taken possession of the county of Maine, the new duke of Normandy required him to hold that province as a fief of the duchy. The count not only refused to comply with this demand; but resolved to act as the assertor of young William's claim to the dukedom. To this prince he had promised his daughter Sibylla in marriage; and he now displayed his zeal in the cause of his intended son-in-law, by an invasion of Normandy. The earl of Blois, having been prompted by his uncle to revolt from Louis, gave a diversion to the arms of that prince, who lost his brave ally, the earl of Flanders, in an engagement with his rebellious vassal. The events of this petty war being unworthy of detail, it will be sufficient to notice, that, after it had continued about a year, Robert de Belesme, who had taken part against Henry, was sent by Louis, in 1112, to mediate a peace with his royal antagonist. Henry was so exasperated at the revolt of Robert de Belesme, that he ordered him to be arrested as a rebel, and condemned him, with the assent of the justiciaries of his court, to perpetual confinement. This imprisonment was followed by the siege of Alençon, one of his fortresses, which soon surrendered to the English monarch. Some other advantage being gained by Henry, the count of Anjou listened to the propositions made by that prince, who, eager to detach Fulk from his support of young William's interests, tempted him with the offer of marrying his own son of the same name to a daughter of the count. A treaty being concluded between them in 1113, the count was confirmed in the possession of Maine, on condition of his holding it of the sovereign of Normandy in feudal tenure; and it was stipulated, that Matilda, the eldest daughter of the Anjevin prince, should be given in marriage to Henry's heir. This agreement depriving duke Robert's son of that protection which he had lately received at the court of Anjou, he was conducted by his guardian into the territories of Baldwin, the new earl of Flanders, by whom he was treated with marks of favour and friendship. The defection of Fulk induced the king of France to negociate a peace with Henry, who required him to give up the strong fortress of Belesme, situated in the French dominions, and belonging to the captive earl. Louis not only acceded to this demand, but permitted the count of Bretagne to transfer his homage to Henry, as duke of Normandy. Having demolished the castle of Belesme, Henry returned to England, pleased with the advantageous termination of the war.

Henry next undertook to conduct in person an expedition against the Welsh, to repress their incursions on his frontiers. He had before transplanted into South Wales a body of Flemings, who had migrated from their native country in consequence of an inundation, which overwhelmed a long tract of coast. They had been stationed by William II. in Cumberland, at the time of his rebuilding Carlisle; from which county they were removed by Henry into Pembrokeshire, where they proved constant eyesores to the Welsh, who in vain endeavoured to exterminate them. The campaign now made in Wales by Henry, who was accompanied by Alexander, king of Scotland, in 1114, restored for a time the peace of the borders; but it was not sufficiently decisive to secure a long continuance of pacific disposition.

Henry's good fortune in acquiring foreign possessions, did not remove his apprehensions of the future attempts of his nephew, Robert's son. That prince was now, 1116, of the age of fifteen; and had given such indications of a pregnant capacity and aspiring genius, as alarmed his uncle, who endeavoured to allure him into his power by the offer of three English earldoms: but the young prince was too prudent to commit himself into the hands of the unprincipled monarch. The assistance afforded by Henry to his nephew the earl of Blois, in a fresh revolt which that nobleman now kindled against his Gallic sovereign, formed a pretence for the open interposition of Louis in behalf of the lawful heir of Normandy. After demanding the release of his vassal, duke Robert, he declared war against Henry; and, having entered into a league with the earl of Flanders and his former ally Fulk, he invaded the Norman duchy, where he was joined by many of the principal nobility.

For the maintenance of this war Henry renewed those immoderate taxations with which he had frequently oppressed his subjects. He took into his service a number of mercenaries whom the count of Bretagne had permitted him to levy in his dominions. He likewise raised a strong army of English; but he met with ill success in his first efforts. He had the mortification to see the vicinity of the Norman capital furiously ravaged by the earl of Flanders, in 1117; at which he was highly incensed, and menaced Baldwin, who was so far from being intimidated, that he challenged the king to battle, which Henry thought fit to decline, and retired at the commencement of winter without coming to any general action.

The next campaign, in 1118, was more prosperous to Henry, as his most active adversary, the earl of Flanders, received a wound that disabled him from the service of the field; and, returning to his own territories, he rendered his wound mortal by intemperance.

The calamities which the duchy suffered by this war, did not so much affect the feelings of Henry as the open defection of many of his barons, and the uncertain fidelity of others. The intrigues of his enemies had disseminated such a spirit of disaffection among his subjects, that he was almost unwilling to repose confidence in any person. His suspicions were increased by a plot which he discovered to have been formed against his life by some of the officers of his bed-chamber. The conspiracy rendered him so apprehensive of assassination, that, during the continuance of these troubles, he constantly kept a sword and shield by his bed-side, and stationed near his apartment a considerable number of armed domestics of experienced honour, for the nocturnal security of his person.

Louis, finding himself unable to wrest Normandy from the king by force of arms, had recourse, in 1119, to the expedient of applying to the spiritual power, and of affording the ecclesiastics a pretence to interpose in the temporal concerns of princes. He carried young William to a general council, which was assembled at Rheims by pope Calistus II. presented the Norman prince to them, complained of the manifest usurpation and injustice of Henry, craved the assistance of the church for reinstating the true heir in his dominions, and represented the enormity of detaining in captivity so brave a prince as Robert, one of the most eminent champions of the cross, and who, by that very quality, was placed under the immediate protection of the holy see. Henry knew how to defend the rights of his crown with vigour, and dexterity. He had sent over the English bishops to this synod; but at the same time had warned them that if any farther claims were started by the pope or the ecclesiastics, he was determined to adhere to the laws and customs of England, and maintain the prerogatives transmitted to him by his predecessors. "Go," said he to them, "salute the pope in my name; hear his apostolical precepts; but take care to bring none of his new inventions into my kingdom." Finding, however, that it would be easier for him to elude than oppose the efforts of Calistus, he gave his ambassadors orders to gain the pope and his favourites by liberal presents and promises. The complaints of the Norman prince were thenceforth heard with great coldness by the council; and Calistus confessed, after a conference which he had the same summer with Henry, and when that prince probably renewed his presents, that, of all men whom he had ever yet been acquainted with, he was beyond comparison the most eloquent and persuasive.

The warlike measures of Louis proved as ineffectual as his intrigues. He had laid a scheme for surprising Noyon; but Henry having received intelligence of the design, marched to the relief of the place, and suddenly attacked the French in the plain of Brenneville, near Andeli, as they were advancing towards it. A sharp conflict ensued on the 20th of August; where prince William behaved with great bravery, and the king himself was in the most imminent danger. He was wounded in the head by Crispin, a gallant Norman officer, who had followed the fortunes of William; but as soon as he recovered from the shock, he beat his antagonist to the ground, and so encouraged his troops by his example, that they put the French to total rout, and had very nearly taken their king prisoner. The dignity of the persons engaged in this skirmish, rendered it the most memorable action of the war; for, in other respects, it was not of great importance. There were nine hundred horsemen, who fought on both sides; yet were there only three persons slain. The rest were defended by that heavy armour worn by the cavalry in those times. An accommodation ensued between the kings of France and England in 1120; the terms of which were, that all places taken during the war should be reciprocally restored; that all the remaining prisoners should be released without ransom; and that Henry's son William should be invested by the king of France with the duchy of Normandy, for which he was to do homage to the French crown. The rebellious nobles of the duchy were comprehended in this accommodation; but the interests of young William were entirely neglected.

This public prosperity of Henry was much overbalanced by a domestic calamity which befel him. His only son William had now reached his eighteenth year; and the king, from the facility with which he himself had usurped the crown, dreading that a like revolution might subvert his family, had taken care to have him recognised successor by the states of the kingdom, and had carried him over to Normandy, that he might receive the homage of the barons of that duchy. The king, on his return, set sail from Barfleur on the 26th of November, with a numerous train of barons, and was soon carried by a fair wind out of sight of land. He arrived in England the following morning. The prince was detained by some accident; and his sailors, as well as their captain Thomas Fitz-Stephens, having spent the interval in drinking, were so disordered, that, being in a hurry to follow the king, they heedlessly run the ship on a rock, where she foundered. William was put into the long-boat, with some young nobles of high rank, and had got clear of the ship; when hearing the cries of his natural sister, the countess of Perche, he ordered the seamen to row back in hopes of saving her; but the numbers who then crowded in soon sunk the boat; and the prince with all his retinue perished. Above a hundred and forty young noblemen of the principal families of England and Normandy, were lost on this occasion. A butcher of Roüen was the only person on board who escaped: he clung to the mast, and was taken up next morning by fishermen. Fitz-Stephens also took hold of the mast; but being informed by the butcher that prince William had perished, he said that he would not survive the disaster; and he threw himself headlong into the sea. Henry entertained hopes for three days, that his son had put into some distant port of England; but when certain intelligence of the calamity was brought him, he fainted away; and it was remarked, that he never after was seen to smile, nor ever recovered his wonted cheerfulness.

The death of William may be regarded in one respect as a misfortune to the English; because it was the immediate source of those civil wars, which, after the demise of the king, caused such confusion in the kingdom; but it is remarkable, that the young prince had entertained a violent aversion to the natives; and had been heard to threaten, that when he should be king, he would make them draw the plough, and would turn them into beasts of burthen. These prepossessions he inherited from his father, who, though he appeared, when it might serve his purpose, to value himself on his birth, as a native of England, shewed, in the course of his government, an extreme prejudice against that people. All hopes of preferment, to ecclesiastical as well as civil dignities, were denied them during his whole reign; and any foreigner, however ignorant or worthless, was sure to have the preference in every competition. As the English had given no disturbance to the government during the course of fifty years, this inveterate antipathy in a prince of so much temper as well as penetration, forms a presumption that the English of that age were still a rude and barbarous people even compared to the Normans, and impresses us with no very favourable idea of the Anglo-Saxon manners.

Prince William left no children; and the king had not now any legitimate issue; except one daughter, Matilda, whom in 1110, he had betrothed, though only eight years of age, to the emperor Henry V. as above-mentioned. But as her absence from the kingdom, and her marriage into a foreign family, might endanger the succession, Henry, who was now a widower (e), was induced to marry, in hopes of having male heirs; and he made his addresses in 1121 to Adelina, daughter of Godfrey, duke of Louvain, and niece of pope Calistus, a young princess of an amiable person. But Adelina brought him no children; and the prince, who was most likely to dispute the succession, and even the immediate possession of the crown, recovered hopes of subverting his rival, who had successively seized all his patrimonial dominions.

William, son of duke Robert, was still protected in the French court. The count of Anjou, who had alternately assisted and deserted prince William, returned about this time from the Holy Land, whither he had repaired immediately after the nuptials between his daughter and Henry's son; and finding that the princess had become a widow, sent to the English court to demand not only her person, but her dowry, as the marriage by reason of her impuberty, had not been consummated. The king readily delivered up the lady, but withheld the dower: a conduct which so offended the count, that he again embraced the cause of Henry's nephew, in 1122, and renewed his promise of giving him the hand of one of his daughters.

The intrigues of young William's friends were so successful as to produce a conspiracy of many of the barons of Normandy, whose object was to deprive Henry of the sovereignty of that duchy; but their measures were not carried on so secretly as to escape the penetration of Henry, who went over to Normandy in 1123, and found that his suspicions were not ill-grounded, though the conspirators had not taken to arms. They, however, took the field before they were properly prepared, and Henry gained some advantage over them, but was not able to extinguish the rebellion, hostilities being recommenced in the spring of 1124. This war was speedily terminated;

(e) Queen Matilda died on the first of May, 1118. She was a princess of great virtue and signal accomplishments, equally distinguished for her charitable exertions, and for her strict attention to the duties of her religion. Among other works of charity, she founded an hospital for lepers in the city of London; and erected the priory of Christ Church, within Aldgate. As she was once passing the river Lea, at Old Ford, near London, she very narrowly escaped being drowned, which induced her to order the erection of two stone bridges, at the distance of a mile from the Old Ford; one over the main body of the river Lea, at the end of the town of Stratford, and the other over a contiguous branch, commonly called Channel's Bridge. Between these two bridges she caused a highway of gravel to be raised. For the support of these works she made over certain manors, and a mill, known by the name of Wiggon Mill, to the abbess of Barking. We are told, in Stow's Annals, that these were the first bridges in England, that were composed of stone; and that because they were raised in the form of a bow, the town of Stratford was afterwards denominated Bow.

for the leaders of the revolt were surprized on a march when they were attended by a very small party, and taken prisoners. This blow totally crushed the hopes of the rebels; and, by the imprisonment of the ringleaders, and the infliction of various kinds of punishment on others, tranquillity was soon re-established throughout the duchy.

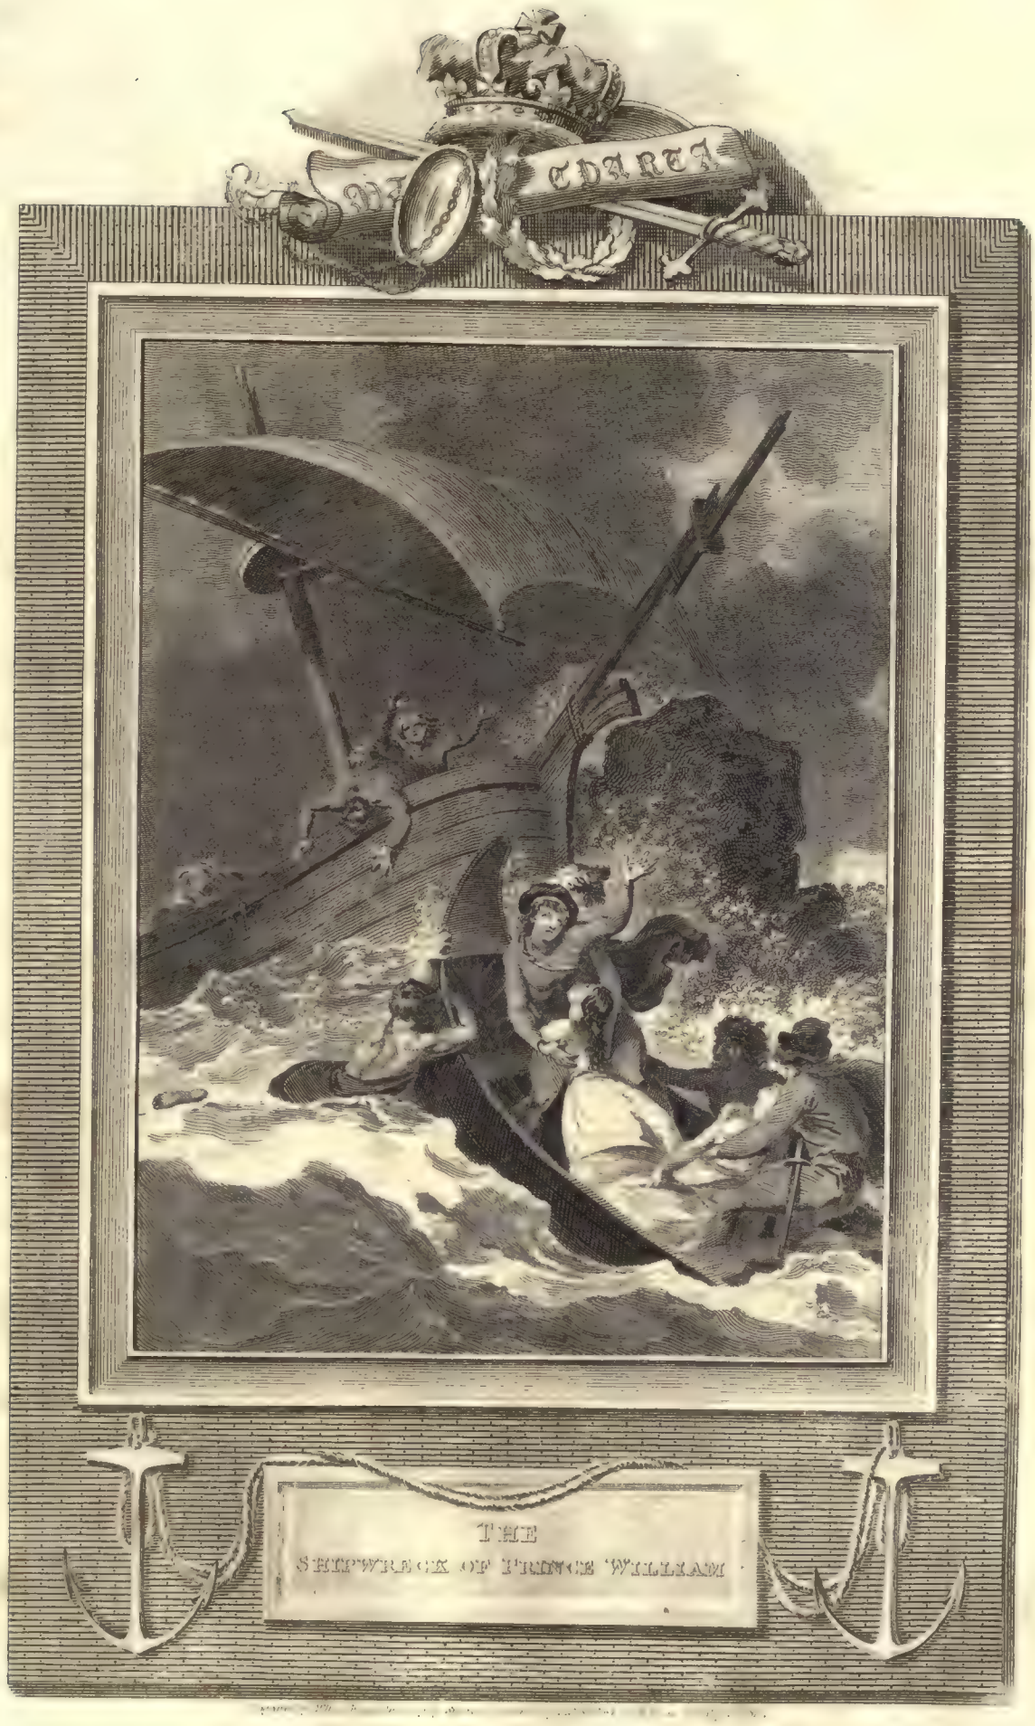
Fulk, count of Anjou, a person in whose honour, no confidence could be reposed, was this year induced by the promises of Henry to renounce the allegiance of his nephew; and that prince's nuptial contract with the count's daughter Sibylla was dissolved, on the application of the English monarch, by a papal sentence, founded on the pretext of consanguinity, though the parties did not bear a nearer degree of relation to each other, than had existed between Henry's son and Fulk's eldest daughter, whose marriage had not been considered as liable to the smallest objection. But Henry's nephew and competitor, William, still enjoyed an asylum in the French court; and, on the dissolution of his matrimonial contract with Sibylla, Louis gave him his queen's sister in marriage, with the whole Vexin François for her dowry, in 1125. The acquisition of this territory gave the prince an opportunity of making occasional attempts on Normandy, which were defeated, however, by the vigilance of his uncle.

During these turmoils on the continent, a great discontent prevailed in England, in consequence of the oppressive burthens of perpetual and enormous taxation. The miseries which proceeded from this source were accompanied, in the present year, 1125, with an extraordinary dearth, which was aggravated by the evils arising from the circulation of counterfeit coin. Complaints on this head having reached the king, he dispatched orders from Normandy to Roger, bishop of Salisbury, chief justiciary and regent of the kingdom, to punish the coiners with exemplary rigour. A great number of these criminals were immediately apprehended, and condemned to lose their right hands as well as the distinctive marks of virility.

While the king was preserving by his presence the peace of Normandy, his daughter Matilda, having lost her consort, the emperor of Germany, returned to his court, in compliance with his requisition. So soon as he was convinced of the improbability of his receiving any increase to his family, he had been desirous of constituting her the heiress of his dominions; but her union with the emperor formed a strong objection to this scheme, as the English nation would not submit to the rule of a person whose marriage with a foreign potentate would expose the realm to the degradation of becoming a province to a distant sovereignty. This obstacle being removed by the decease of her husband, Henry resumed his intentions in her favour; and, conducting her to England in 1126, he took the earliest opportunity of proposing her to the national council, as his successor. Having convoked that assembly at London in 1127, he pronounced an harangue in support of his daughter's right to the crown, of which, he said, she was the lawful heir, both on the father's and mother's side. His influence over the deliberations of the council had the desired effect, and the members bound themselves by oath to acknowledge Matilda as their sovereign, if her royal father should die without legitimate male issue.

But the satisfaction which Henry derived from this approbation of his proposal, was greatly allayed by intelligence which he shortly after received from the continent, importing that Charles of Denmark, earl of Flanders, surnamed the Good, had been assassinated in a church at Bruges, by a party of his own subjects; and that the king of France, as sovereign lord of that earldom, had conferred it on the young Norman prince, who had strong pretensions to it as great-grandson of Baldwin IV. father of the Conqueror's queen. This aggrandisement of his nephew gave great uneasiness to Henry, who dreaded the success of that prince's future attempts for the reduction of Normandy, which might not prove a difficult task to an enterprizing warrior, possessed of a flourishing state, and favoured with the secret wishes of most of the nobles of that duchy. As Henry knew the inconstancy of the count of Anjou, whom he looked upon with an eye of jealousy and fear, (his territories being extremely well situated for harassing and embroiling the duchy of Normandy,) he meditated on the most procable mode of hindering a connection between his nephew and the count. To effect this he proposed to give his daughter, the widow of the late emperor, in marriage to Geoffrey (f), the son of Fulk. He therefore negociated this alliance without delay, and the count and his son readily acceded to it, though it was not equally agreeable to Matilda herself. Not presuming, however, to oppose the will of her father, she went to Normandy, and was immediately betrothed to Geoffrey; and, on the king's arrival at Roüen in the same summer, the nuptials were completely solemnized. Fulk then resigned all his dominions (comprehending the provinces of Anjou, Touraine, and Maine,) to his son; a cession he was induced to make by the reversionary offer of the crown of Jerusalem, which Baldwin II. had engaged to secure to him, if he would consent to espouse his eldest daughter. Repairing to the Holy Land, he gave his hand to the princess, succeeded to the crown after an interval of four years, and defended his new territories against the infidels with great spirit and success.

The treaty of marriage between Matilda and Geoffrey had been planned and negociated with such secrecy, that the accomplishment of it gave great surprize to the nobles of England and Normandy; and their wonder was succeeded by resentment at the neglect with which their sovereign had treated them, in taking so important a step without their concurrence. The discontent which this clandestine measure produced was so general, as to give room to suspect that it would have a sinister influence on the fidelity of many of those who had lately sworn to support Matilda's succession.



Henry's nephew, the new earl of Flanders, having commenced his administration with the rigorous punishment of all who had been concerned in the murder of his predecessor Charles, had excited, by this meritorious act of retributive justice, the odium of the turbulent part of his subjects. Some complained of his haughtiness; others, of his parsimony; and some, of his propensity to voluptuous gratification. Henry fomented the disaffection of the Flemings, and encouraged them to transfer their allegiance to Theodoric landgrave of Alsace, who had some pretension to the earldom. While the earl was making preparations for the invasion of Normandy, he was engaged in hostilities with Stephen, earl of Bologne, the nephew and ally of Henry; an opportunity which seemed favourable to the views of Theodoric, who, entering Flanders in 1128, was soon put in possession of Ghent, Lisle, and other towns, by the traitorous inhabitants. The French king was inclined to assist his friend William in this emergency; but the politic Henry, by marching an army into France, disconcerted the schemes of Louis, and compelled him to observe a neutrality. William, with all the forces he could raise, invested the citadel of Alost, which had revolted to Theodoric. When the fortress was on the point of surrendering, the landgrave advanced to its relief; and a battle took place between his troops and those of the earl of Flanders, in which the former at first gained the advantage; but the extraordinary valour of William soon changed the scene, and routed the enemy. The victor then resuming the siege, found near the gates of the citadel a party of the garrison, who had sallied out during the engagement, and whom he instantly encountered. In this skirmish he received a wound in his hand, by endeavouring to seize a lance which a soldier held out against him. This accident, apparently so trifling, caused his death in a few days, the wound turning to a gangrene. Before he expired he entreated, by letter, his uncle's forgiveness, and conjured him to extend the same elemency to Helie de St. Saen, and his other friends, who had adhered to him.

Henry was now delivered from that anxiety with which his mind had been continually harrassed by the competition of his enterprizing nephew. The removal of his jealous fears gave room for the operations of generosity; and he complied with the final request of that prince, by receiving into his favour all who were desirous of obtaining it. Even the disaffected Norman barons, having lost the prince whom they wished to put in possession of the duchy, submitted to the government of Henry in 1129; and the king of France gave him no further molestation.

This fortunate concurrence of events secured tranquillity to the remainder of Henry's reign; and the national business which principally attracted his attention in that interval of peace, was the continuance of the crown in his family by the succession of his only legitimate child Matilda. The ambition of his old age was solely directed to that point. He brought her with him into England in 1131, and summoned a public assembly at Northampton, where the members renewed their oaths in favour of Matilda, as the immediate heir to the crown. Soon after she returned home to the continent.

Matilda had not yet borne any children either to her former former or her present husband; but in 1133, the sixth year of her second marriage, Henry received intelligence of her being delivered of a son. Impatient to see his grandson, and revisit a daughter for whom he had the strongest affection, he made another voyage to the continent, whence he never afterwards returned. He was gratified the next year, 1134, with the birth of another grandson; and, in the year following, 1135, with a third. The pleasure he received from the society of his daughter induced him to prolong his stay on the continent; and the misunderstanding which arose between him and Geoffrey, who demanded the surrender of Normandy in consequence of a previous agreement, which Henry did not admit in the sense affixed to it by the count, operated as another reason for his residence in Normandy, that he might be on the spot to counteract the intrigues of his son-in-law.

Having taken the diversion of hunting one day near Roüen, he returned in the evening with his blood inflamed by long-continued exercise; and, after feasting immoderately on lampreys, a food of which he was remarkably fond, he was attacked by a fever in the night, which baffled all the efforts of his physicians, and he died, after an illness of six days, at St. Denys le Forment, near his Norman capital, on the first of December, in the sixty-seventh year of his age, and the thirty-sixth of his reign, having survived his injured brother Robert about a year (g). Previous to his death he gave orders for the restoration of all the English and Norman exiles to their country and possessions, remitted all arrears due to him, and enjoined to his son, the earl of Gloucester, the distribution of sixty thousand pounds from his treasure at Falaise among his domestics and stipendiary soldiers. The earl and other nobles having requested him to communicate his last sentiments with regard to a successor, he replied, that he bequeathed all his dominions to his daughter Matilda, and her heirs, in regular progression. In this disposal of his territories he made no mention of her husband the count of Anjou, whom he was incensed against for some insults he had offered him.

Henry the First, is said, by ancient historians, to have excelled all his predecessors both in mental and personal accomplishments. His person was graceful, and his countenance insinuating: his eyes were piercing and serene; and his address was distinguished by that discreet affability which at once tended to encourage the loyal advances of useful confidence, and to repress the forward sallies of disrespectful familiarity. The splendor of his eloquence, and solidity of his judgement, must have ensured him distinction even in a private station of life: nor could his courage and military talents have failed to excite respect. His natural abilities were strong, and had received every improvement which a good education could afford them. Indeed his progress in literature was so great, that it procured him the appellation of Beau-Clerc, or the Fine Scholar. In the cabinet, as in the field, he was cool, cautious, and resolute; and had he been as earnest in the pursuit of virtue as in the gratification of a lawless ambition, he might have just claims to a distinguished place in the annals of history. But his tyrannical conduct to his brother Robert, and his nephew William, evinced a total disregard to every maxim of justice and equity, and shewed that he was always ready to sacrifice the most sacred ties, both of religion and morality, to the promotion of his ambitious projects. Notwithstanding his liberal professions to the English at the commencement of his reign, and his celebrated charter for the security of their rights and liberties, his government was despotic and oppressive: but it is not surprizing that a man, whose bosom was callous to the warmest feelings of nature, should resist the generous dictates of gratitude. Among other instances of his tyranny may be adduced the burthensome taxes that he imposed upon his subjects, and his considerable augmentation of the royal forests, any encroachments on which he punished with the utmost severity. To kill a stag was rendered more criminal than to murder a man; and all dogs that were kept on the borders of his forests were cruelly mutilated.

There is extant a code of laws which passed under this monarch's name; but its authenticity is doubted by our most able antiquaries. It is, however, replete with instruction on the manners and customs of those times. We learn from it that a great distinction was made between the English and Normans, much to the prejudice of the former. Those destructive feuds which were so common among the Saxons, and which the privilege of inflicting private revenge tended greatly to encourage, still prevailed in a certain degree, not being yet formally repressed by any positive law.

Henry, on his accession, granted a charter to the city of London, which appears to have been the first step towards erecting it into a corporation. By this charter the city was empowered to keep the farm of Middlesex at three hundred pounds a year, to elect its own sheriff and justiciary, and to hold pleas of the crown; and it was exempted from the impost of Danegeld, from trials by combat, and from the obligation of lodging the king's retinue. These, with a confirmation of the privileges of their Court of Hustings, Wardmotes, and Common Halls, and the liberty of hunting in the counties of Middlesex and Surrey, form the principal articles of this charter.

A magnificent palace was built in this king's reign at Woodstock, in an extensive park that was enclosed with a stone wall; it is affirmed to have been the first park that was made in England. In the year 1121 a navigable canal was made, by order of the king, between the rivers Trent and Witham, for the benefit of the commerce of Lincoln, which was at that time a rich and populous city.

CHAP. IV.

STEPHEN.

IN the progress and settlement of the feudal law, the male succession to fiefs had taken place some time before the female was admitted; and estates being considered as military benefices, not as property, were transmitted to such only as could serve in the armies, and perform in person the conditions upon which they were originally granted. But when the continuance of rights, during some generations, in the same family, had, in a great measure, obliterated the primitive idea, the females were gradually admitted to the possession of feudal property; and the same revolution of principles which procured them the inheritance of private estates, naturally introduced their succession to government and authority. The failure, therefore, of male heirs to the kingdom of England and duchy of Normandy, seemed to leave the succession open, without a rival, to the empress Matilda; and as Henry had made all his vassals in both states swear fealty to her, he presumed that they would not easily be induced to depart from her hereditary right, and from their own reiterated oaths and engagements. But the irregular manner in which he himself had acquired the crown, might have instructed him, that neither his Norman nor English subjects were as yet capable of adhering to a strict rule of government; and as every precedent of this kind seems to give authority to new usurpations, he had reason to dread, even from his own family, some invasion of his daughter's title, which he had taken such pains to establish.

Adela, daughter of William the First, had been married to Stephen, count of Blois, by whom she had several children; among whom Stephen and Henry, the two youngest, had been invited over to England by the late king, and had received great honours, riches, and preferment. Henry, who had betaken himself to the ecclesiastical profession, he having become a monk in the monastery of Clugni, was first created abbot of Glastonbury and afterwards bishop of Winchester; and though these dignities were considerable, Stephen had, from his uncle's liberality, attained establishments still more solid and durable. The king had married him to Matilda, who was daughter and heiress of Eustace, count of Boulogne, and who brought him, besides that feudal sovereignty in France, an immense property in England, which in the distribution of lands, after the establishment of the Norman government, had been conferred on the family of Boulogne. By this marriage also Stephen acquired a new connexion with the royal family of England; as Mary, his wife's mother, was sister to David the reigning king of Scotland, and to Matilda, the first wife of Henry I. and mother of the empress Matilda, who was afterwards married to, and was at this time the wife of, Geoffrey, the son of Fulk, count of Anjou. The king, still imagining that he strengthened the interests of his family by the aggrandizement of Stephen, took pleasure in enriching him by the grant of new possessions; and he conferred on him the great estate forfeited by Robert Mallet in England, and that forfeited by the earl of Mortagne in Normandy. Stephen, in return, professed great attachment to his uncle; and appeared so zealous for the succession of Matilda, that, when the barons swore fealty to that princess, he contended with Robert, earl of Gloucester, the king's natual son, who should first be admitted to give her this testimony of zeal and fidelity. Meanwhile he endeavoured to cultivate, by every art of popularity, the friendship of the English; and many virtues, with which he seemed to be endowed, favoured the success of his intentions. By his bravery, activity, and vigour, he gained the esteem of the barons: by his generosity, and affable and familiar address, he obtained the affections of the people, particularly of the Londoners. And though he dared not to take any further steps, lest he should expose himself to the suspicions of Henry, he still hoped that, by accumulating riches and power, and by acquiring popularity, he might in time be able to open his way to the possession of the crown.

(g) His bowels were deposited in the conventual church of Notre Dame de Pré, in the suburbs of Roüen; and his corpse, being transported to England, was interred in the abbey of Reading, which he himself had founded and richly endowed. His offspring, except William and Matilda, whom he had by his first queen, were all illegitimate. Of his natural sons, the principal of them were, the earl of Gloucester, born of a Welsh princess; Richard, who was drowned with prince William; Reginald, earl of Cornwall; and Henry, the ancestor of the Herbert family. Of the female fruits of his incontinence, the most considerable were, Elizabeth (or Sibylla) the wife of Alexander the Fierce, king of Scotland; Matilda, countess of Bretagne; and the countesses of Breteuil and Perche. Thirteen illegitimate children are ascribed to him upon good authority; but some writers have increased the number.

Stephen was at Boulogne when he received intelligence of Henry's death, and insensible to all the ties of gratitude and fidelity, and blind to danger, he gave full reins to his ambition, and trusted that the celerity of his enterprize, and the boldness of his attempt, might overcome the weak attachment which the English and Normans bore to the laws and to the rights of their late sovereign. He hastened over to England; and though the citizens of Dover, and those of Canterbury, apprized of his intentions, shut their gates against him, he stopped not till he arrived at London, where some of the lower rank, instigated by his emissaries, as well as moved by his general popularity, immediately proclaimed him king. His next point was to acquire the good-will of the clergy, which was absolutely necessary; and by performing the ceremony of his coronation, to get in possession of the throne, from which he was confident it would not be easy afterwards to expel him. His brother Henry, bishop of Winchester, gained him the friendship of Roger, bishop of Salisbury, chief justiciary and regent of the kingdom, who, though he owed a great fortune and advancement to the favour of the late king, preserved no sense of gratitude to that prince's family; he applied, in conjunction with that prelate, to William Corboil, archbishop of Canterbury, and required him, in virtue of his office, to give the royal unction to Stephen. The primate, who, as all the others, had sworn fealty to Matilda, refused to comply with the requisition; but his opposition was overcome by an expedient equally dishonourable with the other steps by which this revolution was effected. Hugh Bigod, steward of the household, made oath before the primate, that the late king on his death-bed had shewn a dissatisfaction with his daughter Matilda, and had expressed his intention of leaving the count of Boulogne heir to all his dominions. William, either believing, or feigning to believe, Bigod's testimony, anointed Stephen, and put the crown upon his head, on the 22d of December; and from this religious ceremony that prince, without any shadow either of hereditary title or consent of the nobility or people, was allowed to proceed to the exercise of sovereign authority. Very few barons attended his coronation, not one abbot, and of the prelates, only the primate and the bishops of Winchester and Salisbury: but none opposed his usurpation, however unjust or flagrant. The sentiment of religion which, if corrupted into superstition, has often little efficacy in fortifying the duties of civil society, was not affected by the multiplied oaths taken in favour of Matilda, and only rendered the people obedient to a prince who was countenanced by the clergy, and who had received from the primate the rite of royal unction and consecration (h).

Stephen, that he might farther secure his throne, passed a charter, in the beginning of 1136, in a national council at Oxford, wherein he made liberal promises to all orders of men; to the clergy, that he would speedily fill all vacant benefices, and would never levy the rents of any of them during the vacancy; to the nobility, that he would reduce the royal forests to their ancient boundaries, and correct all encroachments; and to the people, that he would remit the tax of Danegeld, and restore the laws of king Edward. The late king had a great treasure at Winchester, amounting to a hundred thousand pounds; besides jewels and plate to an immense value. And Stephen, by obtaining possession of these riches, through the assistance of his brother, immediately turned against Henry's family the precaution which that prince had employed for their grandeur and security: an event which naturally attends the policy of amassing treasures. By means of this money the usurper insured the compliance, though not the attachment, of the principal clergy and nobility; but not trusting to this frail security, he invited over from the continent, particularly from Bretagne and Flanders, great numbers of those bravoes or disorderly soldiers, with whom every country in Europe, by reason of the general ill police and turbulent government, extremely abounded. These mercenary troops guarded his throne by the terrors of the sword; and Stephen, that he might also overawe all malcontents by new and additional terrors of religion, procured a bull from Rome, which ratified his title, and which the pope, seeing this prince in possession of the throne, and pleased with an appeal to his authority in secular controversies, very readily granted him.

Matilda, and her husband Geoffrey, were as unfortunate in Normandy as they had been in England. The Norman nobility, moved by an hereditary animosity against the Anjevins, first applied to Theobald, count of Blois, Stephen's elder brother, for protection and assistance; but hearing afterwards that Stephen had got possession of the English crown, and having many of them the same reasons as formerly for desiring a continuance of their union with that kingdom, they transferred their allegiance to Stephen, and put him in possession of their government. Louis the Younger, the reigning king of France, accepted the homage of Eustace, Stephen's eldest son, for the duchy; and the more to corroborate his connexions with that family, he betrothed his sister Constantia to the young prince. The count of Blois resigned all his pretensions, and received in lieu of them an annual pension of two thousand marks; and Geoffrey himself was obliged to conclude a truce for two years with Stephen, on condition of the king's paying him, during that time, a pension of five thousand. Stephen, who had taken a journey to Normandy, finished all these transactions in person, and soon after returned to England.

David, king of Scotland, and uncle to Matilda, was the first who appeared to support her cause, by entering England with an army in vindication of her rights. He took Carlisle and Newcastle, and over-ran the counties of Cumberland and Northumberland; but, finding that few of the English were ready to join him, he entered into a negociation with Stephen, who had advanced to meet him, at the head of his troops, about the beginning of Lent. An accommodation accordingly took place, by which Stephen consented to cede the county of Northumberland and the city of Carlisle to the Scottish monarch, to be held as a fief of the English crown. He likewise conferred the earldom of Huntingdom on Henry, the eldest son of David, and promised not to dispose of the earldom of Northumberland till he had investigated the pretensions of that prince, who had laid claim to it as the grandson and heir of Waltheof.

Robert, earl of Gloncester, natural son of the late king, was a man of honour and abilities; and as he was firmly attached to the interests of his sister Matilda, and zealous for the lineal succession, it was chiefly from his intrigues and resistance that the king had reason to dread a new revolution of government. This nobleman, who was in Normandy when he received intelligence of Stephen's accession, found himself much embarrassed concerning the measures which he should pursue in that difficult emergency. To swear allegiance to the usurper appeared to him dishonourable, and a breach of his oath to Matilda. To refuse giving this pledge of his fidelity, was to banish himself from England, and be totally incapacitated from serving the royal family, or contributing to their restoration. He offered Stephen to do him homage, and to take the oath of fealty; but with an express condition that the king should maintain all his stipulations, and should never invade any of Robert's rights or dignities: and Stephen, though sensible that this reserve, so unusual in itself, and so unbefitting the duty of a subject, was meant only to afford Robert a pretence for a revolt on the first favourable opportunity, was obliged, by the numerous friends and retainers of that nobleman, to receive him on those terms. The clergy, who could scarcely at this time be deemed subjects to the crown, imitated that dangerous example: they annexed to their oaths of allegiance this condition, that they were only bound so long as the king defended the ecclesiastical liberties, and supported the discipline of the church. The barons, in return for their submission, exacted terms still more destructive of public peace, as well as of royal authority: many of them required the right of fortifying their castles, and of putting themselves in a posture of defence; and the king found himself totally unable to refuse his consent to this exorbitant demand. All England was immediately filled with those fortresses, which the noblemen garrisoned either with their vassals, or with licentious soldiers, who flocked to them from all quarters. Unbounded rapine was exercised upon the people for the maintenance of these troops; and domestic feuds and private animosities, which had with difficulty been restrained by law, now breaking out without control, rendered England a scene of uninterrupted riot and devastation. Wars between the nobles were carried on with the utmost fury in every quarter; the barons even assumed the distinguishing marks of royalty, the right of coining money, and of exercising, without appeal, every act of jurisdiction; and the inferior gentry, as well as the people, finding no defence from the laws during this total dissolution of sovereign authority, were obliged, for their immediate safety, to pay court to some neighbouring chieftain, and to purchase his protection, both by submitting to his exactions, and by assisting him in his rapine upon others. The erection of one castle caused the building of many others; and even those who obtained not the king's permission, thought that they were entitled, by the great principle of self preservation, to put themselves on an equal footing with their neighbours, who commonly were also their enemies and rivals. The aristocratical authority, which is usually so oppressive in the feudal governments, had now risen to its utmost height during the reign of a prince who, though endowed with vigour and abilities, had usurped the throne without the pretence of a title, and who was necessitated to tolerate in others the same violence to which he himself had been indebted for his elevation to the sovereign power.

While England was thus involved in anarchy and confusion, the empress Matilda, and her husband Geoffrey Plantagenet, were endeavouring to enforce their pretensions to the continental dominions; but they experienced the same ill fortune in Normandy as in this kingdom. This was partly owing to the hereditary hatred which had long subsisted between the Normans and the Anjevins, and partly by the desire of the Norman barons to be governed by the same sovereigns as the English, that they might secure the possession of their estates in either country. So soon, therefore, as these noblemen received intelligence of Stephen's accession to the throne of England, they deputed messengers to wait on him with an invitation to repair to Normandy, and assume the sovereignty of that duchy. Stephen having effected an accommodation with the king of Scotland, and received the submission of the earl of Gloucester, thought himself at liberty to comply with their request, and accordingly made a voyage to Normandy about the middle of Lent, in 1137. Soon after his arrival on the continent, he had an interview with Louis king of France, and formed an alliance with that monarch, by betrothing his son Eustace to the princess Constantia, sister to Louis, who granted the investiture of the duchy of Normandy to his future brother-in-law.

After this transaction, Stephen advanced with his forces to attack the count of Anjou, who had entered Normandy; and having made an unsuccessful attempt to take the city of Caen by surprize, had retired to Argantan; but when he had marched as far as Lisieux, a dispute occurred between two of his principal officers, William D'Ypres, earl of Kent, and Renaud de St. Valerie, on the subject of precedence; which being espoused with equal warmth by the adherents of each of them, brought on a skirmish, that produced a great effusion of blood on both sides. Whether Stephen on this occasion evinced a partiality to his foreigh troops, in which he placed his chief reliance; or whether his favourite, the earl of Kent, was so much disliked by the Normans, that they resolved not to serve under him, certain it is, that they left the army; nor could the king, who followed and overtook them at Pont Audemer, prevail upon their leaders, Hugh de Gournay, and young William de Warrenne, to return to their duty.

In this perplexing situation, in a country the fidelity of whose inhabitants he had every reason to suspect, Stephen was reduced to the necessity of purchasing a truce for two years from the count of Anjou, by an annuity of five thousand marks, and another of two thousand to his own brother Theobald, count of Blois, who had formed pretensions to the duchy of Normandy, in consequence of an invitation from some of the principal barons previous to their application to the king of England.

Notwithstanding this negociation, the flames of civil war still continued to rage among the Norman barons, and all the efforts of Stephen were inadequate to quell them. While he had been thus engaged on the continent, Robert, earl of Gloucester had been exerting himself in England to excite an insurrection in favour of his sister Matilda; and, having settled his plans, repaired to Normandy. William D'Ypres, who suspected the earl of Gloucester's intentions, communicated his thoughts to the king, and advised him to seize his person: but, before the scheme could be effected, that nobleman received intelligence of their designs; and by his conduct gave Stephen to understand that he was no stranger to his intention. Apprehensive of the fatal effects of a rupture with that nobleman, whose power and popularity were so firmly established, he made overtures to Robert for an accommodation; and, after much difficulty, obtained a personal interview, in which he apologized for his past conduct, and swore, in the presence of the archbishop of Roüen, that he would never again form any design against the person or liberty of the earl. Robert accepted his excuses, and was apparently reconciled; but he was too well acquainted with the disposition of Stephen to repose the smallest degree of confidence in his oaths.

Stephen's presence was now required in England, where the most dreadful anarchy was universally prevalent. The foreign mercenaries, who formed the chief support of his authority, having exhausted the royal treasure, subsisted wholly by depredations on the unfortunate natives. Extortion and cruelty were every where practised; and those whose power and influence might have rendered their efforts effectual, were seen to promote those disorders which it was their duty to repress. Stephen therefore found it expedient to return, though he had not yet been able to check the turbulency of the Norman barons, which disturbed the repose of his continental dominions.

On his arrival in England, he found that David, king of Scotland had made incursions into the county of Northumberland, to the earldom of which his son, prince Henry, had renewed his pretensions; but, at the instigation of Thurstan, archbishop of York, he had consented to delay the prosecutions of his claims till the return of Stephen. The demand of the prince was now formally enforced by ambassadors deputed for that purpose; but the king peremptorily refusing to comply with it, David again entered Northumberland, at the beginning of 1138; when his troops committed the most destructive ravages, reducing whole towns to ashes, and putting the defenceless inhabitants to the sword, without discrimination of age or sex (i). Stephen immediately advanced at the head of a powerful army, to check the progress of the Scottish king; who, on his approach, retired to the castle of Roxburgh, whither the English pursued him. But while the two armies were posted opposite to each other, the king discovered such symptoms of disaffection among his own troops, that he deemed it dangerous to risk an action, and therefore returned to the south, where his affairs had taken an unfavourable turn.

Robert, earl of Gloucester, who had only taken the oath of fealty to Stephen that he might be enabled the more effectually to promote the interests of his sister, having now completed the plan of an insurrection, determined to throw off the mask. To give an appearance of candour to his proceedings, he consulted the pope on the validity of his oath, and received an answer agreeable to his wishes

(i) These abominable acts of cruelty are attributed by the Scottish historians to the men of Galloway; whom they represent as a ferocious and undisciplined band, that no endeavours of their sovereign could possibly restrain within the smallest degree of subordination.

and expectations; which informed him that he was wholly absolved from it, as a compliance with the obligations it imposed would involve him in perjury, by compelling him to violate that which he had formerly taken to the empress; and which, from priority, as well as the justice of its motives, claimed an indisputable preference. Fortified with this answer, he sent to Stephen from Normandy, to bid him open defiance, formally to renounce the allegiance he had conditionally sworn to preserve, and to upbraid him with the breach of those terms which had been annexed to his oath of fealty. This was the stipulated signal to the English barons, whom he had prevailed on to join him in his attempts to raise the empress to the throne; and numbers of them immediately retired to their castles, and prepared for the execution of this important design.

This formidable conspiracy, however, only tended to augment the courage and activity of Stephen, and to urge him to more powerful exertions. He attacked the fortresses of his rebellious nobles, took many of them, and either punished their lords, or compelled them to return to their obedience. But while he was employed in the south, David, king of Scotland, appeared at the head of an army in defence of his niece's title, and, penetrating into Yorkshire, committed the most barbarous devastations on that country. The fury of his massacres and ravages enraged the northern nobility, who might otherwise have been inclined to join him; and William earl of Albemarle, Robert de Ferrers, William Percy, Robert de Bruce, Roger Moubray, Hubert Lacey, Walter l'Espée, Bernard de Baliol, and Walter de Grant, powerful barons in those parts, assembled an army, with which they encamped at North-Allerton, and awaited the arrival of the enemy. A great battle was here fought, on the 22nd of August, called the battle of the Standard, from a high crucifix, erected by the English on a waggon, and carried along with the army as a military ensign. The king of Scots was defeated, and he himself, as well as his son Henry, narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the English. David retired to Carlisle, where he was soon joined by his son Henry. Having there collected their scattered troops, they laid siege to the castle of Werk, which they reduced by famine. This success overawed the malcontents in England, and might have given some stability to Stephen's throne, had he not been so elated with prosperity as to engage in a controversy with the clergy, who were at that time an overmatch for any monarch.

Though the great power of the church in ancient times weakened the authority of the crown, and interrupted the course of the laws, it may be doubted whether, in ages of such violence and outrage, it was not rather advantageous that some limits were set to the power of the sword, both in the hands of the prince and nobles, and that men were taught to pay regard to some principles and privileges. The chief misfortune was, that the prelates on some occasions acted entirely as barons, employed military power against their sovereign or their neighbours, and thereby often increased those disorders which it was their duty to repress. Roger, bishop of Salisbury, in imitation of the nobility, had built two strong castles, one at Sherborne, another at the Devizes, and had laid the foundations of a third at Malmesbury. His two nephews, Nigell, bishop of Ely, and Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, had followed the example of their uncle; and Stephen, who was now sensible from experience of the mischiefs attending these multiplied citadels, resolved to begin with destroying those of the clergy, who by their function seemed less entitled than the barons to such military securities. Making pretence of a fray which had arisen in court between the retinue of the bishop of Salisbury and that of Alain, earl of Bretagne, he seized both that prelate and the bishop of Lincoln, threw them into prison, and obliged them by menaces to deliver up those places of strength in 1139, which they had lately erected.

Henry, bishop of Winchester, the king's brother, being armed with a legantine commission, now conceived himself to be an ecclesiastical sovereign no less powerful than the civil; and forgetting the ties of blood which connected him with the king, he resolved to vindicate the clerical privileges, which he pretended were here openly violated. He assembled a synod at Westminster on the 30th of August, and there complained of the impiety of Stephen's measures, who had employed violence against the dignitaries of the church, and had not awaited the sentence of a spiritual court, by which alone, he affirmed, they could lawfully be tried and condemned, if their conduct had in any wise merited censure or punishment. The synod ventured to send a summons to the king, charging him to appear before them, and to justify his measures; and Stephen, instead of resenting this indignity, sent Aubrey de Vere to plead his cause before that assembly. De Vere accused the two prelates of treason and sedition; but the synod refused to try the cause, or examine their conduct, till those castles, of which they had been dispossessed, were previously restored to them. The bishop of Salisbury declared that he would appeal to the pope; and had not Stephen and his partizans employed menaces, and even shown a disposition of executing violence by the hands of the soldiery, affairs had instantly come to extremity between the crown and the mitre.

While this quarrel, joined to so many other grievances, increased the discontents among the people, the empress, invited by the opportunity, and secretly encouraged by the legate himself, landed in England, with Robert, earl of Gloucester, on the 30th of September, and a retinue of a hundred and forty knights. She fixed her residence at Arundel castle, whose gates were opened to her by Adelina, the queen-dowager, now married to William de Albini, earl of Sussex; and she excited by messengers her partizans to take arms in every county of England. Adelina, who had expected that her daughter-in-law would have invaded the kingdom with a much greater force, became apprehensive of danger; suspecting that she had not the smallest design of encouraging an insurrection; that she had only granted her daughter-in-law admission into her castle, from a just respect to the memory of her deceased father; and declaring, that if he would grant her a safe passport to some other part of the kingdom, she would prevail on her to quit it without delay; and Matilda, to ease her of her fears, removed first to Bristol, which belonged to her brother Robert, thence to Gloucester, where she remained under the protection of Milo, a gallant nobleman in those parts, who had embraced her cause (k). Soon after Geoffrey Talbot, William Mohun, Ralph Lovel, William Fitz-John, William Fitz-Alan, Paganell, and many other barons, declared for her; and her party, which was generally favoured in the kingdom, seemed every day to gain ground upon that of her antagonist.

Were we to relate all the military events transmitted to us by contemporary and authentic historians, it would be easy to swell our accounts of this reign into a large volume: but those incidents, so little memorable in themselves, and so confused both in time and place, could afford neither instruction nor entertainment to the reader.

(k) It is not less difficult to account for the king's motives in thus suffering Matilda to escape, when he must have been anxious to obtain possession of her person, than for those which could induce the empress to repose so important a confidence in a man who had been guilty of such repeated violations of the most solemn oaths. This singular event, the veracity of which cannot admit of a doubt, has never been satisfactorily accounted for. Contemporary historians simply relate the fact, unaccompanied by any kind of elucidation; while modern writers have either neglected to notice it, or have ascribed it to principles which could have but a partial effect. Dr. Henry indeed, whose profound erudition merits the most ample tribute of commendation, imputes it to that spirit of gallantry, and strict regard to the point of honour, which prevailed at that period. This might, perhaps, have engaged Stephen to keep his word in this case, but could certainly not have induced him to plight it; for, under such circumstances, he never could have betrayed, at a subsequent period, an anxiety to seize the person of Matilda: nor can we believe that the princess would have trusted to his observance of a promise, who had trifled with the solemnity of an oath. We must therefore reject the opinion of Dr. Henry, and endeavour to account for this extraordinary transaction in a manner which to us appears more consistent with reason and probability. The castle of Arundel was a fortress of considerable strength, and deemed almost impregnable; consequently the only mode of reducing it must have been by cutting off all supplies of provision, which would inevitably have required a great length of time to execute. Stephen, aware of this circumstance, and apprehending that, while he was employed in the siege, his enemies might be making a dangerous progress under the conduct of the earl of Gloucester, whose vigour and activity experience had taught him to dread, might justly deem it an act of policy to permit the empress to join her brother, as his enemies would then be concentrated in one point, against which he would be enabled to direct his whole force. As to Matilda, it is highly probable that she was compelled by her step-mother to depart from the castle: for, as the queen-dowager, by sending to Stephen to offer apologies for her conduct, had evinced a fear of his resentment, and knew no other means of averting it, and at the same hour and time of demonstrating the sincerity of her professions, than by getting rid of her royal guest, it is not to be supposed, when so favourable an opportunity offered to provide for her own personal safety, without violating the rights of hospitality, that she would suffer it to escape.

It suffices to say, that the war was spread into every quarter; and that those turbulent barons, who had already shaken off, in a great measure, the restraint of government, having now obtained the pretence of a public cause, carried on their devastations with redoubled fury, exercised implacable vengeance on each other, and set no bounds to their oppressions over the people. The castles of the nobility were become receptacles of licensed robbers; who, sallying forth day and night, committed spoil on the open country, on the villages, and even on the cities; put the captives to torture, in order to make them reveal their treasures; sold their persons to slavery; and set fire to their houses, after they had pillaged them of every thing valuable. The fierceness of their disposition, leading them to commit wanton destruction, frustrated their rapacity of its purpose; and the poverty and persons even of the ecclesiastics, generally so much revered, were at last, from necessity, exposed to the same outrage which had laid waste the rest of the kingdom. The land was left untilled; the instruments of husbandry were destroyed or abandoned; and a grievous famine, the natural result of those disorders, affected equally both parties, and reduced the spoilers, as well as the defenceless people, to the most extreme want and indigence.

After several fruitless negociations and treaties of peace, which never interrupted these destructive hostilities, there happened at last an event, which seemed to promise some end of the public calamities. Ralph, earl of Chester, and his half brother William de Roumara, partizans of Matilda, had surprized the castle of Lincoln; but the citizens, who were better affected to Stephen, having invited him to their aid, that prince laid close siege to the castle, in hopes of soon rendering himself master of the place, either by assault or by famine. The earl of Gloucester hastened with an army to the relief of his friends; and Stephen, informed of his approach, took the field with a resolution of giving him battle. After a violent shock, the two wings of the royalists were put to flight; and Stephen himself, surrounded by the enemy, was at last, after exerting great efforts of valour, borne down by numbers, and taken prisoner (l). He was conducted to Gloucester; and though at first treated with humanity, was soon after, on some suspicion, thrown into prison, and loaded with irons. This took place on the 2d of February, 1141.

Stephen's party was entirely broken by the captivity of their leader, and the barons came in daily from all quarters, and did homage to Matilda. The princess, however, amidst all her prosperity, knew that she was not secure of success, unless she could gain the confidence of the clergy; and as the conduct of the legate had been of late very ambiguous, and showed his intentions to have rather aimed at humbling his brother, than totally ruining him, she employed every endeavour to fix him in her interests. She held a conference with him on the 2d of March, in an open plain near Winchester, where she promised upon oath, that if he would acknowledge her for sovereign, would recognise her title as the sole descendant of the late king, and would again submit to the allegiance which he, as well as the rest of the kingdom, had sworn to her, he should in return be entire master of the administration, and in particular should, at his pleasure, dispose of all vacant bishoprics and abbies. Earl Robert, her brother, Brian Fitz-Count, Milo of Gloucester, and other great men, became guarantees for her observing these engagements, and the prelate was at last induced to promise her allegiance, but that still burdened with the express condition, that she should on her part fulfil her promises. He then conducted her to Winchester, led her in procession to the cathedral, and with great solemnity, in the presence of many bishops and abbots, denounced curses against all those who cursed her, poured out blessings on those who blessed her, granted absolution to such as were obedient to her, and excommunicated such as were rebellious. Theobald archbishop of Canterbury soon after came also to court, and swore allegiance to the empress; after which she proceeded to Oxford, where she celebrated the festival of Easter with great pomp and magnificence.

Matilda, that she might farther ensure the attachment of the clergy, was willing to receive the crown from their hands; and instead of assembling the states of the kingdom, the measure which the constitution, had it been either fixed or regarded, seemed necessarily to require, she was content, that the legate should summon an ecclesiastical synod, and that her title to the throne should there be acknowledged. In consequence of this convention, a great council of the clergy met at Winchester on the 7th of April; when the legate, addressing himself to the assembly, told them, that "in the absence of the empress, Stephen, his brother, had been permitted to reign, and, previously to his ascending the throne, had seduced them by many fair promises of honouring and exalting the church, of maintaining the laws, and of reforming all abuses: that it grieved him to observe how much that prince had in every particular been wanting to his engagements; public peace was interrupted, crimes were daily committed with impunity, bishops were thrown into prison and forced to surrender their possessions, abbies were put to sale, churches were pillaged, and the most enormous disorders prevailed in the administration: that he himself, in order to procure a redress of these grievances, had formerly summoned the king before a council of bishops; but instead of inducing him to amend his conduct, had rather offended him by that expedient: that, how much soever misguided, that prince was still his brother, and the object of his affections; but his interests, however, must be regarded as subordinate to those of their heavenly father, who had now rejected him, and thrown him into the hands of his enemies: that it principally belonged to the clergy to elect and ordain kings; he had summoned them together for that purpose; and having invoked the divine assistance, he now pronounced Matilda the only descendant of Henry, their late sovereign, queen of England. In the name of this council, said he, I do promise her loyalty and support." The whole assembly, by their acclamations or silence, gave, or seemed to give, their assent to this declaration (m).

The only laymen summoned to this council, which decided the fate of the crown, were the Londoners; and even these were required not to give their opinion, but to submit to the decrees of the synod. The deputies of London, however, were not so passive: they insisted that their king should be delivered from prison; but were told by the legate, that it became not the Londoners, who were regarded as noblemen in England, to take part with those barons, who had basely forsaken their lord in battle, and who had treated holy church with contumely. It is with reason that the citizens of London assumed so much authority, if it be true, what is related by Fitz-Stephen, a contemporary author, that that city could at this time bring into the field no less than eighty thousand combatants (n).

London, notwithstanding its great power, and attachment to Stephen, was at length obliged to submit to Matilda; and her authority, by the prudent conduct of earl Robert, seemed to be established over the whole kingdom: but affairs remained not long in this situation. That princess, besides the disadvantages of her sex, which weakened her influence over a turbulent and martial people, was of a passionate, imperious spirit, and knew not how to temper with affability the harshness of a re(l) In this action the king fought with the most desperate courage till his battle axe was totally broken; when, drawing his sword, he long defended himself against a host of foes, inveighing against the dastardly conduct of his faithless troops. In this unequal contest, his sword being shivered in pieces, he had recourse to his truncheon, which he continued to employ till a blow from a stone brought him to the ground. Still his ardour was unabated, and he was preparing to rise for the purpose of renewing the combat, when William de Kaines, a knight of the opposite party, seized him by the helmet, presented his sword to his throat, and menaced him with instant death, if he refused to surrender. Notwithstanding the dangerous extremity to which he was reduced, he resolutely declared that he would yield to no other than the earl of Gloucester, who being at hand, advanced and took him prisoner, together with four noblemen, who had valiantly fought by the side of their monarch.

(m) W. Malmesbury, p. 188. This author, a judicious man, was present, and says, that he was very attentive to what passed. This speech, therefore, may be regarded as entirely genuine.

(n) Were this account to be depended on, London must at that time have contained near four hundred thousand inhabitants, which is above double the number it contained at the death of queen Elizabeth. But these loose calculations, or rather guesses, deserve very little credit. Peter of Blois, a contemporary writer, and a man of sense, says there were then only forty thousand inhabitants in London, which is much more likely. See Epist. 151. What Fitz-Stephen says of the prodigious riches, splendour, and commerce of London, proves only the great poverty of the other towns of the kingdom, and indeed of all the northern parts of Europe.

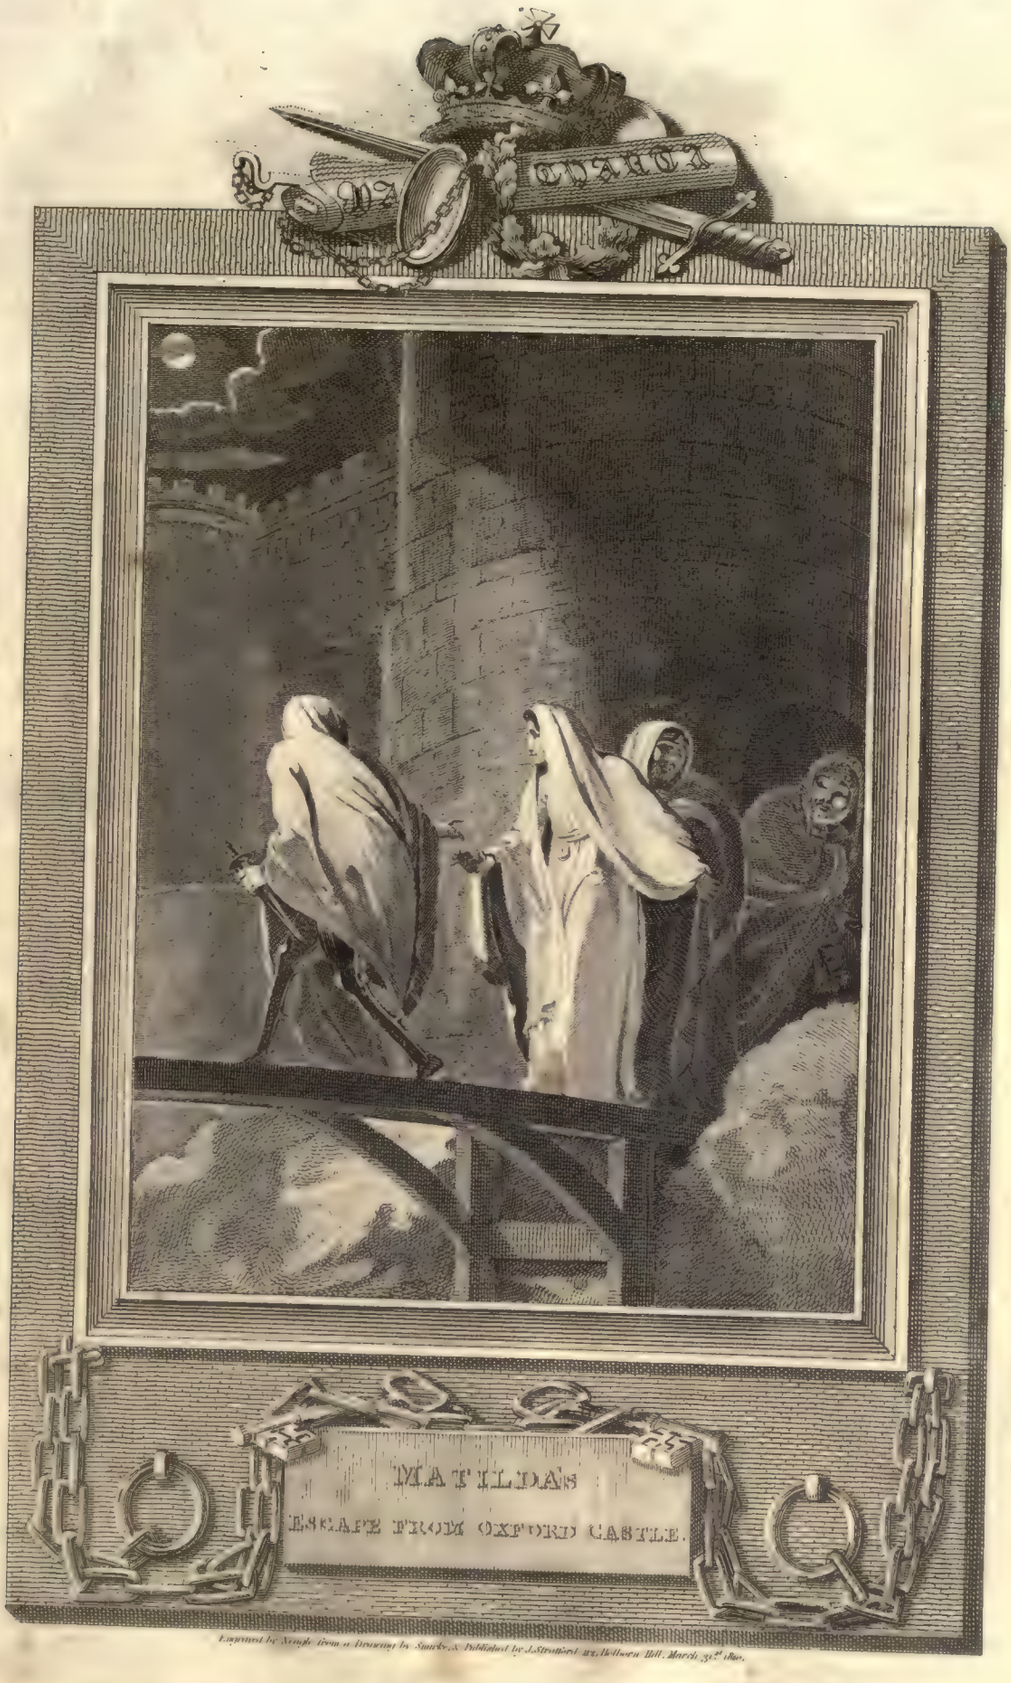
fusal. Stephen's queen, seconded by many of the nobility, petitioned for the liberty of her husband; and offered, that, on this condition, he should renounce the crown, and retire into a convent. The legate desired that prince Eustace, his nephew, might inherit Boulogne and the other patrimonial estates of his father. The Londoners applied for the establishment of king Edward's laws, instead of those of king Henry, which, they said, were grievous and oppressive. All these petitions were rejected in the most haughty and peremptory manner.

The legate, who had probably never been sincere in his compliance with Matilda's government, availed himself of the ill humour excited by this imperious conduct, and secretly instigated the Londoners to a revolt. A conspiracy was entered into to seize the person of the empress; and she saved herself from the danger by a precipitate retreat. She fled to Oxford: soon after she went to Winchester: whither the legate, desirous to save appearances, and watching the opportunity to ruin her cause, had retired. But having assembled all his retainers, he openly joined his force to that of the Londoners, and to Stephen's mercenary troops, who had not yet evacuated the kingdom; and he besieged Matilda in Winchester, which he invested on the first of August (o). The princess, being hard pressed by famine, made her escape to the Devizes; but in the flight, earl Robert, her brother, fell into the hands of the enemy. This nobleman, though a subject, was as much the life and soul of his own party, as Stephen was of the other; and the empress, sensible of his merit and importance, consented to exchange the prisoners on equal terms. This was accomplished on the first of November; and the civil war was again kindled with greater fury than ever.

The legate, who had been the chief instrument of his brother's deliverance, convened an ecclesiastical synod at Westminster, on the 7th of December, in which he appeared in a character diametrically opposite to that which he had assumed at the council of Winchester but a few months before. After the king had opened the council by a speech, in which he complained of the infidelity of his subjects, who, not content with waging war against him in direct violation of their oaths of allegiance, had quietly resigned him to all the horrors of a tedious imprisonment; the bishop of Winchester, in an harangue, more distinguished for rhetorical eloquence than for depth of reasoning or solidity of argument, attempted to apologize for the flagrant inconsistency of his own misconduct, and the frequent breach of his oaths, which he imputed, with greater impudence than address, to the necessity of the times. As a farther justification of himself, he affirmed that Matilda had not only broken all the stipulations she had made him previous to her election, but had likewise formed designs against his life and dignity. He concluded his speech by pronouncing a sentence of excommunication against all the adherents of the countess of Anjou, the only title he now would consent to bestow on the empress, though he had so lately acknowledged her queen of England.

Whatever disgust the ecclesiastical members of this assembly might conceive at the arrogance and inconsistency of the legate, there was not one of them endued with sufficient firmness of mind to express his sentiments on the subject. A lay deputy, who attended the council by order of Matilda, was the only person present who conducted himself with the resolution to do it: he boldly taxed the bishop, in the name of his royal mistress, with perjury and rebellion; affirmed, that the voyage of Matilda to England had been made in consequence of his frequent and earnest solicitations; that her subsequent conduct had been wholly guided by his direction; and that even the detention of Stephen in prison was in compliance with his advice. To these direct and positive charges the bishop very prudently forebore to reply. The name of this person historians have unfortunately neglected to mention; though a man, possessed of such uncommon fortitude and honesty as, in the presence of a sovereign surrounded by his adherents, to assert the supremacy of his rival and boldly accuse his principal supporter, is indisputably deserving of the highest praise an author can bestow, and should be transmitted to posterity as an object of imitation to every member of a national assembly, where the voice of reason is sometimes liable to be suppressed by the dictates of interest, or overawed by the prevalence of faction.

The earl of Gloucester, finding the successes on both sides nearly balanced, went over to Normandy, in 1142, which, during Stephen's captivity, had submitted to Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, and husband to Matilda; and he persuaded Geoffrey to allow his eldest son Henry, a promising young prince, to take a journey to England, and appear at the head of his partizans. The expedient, however, produced nothing decisive.



About this period, Henry de Tracey, a nobleman who had hitherto supported the interests of Stephen in Devonshire, despairing to see his authority firmly established, resolved to provide for his own safety by submitting to the empress, who had now obtained possession of all that tract of country which composed the ancient kingdom of Wessex, except the county of Hants; while her competitor enjoyed but a precarious and unsettled influence in other provinces, except in the city of London, the inhabitants of which adhered to his cause with firmness and unanimity.

A part of Wales, with the counties on the borders of the Severn, had declared for Matilda: the bishopric of Durham, and the three Norman provinces possessed by David, king of Scotland, had likewise acknowledged her sovereignty. The power of William, earl of Yorkshire, who adhered to Stephen, was counterbalanced by that of Alain, earl of Richmond, who embraced the opposite party: while Ralph, earl of Chester, Hugh Bigod, earl of Norfolk, and many other noblemen who resided in the ancient kingdom of East-Anglia, maintained a kind of independent sovereignty within their respective districts, though they were contented to recognize Stephen for their monarch. The seat of war was therefore chiefly confined to Berkshire and the parts immediately contiguous; but as Stephen was unable to assemble a formidable army, the contest was merely supported by sieges and blockades of castles, or slight skirmishes between detached parties. This irregular kind of war was continued during the three succeeding years, to the total destruction of industry, and the ruin and depopulation of the country.

Stephen took Oxford after a long siege in 1143; he was defeated by earl Robert, of Wilton: and the empress, though of a masculine spirit, yet being harassed with a variety of good and bad fortune, and alarmed with continual dangers to her person and family, at last retired into Normandy, whither she had sent her son in the summer of 1147. The death of her brother, which happened at his castle of Bristol, on the 31st of October, would have proved fatal to her interests, had not some incidents occurred, which checked the course of Stephen's prosperity. This prince, finding that the castles built by the noblemen of his own party, encouraged the spirit of independence, and were little less dangerous than those which remained in the hands of the enemy, endeavoured to extort from them a surrender of those fortresses; and he alienated the affections of many of them by this equitable demand. The artillery also of the church, which his brother had brought over to his side, had, after some interval, joined the other party. Eugenius III. had mounted the papal throne; the bishop of Winchester was deprived of the legantine commission, which was conferred on Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, the enemy and rival of the former legate. The pontiff also, having summoned a general council at Rheims, in Champagne, instead of allowing the church of England, as had been usual, to elect its own deputies, nominated five English bishops to represent that church, and required their attendance in the council. Stephen, who, notwithstanding his present difficulties, was jealous of the rights of his crown, refused them permission to attend; and the pope, sensible of his advantage in contending with a prince who reigned by a disputed title, took revenge by laying all Stephen's party under an interdict. The discontents of the royalists, at being thrown into this situation, were augmented by a comparison with Matilda's party, who (o) As the inhabitants of that city had evinced an imprudent zeal in promoting the cause of Matilda, the bishop set fire to it, although it was the capital of his diocese: nor could the flames of it be extinguished, till, according to William of Malmesbury, twenty churches, and the greatest part of the town, were reduced to ashes. A celebrated monastery, called The Hide, that was situated in the suburbs, shared the same fate; from which, however, the bishop was careful to preserve, for his own use, a massy golden cup, richly studded with precious stones, that had been presented to that convent by king Canute; together with three royal diadems, with stands of the purest Arabian gold, embellished with jewels, and enriched with the most curious devices.

enjoyed all the benefits of the sacred ordinances; and Stephen was at last obliged, by making proper submissions to the see of Rome, to remove the reproach from his party.

The weakness of both sides, at the beginning of the year 1148, rather than any decrease of mutual animosity, having produced a tacit cessation of arms in England, many of the nobility, Roger de Moubray, William de Warrenne, and others, finding no opportunity to exert their military ardour at home, inlisted themselves in a new crusade, which with surprising success, after former disappointments and misfortunes, was now preached by St. Bernard. But an event soon after happened which threatened a revival of hostilities in England. Prince Henry, who had reached his sixteenth year, was desirous of receiving the honour of knighthood; a ceremony which every gentleman in that age passed through before he was admitted to the use of arms, and which was even deemed requisite for the greatest princes. He intended to receive his admission from his great uncle, David, king of Scotland; and for that purpose he passed through England with a great retinue, and was attended by the most considerable of his partizans. This ceremony was performed at Carlisle, May 22, 1149, with great pomp and magnificence, in the midst of a prodigious concourse of the nobility of England, Scotland, and Normandy. He remained some time with the king of Scotland; made incursions into England; and by his dexterity and vigour in all manly exercises, by his valour in war, and his prudent conduct in every occurrence, he roused the hopes of his party, and gave symptoms of those great qualities which he afterwards displayed when he mounted the throne of England. Soon after his return to Normandy, in January, 1150, he was, by Matilda's consent, invested in that duchy; and upon the death of his father Geoffrey, which happened in the subsequent year, he took possession of Anjou, Touraine, and Maine, and concluded a marriage, which brought him a great accession of power, and rendered him extremely formidable to his rival. Eleanor, the daughter and heir of William, duke of Guienne, the earl of Poictou, had been married sixteen years to Louis VII. king of France, and had attended him in a crusade, which that monarch conducted against the infidels: but having there lost the affections of her husband, and even fallen under some suspicion of gallantry with a handsome Saracen, Louis, more delicate than politic, procured a divorce from her, and restored her those rich provinces, which by her marriage she had annexed to the crown of France. Young Henry, neither discouraged by the inequality of years, nor by the reports of Eleanor's gallantries, made successful courtship to that princess, and, espousing her six weeks after her divorce, in 1152, got possession of all her dominions as her dowry. The lustre which he received from this acquisition, and the prospect of his rising fortune, had such an effect in England, that when Stephen, desirous to ensure the crown to his son Eustace, required the archbishop of Canterbury to anoint that prince as his successor, the primate refused compliance, and made his escape beyond sea, to avoid the violence and resentment of Stephen.

Henry, informed of these dispositions in the people, made an invasion on England: having gained some advantage over Stephen at Malmesbury, and having taken that place, he proceeded thence to throw succours into Wallingford, which the king had advanced with a superior army to besiege. A decisive action was every day expected; when the great men of both sides, terrified at the prospect of farther bloodshed and confusion, interposed with their good offices, and set on foot a negociation between the rival princes. The death of Eustace, during the course of the treaty, facilitated its conclusion: an accommodation was settled, by which it was agreed, that Stephen should possess the crown during his lifetime, that justice should be administered in his name, even in the provinces which had submitted to Henry, and that this latter prince should, on Stephen's demise, succeed to the kingdom, and William, Stephen's son, to Boulogne and his patrimonial estate. After all the barons had sworn to the observance of this treaty, and done homage to Henry, as to the heir of the crown, that prince evacuated the kingdom; and the death of Stephen, which happened on the 25th of October, 1154 (p), after a short illness, prevented all those quarrels and jealousies, which were likely to have ensued in so delicate a situation.

During the reign of Stephen this country suffered great miseries. His personal and mental qualities were such as must inevitably have secured him universal esteem, had they been employed in a different pursuit. His mind was distinguished by candour and liberality; and, though possessed of that intrepid courage which borders on ferocity, he was affable, and condescending. His talents were neither brilliant nor despicable; his judgement rather superficial than profound. He discharged all the domestic duties of life with a scrupulousness that demonstrated great goodness of heart: as a husband, he was kind and affectionate; as a parent, tender and indulgent; as a friend, sincere and liberal, even to profusion. With these virtues, had Stephen succeeded to the crown by a lawful title, there can be little doubt that his government would have been productive of happiness to his subjects, and of prosperity to the nation: but his usurpation of the throne, to the exclusion of the legitimate heir, impelled him to the commission of many acts of violence, which reflect disgrace on his memory. Authority obtained by injustice is commonly preserved by oppression. On his accession, he had been induced to grant a charter of privileges, which his necessities soon urged him to infringe. After this violation of a solemn oath, (a thing too much practised in those days, under the idea of policy or necessity) it is not surprizing that he should have been guilty of many subsequent breaches of gratitude. Yet, notwithstanding his precarious situation, he never indulged himself in the exercise of cruelty or revenge; and during the short calm which he enjoyed after the treaty with Henry, he made a progress through his dominions; published an edict to restrain all rapine and violence; and disbanded the foreign mercenaries, who had so long preyed upon his subjects. As those vices which ambition engendered were severely punished by the miseries which he experienced, in common with his people, during the greater part of his reign, though we have not much to say in favour of the monarch, we cannot but commiserate the man.

The religious sentiments of Stephen did not form a conspicuous part of his character, though we do not find that he was guilty of any flagrant impiety, if we except the breach of his oaths, which was practised by both parties, as interest or fear preponderated. Of bigotry he had no traces: the reveries of the monks, and the omens of superstition, excited only his contempt.

CHAP. V.

History of the ENGLISH CHURCH from the Norman Conquest to the Death of Stephen, i. e. from 1066 to 1154.

TOWARDS the close of the Anglo-Saxon government, the church was in a flourishing state. The superstition of many of the kings who reigned prior to the Conquest, had gradually augmented the possessions of the clergy, and multiplied the monastic foundations. The same devotion to the ecclesiastical order which prompted the different sovereigns to increase the endowments of the church, impelled them also to grant such privileges and immunities as raised their spiritual subjects greatly above the temporal inhabitants of the kingdom.

In this state of elevation, opulence, and power, William the First found the English clergy on his acquisition of the crown, in 1066. Though this prince assumed the appearance of religion, expressed an apparent regard for the clerical establishment, and treated the individuals belonging to it with politeness of demeanour, he soon formed the intention of rendering them more subservient to the crown than they had before been, and of obliging them to contribute their full share towards defraying the expences of government, as they certainly ought to have done. He subjected all the lands of the church to the same tenures of barony and knights' service, to which he had reduced the possessions of the laity; an innovation at which the ecclesiastics murmured in vain.

In 1070 the Conqueror introduced baronial tenures among the clergy; the same year was distinguished by the deposition of Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, and other English prelates as well as abbots, chiefly on account of their being natives; and the king's precedent for introducing the papal jurisdiction into the œconomy of the English church, to which, however, he was not influenced by motives of implicit obedience to the holy see, see, but by a desire of sheltering his violent deprivation of the English dignitaries under the cloak of the pope's authority. At his requisition, and in his presence, a legatine council assembled at Winchester, in which Eremfrid, bishop of Sion, and two cardinals, named John and Peter, presided, as representatives of pope Alexander II. over the hierarchy of England. In this synod, archbishop Stigand, Agelmar, bishop of Elmham, and several abbots, were formally deposed, on the pretence of their holding a plurality of preferments, of uncanonical election, or of some other delinquency, either frivolous in itself or falsely alleged. In another council convoked by Eremfrid, such further deprivations were made as were agreeable to the wishes of the king, who immediately filled the vacancies with foreign ecclesiastics.

The person whom he selected for the archbishopric of Canterbury, was Lanfranc, a native of Lombardy, who had long resided in the Norman duchy, and had been translated by William from the government of the abbey of Bec to that of Caen, founded by William himself. His great esteem for Lanfranc induced him, on the removal of Stigand, to invite the learned abbot from Normandy, that he might be elevated to the rank of primate of England. He readily accepted the invitation; and, on his arrival in this kingdom, was consecrated by eight suffragans of the see which he came to occupy. He gave an early instance of his desire of maintaining the supremacy of his see; for, when Thomas de Baieux, who had been promoted on the death of Aldred, to the archbishopric of York, applied to the new primate for consecration, he refused to gratify the solicitor, unless he would deliver a written declaration of canonical obedience to the present archbishop of Canterbury and his successors, confirmed by an oath. As Thomas was unwilling to make this submission, Lanfranc withheld from him the ceremony of consecration. This dispute being communicated to the king, he ordered that Thomas should promise, in writing, an absolute obedience to Lanfranc in all points relative to the exercise of Christianity, but not to his successors, unless, in a full investigation of the affair in council, it should be determined against him. Having complied with the royal mandate, he was consecrated by Lanfranc without delay. But the contest for clerical superiority did not rest here. Two years afterwards, in 1072, an assembly of the clergy met at Windsor, for the decision of this point. After a long debate, it was determined, that, though Gregory had ordained that the metropolitan rank of the see of Canterbury should continue only during the life of St. Augustine, and had commanded the erection of archiepiscopal sees at London and York, the precedency of which was to be regulated by the priority of consecration, this decree had been virtually abrogated by the prescriptive practice of all the successors of Augustine, who had constantly acted as primates of all England, extending their authority over the archbishops of York, without regard to priority of appointment. It was also proved, that the superiority of the archbishop of Canterbury over all the churches of Britain had been acknowledged by several of the pontiffs who had succeeded Gregory. It was decreed by the council, that the Humber should form the boundary between the provinces of Canterbury and York; that the occupant of the latter see should attend with his suffragans at any council to which he might be summoned by the archbishop of Canterbury, whom he was bound to serve in Christian obedience; and that he should give a written acknowledgement of the supremacy of the see of Canterbury, to which he should even swear, if the primate should require such a function. This determination was highly agreeable to Lanfranc, who now received a paper from the archbishop of York, professing a complete obedience in spiritual affairs to him and his successors.

Lanfranc held many councils during his archiepiscopate; but, as it would be superfluous to enumerate all the canons enacted under his auspices, (or rather under those of the Conqueror, who would not suffer a single measure to be proposed in convocation, unless it had been stamped with his prior assent), we shall content ourselves with mentioning the most curious and important ones.

It is probable that the clergy still found a difficulty in procuring tithes; for, it was deemed expedient, in one of Lanfranc's synods, to pass a specific canon, enjoining the payment of these dues. In another, it was enacted, that every person who had killed one or more men in the battle of Hastings, should do penance one year for every individual who had fallen by his hands; and that a penance of forty days for every man who had been wounded in that engagement, should be imposed on the soldier who had inflicted the wounds. Many other penances were ordained in the same council for offences of the military kind (q).

In another synod, held in 1075, all clergymen were prohibited from sitting in judgement in a cause which affected life or limb. This was doubtless intended to shew, that the purity of the clerical character was so remote from the idea of bloodshed, as to be wholly unconcerned with any sanguinary process. The spirit of this canon is still observed.

Several attempts had been made by the popes to introduce celibacy among all the members of the church, that the absence of secular connexions might render them more independent of the temporal power, and attach them the more to the exclusive interests of their own order. In the reign of Edgar, as we have before seen, this mode of life had been adopted in the greater part of the monasteries and cathedrals. But it was not yet universal even among the monks, and had made very little progress among the secular or parochial clergy. Gregory VII. who now filled the papal chair, was a strenuous promoter of this scheme, which he enforced by repeated canons. Lanfranc was also a zealous advocate for it; and he procured, in 1076, the enactment of a law, ordaining, that no monk, canon, or prebendary, should be allowed to have wife; that such priests as lived in castles, towns, or villages, should not enter into the matrimonial state, but that those who were already married might retain their wives; and that bishops should not give holy orders to any married persons, or to one who would not promise to refrain from matrimony. In the same council, a canon was enacted against the supplantation of churches. Among the Anglo-Saxons, lands were frequently conveyed by the delivery of a sword, a staff, an arrow, a cup, &c. without any written instrument; and the Conqueror and his nobles, taking advantage of this insufficiency of evidence, endeavoured to supplant the churches and monasteries, by seizing those lands to which a right of property could not be proved by written testimony. To guard against this supplantation, many deeds and charters were forged by the clergy; and, with a view of giving additional security to the lands of the church, a statute was now particularly directed against the rapacity of the supplanters.

Of the changes which William I. made in the constitution of the English church, the most important was about the year 1085, when he separated the ecclesiastical from the civil courts. In the Saxon times, every earl or governor of a shire presided in the county-court with the bishops of the diocese; and the causes and offences both of the clergy and laity were there tried. But the persuasions of the Norman prelates, who wished to establish a separate jurisdiction for the church, prevailed on William to confine clerical causes to the determination of the prelates and archdeacons. This measure tended to promote the independence of the church on the civil power, and encourage the encroachments of the see of Rome, appeals to which from the ecclesiastical courts were likely to become frequent, disunited as they now were from the temporal judicature.

Lanfranc, after having presided over the English church nearly nineteen years, died in 1089, the second year of the reign of William Rufus, to whom he had been preceptor. He acquired a great reputation for piety, munificence, ability, and erudition; but he degraded his understanding by his zealous adoption of the ridiculous tenet of transubstantiation, which was introduced into the English creed by his efforts and patronage. He not only recommended this doctrine in his discourses, but wrote an elaborate treatise in defence of it against the learned Berenger, archdeacon of Angers, who had ably combated the absurdities of that idea.

The primacy remained unoccupied about four years, during which period William Rufus enjoyed the revenues of his see. This monarch, by way of jocular apology for his practice of retaining vacant ecclesiastical dignities in his own hands, observed, that Christ's bread was sweet and delicious, and therefore very proper for kings. It was not till he was reduced to a state of despondency by an alarming indisposition, in 1093, that he consented to divest himself of the future revenues of the archbishopric of Canterbury, by conferring that dignity on Anselm, abbot of Bec. He, at the same time, filled up the opulent see of Lincoln, and restored the church-lands which he had arbitrarily taken possession of.

(q) Here it is necessary to remark, that the most usual penances were these, viz. fasting, pilgrimage, frequent lamentations, abstinence from the luxury of a soft bed or agreeable clothing, &c. These and other penetential inflictions might be redeemed by the payment of such sums as the bishop of the diocese should appoint, by the copious distribution of alms, or by the erecting or endowing a church or a monastery, of

The dissensions between William Rufus and archbishop Anselm having been mentioned in the civil history, it is unnecessary to recapitulate them here. When the disputes had driven the primate to the continent, in 1097, the king seized the temporalities of his see, and applied the income to his own use during the remainder of his reign. No alterations were made in the discipline or doctrines of the church; for this prince would not suffer any councils to be called for the regulation of ecclesiastical affairs. But his successor, who affected a regard for religion, was more attentive to the concerns of the church. Having recalled Anselm to his see, he permitted him to hold a synod at Westminster, in 1102, when six abbots were deposed for simoniacal practices, though some of them were afterwards restored by a repetition of the same crime for which they had been removed from their dignities. Three other abbots were deposed by the same authority for different offences. This assembly went a step further than any former synod had proceeded, with respect to the marriage of the clergy; for it was now ordained, that no clergyman of any denomination should take a wife, or retain one whom he had already espoused; and that any priest who should (r) not comply with this canon, should be incapacitated from celebrating mass, or performing sacerdotal functions. By other canons of this council, it was decreed, that persons who were related within the seventh degree should not be coupled in matrimony; that clergymen should be shaven in the crown of the head; that every person should take care to prevent his hair from over-shadowing his eyes, or covering his ears; besides a variety of other ordinances, partly frivolous, and partly judicious.

The contest between Henry and the court of Rome, concerning the investiture and homage of prelates and abbots, continued for the first seven years of his reign. It was then decided, in 1107, to the prejudice of the king, who was constrained to relinquish the prerogative of investiture, though he afterwards recovered it during the pontificate of Calistus II.

The clergy of England being extremely averse to a compliance with the late canons against their marriage, a national council was convened for the purpose of enforcing those decrees in 1108. It was enacted by this assembly, that no woman should dwell on ground belonging to the church; that those clergymen who presumed to live in the married state should be divested of their spiritual office, deprived of their movable goods, excommunicated and declared infamous; and that such deans and archdeacons as should take money for dispensing with those statutes, or should refuse to swear that they would not accept bribes in this way, should be subjected to a privation of their dignities. But, though deans and archdeacons were prohibited from taking money for a relaxation of the rigour of those provisions, the king himself did not scruple to receive bribes from those ecclesiastics who wished to retain wives!

Anselm was as tenacious of the supremacy of his see, as his predecessor Lanfranc had been. On the death of Girard archbishop of York, one Thomas was appointed by the king to succeed him; but this ecclesiastic, being no less eager than his kinsman Thomas of Baieux to avoid the humiliating declaration of canonical obedience to the see of Canterbury, declined, on various pretences, a visit to Anselm for consecration. The primate, suspecting the intentions of Thomas, who, with a view of eluding the odious submission, had sent to Rome for a pall, not only wrote a peremptory letter to the archbishop elect, commanding him to come to Canterbury to be consecrated, but dispatched an express to the pope, requesting him not to gratify Thomas with a pall before he had received lawful consecration, and had professed obedience to the primacy. Not content with these demonstrations of firmness, he sent circular letters to all the bishops of the kingdom, giving them a strict injunction not to consecrate the refractory Thomas, or hold communion with him, if he should procure consecration from any foreign prelates. While this dispute remained undecided, Anselm resigned his breath, in 1109, with the character of a learned and zealous defender of all the claims advanced by the see of Rome, however absurd or extravagant. Soon after his decease, Thomas was compelled, by the determination of the king and his council, to give, under his hand and seal, a solemn profession of obedience to the see of Canterbury, with a reserve of his allegiance to his sovereign, and of the submission which he owed to the pope. He was then consecrated by the bishop of London, "receiving from the servant (says Eadmer) what he refused to receive from the master." He then exercised that imperfect superiority which had been allowed him over the church of Scotland, by consecrating Turgot, who had been nominated to the see of St. Andrews.

On the death of Anselm, Henry, in imitation of the example of his brother William Rufus, seized the estates of the see of Canterbury, and kept them in his own hands for five years. He then proposed to fill the important station with a new incumbent; and Ralph, bishop of Rochester, being honoured with the choice of the monks of Canterbury, in 1114, was confirmed in the primacy by the king, and the bishops of the province. The translation of this prelate having been settled without the concurrence of pope Pascal, he was greatly offended at such a neglect of his pontifical authority; and, when he sent a pall for the new archbishop, which he for some time refused to grant, he wrote a letter of reproof and menace, addressed to the king and the prelates of England.

The same year which gave a new primate to the kingdom, exhibited a new archbishop of York, in the person of Thurstan, whose obstinacy revived the contest between the two sees. To dwell on the display of clerical ambition, pride, and pertinacity, would be superfluous: suffice it to say, that Thurstan, being commanded by Henry and his council to profess a due obedience to the church of Canterbury, on pain of forfeiting the see to which he had been elected, embraced the latter alternative; that, repenting of this step, he in vain solicited the king to restore him, till the pope had issued his mandate for that purpose; that he still persisted in refusing to make the submissions required by the primate; that he procured consecration at Rheims, in 1119, from pope Calistus, as well as the honour of the pall; that, being prohibited from returning either into England or Normandy, he remained in France about a year and a half, and then recovered his see without any declaration of obedience, in consequence of the pope's having, in 1121, threatened the king with excommunication, the primate with suspension, and the realm with an interdict.

Ralph, who was not inferior to Anselm or Lanfranc in piety, learning, or spirit, was succeeded in the archbishopric by William de Corboil, who was elected in 1123, the year after his predecessor's death. The new archbishop, when he repaired to Rome for his pall, endeavoured to obtain from the pope a final decision in favour of the superiority of his see over that of York; but Calistus was unwilling to comply with his solicitations.

The see of Rome, for many years had been labouring to establish her authority over the church of England, by introducing her legates into that kingdom. But though William I. had permitted a papal legation when it coincided with his private views, neither the exhortations of Alexander II. who had promoted that prince's designs on the English throne, nor the enterprizing arrogance of Gregory VII. could prevail on him to receive a legate in ordinary, or acquiesce in other encroachments meditated by the holy see. His son William Rufus was equally inflexible to the demands and menaces of the papal court; and his brother Henry, for some time, boldly resisted the idea of a Romish legation, having denied a reception to several ecclesiastics who had been sent at different times to officiate as the representatives of the pope. At length, however, he consented in 1125, to admit the cardinal John de Crema in that capacity, from an unwillingness to exasperate the sovereign pontiff (Honorius II.) who, he apprehended, might be induced, by his refusal, to patronize the claim of duke Robert's son, that prince being then in arms against his royal uncle.

The cardinal legate on his arrival in England, made a progress through some of the dioceses, and afterwards presided in a council at Westminster, which was numerously rously attended. Among other canons of this synod, there was one which prohibited the marriage of ecclesiastics of every denomination: for the neglect of the former statutes on this subject rendered it necessary, in the legate's opinion, to enforce them by the papal authority. In a speech which he addressed to the assembly he inveighed against the lewdness and immorality of those churchmen who lived in a state of matrimony, and affirmed it to be "the height of impiety for a priest to make the body of Christ when he had lately risen from the side of a prostitute;" for it was the custom of the bigots of those times to give that opprobrious appellation to the wives of the clergy. In the evening of the same day, the cardinal himself, after he had administered the eucharist, was detected in the enjoyment of amorous intercourse with a professed courtezan. The shame of this discovery, which was immediately propagated over the kingdom, so confounded the legate, that he abruptly made his retreat to the continent. This adventure afforded cause of triumph to the married clergy, and gave them some respite from the strict execution of the laws against them.

(r) See the reign of Henry I. supra.

After the separation of the late council, the archbishops of Canterbury and York repaired to Rome, to treat with the pope on the dispute between the two sees. The superior influence of Thurstan procured a bull for the exemption of himself and his successors from all dependence on the see of Canterbury, and for establishing a perfect equality between the two prelates, except that the point of precedency should be enjoyed by the one who had first received consecration. Mortified by this decision, William, though he had been desired to remonstrate with his holiness on his invasion of the independence of the English church by the delegation of his representative, consented to accept a commission from Honorius in 1127, appointing him the papal legate for the whole kingdom of England, by which he expected to recover a full superiority over the archbishop of York and the suffragans of that see. By his acceptance of the legatine character, he betrayed the true interests of the church over which he presided, sunk his independent metropolitan dignity in the office of deputy to a foreign priest, and completed the subjection of the national church to the decrees of one who had no shadow of right to exercise any jurisdiction over it. Before he thus degraded himself, he had a plenary authority, by prescriptive claim, and royal confirmation, over all the dioceses of England; an authority which no papal bulls could either augment or diminish, if the spirit of the sovereign and the nation had been properly exerted.

Soon after his return from Rome, William, eager to preside in his legatine capacity, summoned a general council of the English and Welsh clergy, in which he enacted severe laws against that "plague of the church," the marriage of ecclesiastics. But the clergy still continuing to neglect the prohibition, another synod was convoked in 1129, when the king was present. It was decreed on this occasion, that those clergymen who should either marry in future, or refuse to dismiss the wives with whom they now cohabited, should be expelled from their churches and houses, and be declared incapable of ever filling any ecclesiastical department. Henry, however, deprived this canon of its efficacy, by drawing into his own coffers a pecuniary compensation for the infringement of it.

During the schism in the papacy, which commenced on the death of Honorius, in 1130, for whose tiara a cardinal named Peter, who assumed the distinction of Ancletus, powerfully contended with Innocent II. which lasted eight years, the English church was not disturbed by the arrogant claims of the court of Rome. William's legatine authority having expired with Honorius, he directed the affairs of the church in his original character of metropolitan.

As the prelates of this kingdom, induced by the promises of Stephen to violate their oaths to the empress Matilda, concurred in the usurpation of that prince, he particularly favoured the clerical order in the charter which he granted at Oxford within a few months after his coronation, in 1136. William, who either believed, or pretended to believe, the perjured assertion of the earl of Norfolk, importing that king Henry, on his death-bed, had absolved his subjects of the oaths which they had taken in Matilda's favour, had anointed and crowned Stephen; but he did not survive the performance of that ceremony above a year; and, at his decease, the king, in direct contravention of one of the articles of his charter, kept the archbishopric in his own hands for two years. The vacancy was then supplied with Theobald, abbot of Bec, in 1138, principally by the influence of Alberic, bishop of Ostia, whom Innocent, presuming on the favour which he had shewn to Stephen by granting him a bull to confirm his usurpation, had sent over to interfere in the ecclesiastical government.

Prior to the see of Canterbury being conferred on Theobald, Alberic held a national synod at Westminster, in which the laws against the marriage and concubinage of the clergy were renewed, and the receiving of investiture from the hands of a layman was prohibited. Theobald was then elected, with the approbation of the king, to the vacant see, and consecrated by the legate, in 1109, to the great disappointment of Henry, bishop of Winchester, who had expected, from the favour of his brother Stephen, a translation to the metropolitan see. The discontent, however, of this ambitious prelate, was partly removed by the legatine commission which he now received from the pope, and which gave him a superiority over all the prelates of the realm.

While the bishop of Winchester continued in the exercise of his legation, the practice of appealing to Rome began to be more frequent than it had ever been before: and, indeed, as the pope had now established his power of nominating legates, appeals to his immediate jurisdiction were the natural consequences of that concern which he had arrogated in the direction of the English church; for, if the sentence of the deputy did not meet with approbation, the obvious remedy was an appeal to the principal himself.

The regularity of spiritual government was so much impeded by the intestine wars of this reign, that few points of ecclesiastical history occur; and the deliberations of the different synods which assembled after the departure of the bishop of Ostia, had such reference to the temporal business of the nation, that the circumstances and result of their meeting were necessarily mentioned among the civil affairs of this period. The occasional quarrels between Stephen and the dignified clergy have been also assigned to that department; and nothing purely ecclesiastical remains to be recorded, except the long contention for the see of York, between the king's nephew William, treasurer of that church, and Henry Murdoch, abbot of Fountains in that county. The interest of the latter at length prevailed; for, in the council convoked by Eugenius III. at Rheims, in 1148, William was deprived of his see, on pretence of irregular election. He did not recover it before the decease of Murdoch; and then he enjoyed it for a very short time, being removed from the world by a sudden indisposition, in 1154, which was attributed to the effects of poison.

TO the ecclesiastical affairs of this period, i. e. from 1066 till 1154, an account of the learned and ingenious men who flourished in the Anglo-Norman times will not be deemed an improper appendix, as erudition and science were then principally confined to that part of the community whose history has been the object of this chapter.

For some time before the conquest, literary and scientific pursuits were in a low state of cultivation among the English, notwithstanding the endeavours of Edward the Confessor, and of his learned and accomplished queen Editha, to promote the intellectual benefit of the people. But the arrival of the Normans proved beneficial to the cause of learning, which, at that period, flourished more on the continent than in England. Most of the clergy who accompanied William the First to this kingdom, or who came over after he had established himself on the throne, were far superior to any of the contemporary English in literary acquisitions. Of the ecclesiastics who flourished under this monarch, Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, was the most celebrated for his learning and abilities. He had acquired a high fame for his lectures on logic and scholastic theology before his elevation to the primacy of England, and his defence of transubstantiation procured him the general applause of the advocates of the see of Rome. While he filled the metropolitan chair, he endeavoured to revive among the English a taste for mental improvement; and his efforts seem to have been attended with success.

Archbishop Anselm was one of the pupils of Lanfranc in the duchy of Normandy; and his subsequent reputation for learning was nearly equal to that of his predecessor. See the reign of Henry I.

Eadmer, a monk of Canterbury, the secretary and confidential friend of Anselm, wrote a history of his own times (from the year 1066 to 1122,) in which he principally dwells on ecclesiastical affairs. Though nearly two-thirds of his work may be rather termed a life of Anselm, than a history of England, there are many political facts interspersed throughout it, by which it is rendered an useful and interesting production. His style is tolerably pure, and sometimes elegant; his arrangement is more methodical and judicious than that of most of our early historians; and, notwithstanding his prejudices in favour of Anselm, and his support of the papal supremacy, he is, upon the whole, an impartial writer. His fame was so great that Alexander I. king of Scotland, sent for him to fill the see of St. Andrews; but, after he had received investiture, he lost his archbishopric by refusing to be consecrated by any prelate except the archbishop of Canterbury; for Alexander would never suffer him to return to it, even when he promised a full compliance with that monarch's will. Turgot, one of the predecessors of Eadmer in the see of St. Andrew's, was an Englishman of learning and merit, and wrote the life of Malcolm Kenmore, king of Scotland, as well as a history of the church of Durham, which Simeon, precentor of that church, published under his own name.

Ingulph, who flourished in the reigns of William the Conqueror, William Rufus, and Henry I. was a man of erudition and capacity; and having acted as secretary to the first of those princes before his invasion of England, he was afterwards promoted by him to the government of Croyland Abbey, affording an exception to the general rule adopted by that monarch, of filling both the civil and ecclesiastical dignities of this kingdom with foreigners; for Ingulph was born in London of Anglo-Saxon parents. He published a well-written history of the abbey over which he presided; a work which contains a variety of particulars respecting the political affairs of England, from the time of Penda, king of Mercia, till the latter end of the eleventh century.

One of the most celebrated divines in the twelfth century was Robert White, who read lectures on theology in the university of Oxford, with such applause and reputation, as procured him an invitation to Rome from pope Celestine the Second, by whose successor Lucius he was elevated to the rank of a cardinal.

Osmund, who was both bishop of Salisbury and earl of Dorset in the reigns of the two Williams, was a learned prelate, as well as an able politician. He is principally known to the literary world by the liturgy which he compiled for the use of his own church, and which was soon adopted in most of the English churches.

Joffrid, who succeeded Ingulph as abbot of Croyland, was a Frenchman of learning, and distinguished himself by sending (as we are informed by Peter of Blois) to his manor of Cottenham, near Cambridge, in 1109, four Norman monks, who employed themselves in teaching the sciences in that town, and thus contributed to the revival (or, as others say, the foundation) of that university.

Florence, a monk of Worcester, was the author of a chronicle, ending at the year 1117. He is much inferior, as a writer to William of Malmesbury, his contemporary, who is justly celebrated as one of the best historians of the middle ages; whose diction has more purity and elegance than could have been expected from the times in which he lived; who has enriched his narrative with a spirit of philosophy, uncommon among the monkish writers; and whose works, though disgraced by the occasional mention of the miracles of superstition, may even give pleasure in the perusal to the fastidious scholars of the present day. Besides five books of civil history, and a short supplement, he wrote a copious biography of the English prelates. He officiated as librarian of the abbey of Malmesbury, where he died before the middle of the twelfth century. The patron of this ingenious monk was Robert, earl of Gloucester, to whom he dedicated his history.

In the same century lived Simeon, precentor of Durham, who was a great collector of historical records, and wrote a chronicle of the kings of England to the year 1130, which was continued to 1156, by John, prior of Hexham. He has borrowed much from Florence of Worcester, who was himself greatly indebted to Marianus Scotus.

Henry, archdeacon of Huntingdon, was no contemptible historian, and was one of the best poets of his time. He was patronized by Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, one of the prelates whose wealth and influence attracted the jealousy and violence of Stephen. About the same time lived Geoffrey of Monmouth, bishop of St. Asaph, the translator, as some think, of a Welsh history of Britain, or, as others suppose, the inventor of most of the fables which appear in the history published under his name.

Ealred or Ethelred, abbot of Rievaulx in Yorkshire, was a writer of some merit, and published a life of Edward the Confessor, a genealogy of the kings of England, and a history of the war between the English and Scots in the reign of Stephen. Contemporary with this abbot was Alfred of Beverley, who, though he has occasionally borrowed from Geoffrey of Monmouth, is, in general, much more deserving of attention than that inventive genius.

Geoffrey, prior of Winchester, is celebrated by William of Malmesbury as an elegant writer, and an ingenious epigrammatist. Though in his epigrams he gave vent to satirical effusions, he was as much inclined to praise as to censure; for he exercised his poetical talents in composing a panegyric on the different primates of England.

William of Poictiers, chaplain to William the First, wrote a history of the Conquest, with less partiality than might have been expected from his situation; and Ordericus Vitalis, who, though a native of England, was a monk of St. Eurolis, in Normandy, was the author of an ecclesiastical history, which includes many of the political transactions of the reigns of the four first Norman kings.

In treating of the literature of this period we ought not to omit mentioning the Saxon Chronicle, one of the most authentic monuments of English history. It is brought down to the last year of Stephen's reign; and chiefly consists of the bare narration of events, unaccompanied with the least detail of causes or circumstances. It was written by different hands, doubtless by Anglo-Saxon ecclesiastics, whose names, however, have not been handed down to us.

THE REIGNS OF HENRY II. RICHARD I. JOHN, HENRY III. EDWARD I. EDWARD II. EDWARD III. AND RICHARD II.

CHAPTER I.

HENRY II.

PREVIOUS to the conquest of England by the duke of Normandy, Great Britain was as much separated from the rest of the world in politics as in situation; and except from the inroads of the Danish pirates, the English, happily confined at home, had neither enemies nor allies on the continent of Europe. The foreign dominions of William connected them with the king and great vassals of France; and while the opposite pretensions of the pope and the emperor in Italy produced a continual intercourse between Germany and that country, the two great monarchs of France and England formed, in another part of this quarter of the globe, a separate system, and carried on their wars and negociations, without meeting either with opposition or support from the other states.

On the decline of the Carlovingian race, the nobles in every province of France, taking advantage of the weakness ness of the sovereign, and obliged to provide, each for his own defence, against the ravages of the Norman freebooters, had assumed, both in civil and military affairs, an authority almost independent, and had reduced within very narrow limits the prerogative of their princes. The accession of Hugh Capet, by annexing a great fief to the crown, had brought some addition to the royal dignity; but this fief, though considerable for a subject, appeared a narrow basis of power for a prince who was placed at the head of so great a community. The royal demesnes consisted only of Paris, Orleans, Estampes, Compiegne, and a few places scattered over the northern provinces: in the rest of the kingdom, the prince's authority was rather nominal than real: the vassals were accustomed, nay entitled, to make war without his permission, on each other: they were even entitled, if they conceived themselves injured, to turn their arms against their sovereign: they exercised all civil jurisdiction, without appeal, over their tenants and inferior vassals: their common jealousy of the crown easily united them against any attempt on their exorbitant privileges; and as some of them had attained the power and authority of great princes, even the smallest baron was sure of immediate and effectual protection. Besides six ecclesiastical peerages, which, with the other immunities of the church, cramped the general execution of justice; there were six lay peerages, Burgundy, Normandy, Guienne, Flanders, Toulouse, and Champagne, which formed extensive and puissant sovereignties. Although the combination of those princes and barons could, on urgent occasions, muster a mighty power; yet was it very difficult to set that great machine in motion; it was almost impossible to preserve harmony in its parts; a sense of common interest alone could, for a time, unite them under their sovereign against a common enemy; but if the king attempted to turn the force of the community against any mutinous vassal, the same sense of common interest made the others oppose themselves to the success of his pretensions. Louis le Gros, the last sovereign, marched at one time to his frontiers against the Germans at the head of an army of two hundred thousand men; but a petty lord of Corboil, of Puiset, of Couci, was able, at another period, to set that prince at defiance, and to maintain open war against him.

The authority of the English monarch was more extensive within his kingdom, and the disproportion greater between him and the most powerful of his vassals. His demesnes and revenue were large, compared to the greatness of his state: he was accustomed to levy arbitrary exactions on his subjects: his courts of judicature extended their jurisdiction into every part of the kingdom: he could crush by his power, or by a judicial sentence, well or ill founded, any baron that had become disagreeable in his conception: and though the feudal institutions which prevailed in his kingdom, had the same tendency as in other states, to exalt the aristocracy and depress the monarchy, it required, in England, according to its present constitution, a great combination of the vassals to oppose their sovereign lord, and there had not hitherto arisen any baron so powerful as of himself to levy war against the prince, and afford protection to the inferior barons.

While such were the different situations of France and England, and the latter enjoyed so many advantages above the former; the accession of Henry II. a prince of great abilities, possessed of so many rich provinces on the continent, might appear an event dangerous, if not fatal, to the French monarchy, and sufficient to break the balance between the states. He was master, in the right of his father, of Anjou and Touraine; in that of his mother, of Normandy and Maine; in that of his wife, of Guienne, Poictou, Xaintonge, Auvergne, Perigord, Angoumois, and the Limousin. He soon after annexed Bretagne to his other states, and was already possessed of the superiority over that province, which, on the first cession of Normandy to Rollo the Dane, had been granted by Charles the Simple, in vassalage to that formidable ravager. These provinces composed above a third of the whole French monarchy, and were much superior in extent and opulence to those territories which were subjected to the immediate jurisdiction and government of the king. The vassal was here more powerful than his liege lord: the situation which had enabled Hugh Capet to depose the Carlovingian princes, seemed to be renewed, and that with much greater advantages on the side of the vassal: and when England was added to so many provinces, the French king had reason to apprehend, from this conjuncture, some great disaster to himself and to his family; but, in reality, it was this circumstance, which appeared so formidable, that saved the Capetian race, and by its consequences exalted them to that pitch of grandeur which they enjoyed till the decapitation of Louis XVI.

The limited authority of the prince in the feudal constitutions, hindered the king of England from employing with advantage the force of so many states, which were subjected to his government; and these different members, disjoined in situation, and disagreeing in laws, language, and manners, were never thoroughly cemented into one monarchy. He soon became, both from his distant place of residence, and from the incompatibility of interests, a kind of foreigner to his French dominions; and his subjects on the continent considered their allegiance as more naturally due to their superior lord, who lived in their neighbourhood, and who was acknowledged to be the supreme head of their nation. He was always at hand to invade them; their immediate lord was often at too great a distance to protect them; and any disorder in any part of his dispersed dominions gave advantages against him. The other powerful vassals of the French crown were rather pleased to see the expulsion of the English, and were not affected with that jealousy which would have arisen from the oppression of a co-vassal who was of the same rank with themselves. By this means the king of France found it more easy to conquer those numerous provinces from England, than to subdue a duke of Normandy and Guienne, a count of Anjou, Maine, or Poictou. And after reducing such extensive territories, which immediately incorporated with the body of the monarchy, he found greater facility in uniting to the crown the other great fiefs which still remained separate and independent.

But as these important consequences could not be foreseen by human wisdom, the king of France remarked with terror the rising grandeur of the house of Anjou or Plantagenet; and, in order to retard its progress, he had ever maintained a strict union with Stephen, and had endeavoured to support the tottering fortunes of that usurper. But after this prince's death it was too late to think of opposing the succession of Henry, or preventing the performance of those stipulations which, with the consent of the nation, he had made with his predecessor. The English, harassed with civil wars, and disgusted with the bloodshed and depredations which, during the course of so many years, had attended them, were little disposed to violate their oaths, by excluding the lawful heir from the succession. Many of the most considerable fortresses were in the hands of his partizans: the whole nation had seen the noble qualities with which he was endued, and probably compared them with the mean talents of William, the son of Stephen; and as they were acquainted with his great power, and were rather pleased to see the accession of so many foreign dominions to the crown of England, they never entertained the least idea of resisting them. Henry himself, sensible of the advantages attending his present situation, was in no hurry to arrive in England; and being engaged in the siege of a castle on the frontiers of Normandy, belonging to one of the refractory barons, when he received intelligence of Stephen's death, he made it a point of honour not to depart from his enterprize, till he had brought it to an issue.

When he had reduced the castle he repaired to Roüen, where he conferred on the circumstances of his situation with his mother the empress Matilda, as well as with the principal nobility of the duchy; then proceeding to the port of Barfleur, he prepared for his voyage to the dominions which had now devolved to him. After a month's detention, the consequence of contrary winds, he set sail for England, accompanied by his duchess, his two brothers, and a magnificent train of barons. He was welcomed on his arrival in this kingdom, December 8, 1154, with the loudest acclamations, and with grateful effusions of heartfelt joy. The nation hailed him as the restorer of peace and prosperity, for it had long been subject to turmoils and misfortunes.

In the interval between the death of Stephen and the appearance of his successor, Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, one of Henry's warmest friends, governed the realm at the head of a regency in a very able manner. He afterwards officiated at the coronation of the new king and queen, which was solemnized in the abbey of Westminster, on the 19th of December, with an extraordinary attendance of rank and fashion.

The first act of Henry's government, in the beginning of 1155, corresponded to the high idea entertained of his abilities, and prognosticated the re-establishment of justice and tranquillity, of which the kingdom had so long been bereaved. He immediately dismissed all those mercenary soldiers who had committed great disorders in the nation during the preceding reign; and he sent them abroad, together with William D'Ypres, their leader, the friend and confidant of Stephen. He revoked all the grants made by his predecessor, even those which necessity had extorted from the empress Matilda; and that princess, who had resigned her rights in favour of Henry, made no opposition to a measure so necessary for supporting the dignity of the crown. In a parliament assembled at London, he granted a charter of liberties, or rather renewed and confirmed that which had been granted by his grandfather Henry the First. He repaired the coin, which had been extremely debased during the reign of his predecessor; and took proper measures against the return of a like abuse. He was rigorous in the execution of justice, and in the suppression of robbery and violence; and that he might restore authority to the laws, he caused all the new-erected castles to be demolished, which had proved so many sanctuaries to freebooters and rebels. The earl of Albemarle, Hugh Mortimer, and Roger, the son of Milo, of Gloucester, were inclined to make some resistance to this salutary measure; but the approach of the king with his forces soon obliged them to submit to his authority. In short, this youthful monarch accomplished more good, and more effectually secured the affections of his subjects, in the first year of his reign, than any other prince had done in the same space of time since the death of Alfred.

To put a stop to the evils of a disputed succession, and secure the crown to his own family, he summoned a great council at Wallingford, the members of which took an oath of fealty to his eldest son William, as the immediate successor of his father, and, in the event of that prince's death, to his second son Henry, then newly born.

Every thing being restored to full tranquillity in England, Henry went abroad in 1156, that he might oppose the attempts of his brother Geoffrey, who, during his absence, had made an incursion into Anjou and Maine, had advanced some pretensions to those provinces, and had got possession of a considerable part of them. On the king's appearance the people returned to their allegiance; and Geoffrey, resigning his claim for an annual pension of a thousand pounds, departed and took possession of the county of Nantes, which the inhabitants, who had expelled count Hoël their prince, had put into his hands. Henry returned to England in the spring of 1157, and entered into a negociation with Malcolm IV. king of Scotland, whose inability to contend with so formidable an adversary obliged him to relinquish the northern counties which the Scottish monarchs had hitherto held of the English crown: these were Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland.

The incursions of the Welsh then provoked him to make an invasion upon them; where the natural fastnesses of the country occasioned him great difficulties, and even brought him into danger. His vanguard, being engaged in a narrow pass, was put to rout: Henry de Essex, the hereditary standard-bearer, seized with a panic, threw down the standard, took to flight, and exclaimed that the king was slain; and had not the prince immediately appeared in person, and led on his troops with great gallantry, the consequence might have proved fatal to the whole army. For this misbehaviour, Essex was six years afterwards, impeached in form by Robert de Montfort, and a trial by duel taking place, the accused person was vanquished, but was saved from the capital punishment of his guilt by the clemency of the king, who permitted him to become a monk in the abbey of Reading, while his ample estates were confiscated, as he was disqualified, by the rigour of the laws of chivalry, for holding lands by barony or knight-service. The submissions of the Welsh procured them an accommodation with England.

The martial disposition of the princes in that age engaged them to head their own armies in every enterprize, even the most frivolous; and their feeble authority made it commonly impracticable for them to delegate, on occasion, the command to their generals. Geoffrey, the king's brother, died soon after he had acquired possession of Nantes: though he had no other title to that county than the voluntary submission or election of the inhabitants two years before Henry laid claim to the territory as devolved to him by hereditary right, and he went over in 1158 to support his pretensions by force of arms. Conan, duke or earl of Bretagne (for these titles are given indifferently by historians to those princes), pretended that Nantes had been lately separated by rebellion from his principality, to which of right it belonged; and immediately on Geoffrey's death he took possession of the disputed territory. Lest Louis the French king should interpose in the controversy, Henry paid him a visit; and so illured him by caresses and civilities, that an alliance was contracted between them; and they agreed that young Henry, heir to the English monarchy, should be affianced to Margaret, daughter of Louis, by his second wife Constantia, of Castile; though the former was only five years of age, the latter was still in her cradle. Henry, now secure of meeting with no interruption on this side, advanced with his army into Bretagne; and Conan, in despair of being able to make resistance, delivered up the county of Nantes to him. The able conduct of the king procured him more important advantages from this incident. Conan, harassed with the turbulent disposition of his subjects, was desirous of procuring to himself the support of so great a monarch; and he betrothed his daughter and only child, yet an infant, to Geoffrey, the king's third son, who was of the same tender years. The duke of Bretagne died about seven years after; and Henry, being mesne lord, and also natural guardian to his son and daughter-in-law, put himself in possession of that principality, and annexed it for the present to his other extensive dominions.

The king had a prospect of making still farther acquisitions; and the activity of his temper suffered no opportunity of that kind to escape him. Philippa, duchess of Guienne, mother queen of Eleanor, was the only issue of William IV. count of Toulouse; and would have inherited his dominions, had not that prince, desirous of preserving the succession in the male line, conveyed the principality to his brother Raymond de St. Gilles, by a contract of sale which was in that age regarded as fictitious and illusory. By this means the title to the county of Toulouse came to be disputed between the male and female heirs; and the one or the other, as opportunities favoured them, had obtained possession. Raymond, grandson of Raymond de St. Gilles, was the reigning sovereign; and on Henry's reviving his wife's claim, this prince had recourse for protection to the king of France, who was so much concerned in policy to prevent the farther aggrandizement of the English monarch. Louis himself, when married to Eleanor, had asserted the justice of her claim, and had demanded possession of Toulouse; but his sentiments changing with his interest, he now determined to defend by his power and authority the title of Raymond. Henry found that it would be requisite to support his pretensions against potent antagonists; and that nothing but a formidable army could maintain a claim which he had in vain asserted by arguments and manifestos.

An army, composed of feudal vassals, was commonly very intractable and undisciplined, both because of the independent spirit of the persons who served in it, and because the commands were not given, either by the choice of the sovereign, or from the military capacity and experience of the officers. Each baron conducted his own vassals; and the rank which he bore in the army was greater or less, proportioned to the extent of his property: even the supreme command under the prince was often attached to birth; and as the military vassals were obliged to serve only forty days at their own charge, (though, if the expedition were distant, they were put to great expence), the prince reaped little advantage from their attendance. Henry, sensible of these inconveniences, levied upon his vassals in Normandy, and other provinces which were remote from Toulouse, a sum of money in lieu of their service; and this commutation, by reason of the great distance, was still more advantageous to his English vassals. He imposed, therefore, in 1159, a scutage of one thousand eight hundred pounds on the knights' fees, a commutation to which, though it was unusual, and the first perhaps to be met with in history, the military tenants willingly submitted; and with this money he levied an army which was more under his command, and whose service was more durable and constant. Assisted by Berenger, count of Barcelona, and Trincaval, count of Nismes, whom he had gained to his party, he invaded the county of Toulouse; and after taking Verdun, Castlenau, and other places, he besieged the capital of the province, and was likely to prevail in the enterprize; when Louis, advancing before the arrival of his main body, threw himself into the place with a small reinforcement. Henry was urged by some of his ministers to prosecute the siege, to take Louis prisoner, and to impose his own terms in the pacification; but he either thought it so much his interest to maintain the feudal principles, by which his foreign dominions were secured, or bore so much respect to his superior lord, that he declared he would not attack a place defended by him in person; and he immediately raised the siege. He marched into Normandy to protect that province against an incursion which the count of Dreux, instigated by king Louis his brother, had made upon it. War was now openly carried on between the two monarchs, but produced no memorable event: it soon ended in a cessation of arms, and that followed by a peace, which was not, however, attended with any confidence or good correspondence between those rival princes. The ratification of the articles took place in October, 1160; when prince Henry did homage to the king of France for the duchy of Normandy. The fortress of Gisors, being part of the dowry stipulated to Margaret of France, had been consigned by agreement to the knights templars, on condition that it should be delivered into Henry's hands after the celebration of the nuptials. The king, that he might have a pretence for immediately demanding the place, ordered the marriage to be solemnized between the prince and princess, though both infants; and he engaged the grand-master of the templars, by large presents, as was generally suspected, to put him in possession of Gisors. Louis resenting this conduct, banished the templars, and would have made war upon the king of England, had it not been for the mediation and authority of pope Alexander III. who had been chased from Rome by the anti-pope Victor IV. and resided at that time in France. The terms of the late treaty were accordingly renewed about Midsummer, 1161. That we may form an idea of the authority possessed by the Roman pontiff during those ages, it may be proper to observe that the two kings had, the year before, met the pope at the castle of Torci on the Loire; and they gave him such marks of respect, that both dismounted to receive him, and holding each of them one of the reins of his bridle, walked on foot by his side, and conducted him in that submissive manner into the castle. "A spectacle," cries Baronius in an ecstacy, "to God, angels, and men; and such as had never before been exhibited to the world!"

Henry, soon after he had accommodated his differences with Louis, by the pope's mediation, returned to England in 1163, where he was received, after an absence of nearly four years, with demonstrations of general joy. Rees ap Griffith, prince of South Wales, having ravaged the possessions of the English in that principality, on pretence that Henry had not strictly adhered to his treaty with him, the king, with that activity which marked his character, advanced into the county of Brecknock, where without bloodshed, he intimidated Rees into submission, and again received the homage and fealty of that prince.

Henry then turned his attention to civil affairs; and, by his command, a general inquisition was taken throughout England, for ascertaining the number of baronies and knight's fees, both at the time of Henry the First's death, and in the present year; and for accurately determining the various services and payments due to the crown. A new survey of this kind was rendered necessary by the confusions of the late reign, and the artful practices which had been adopted for evading a full contribution to the exigences of the state.

Soon after his return to England he commenced an enterprize, which, though required by sound policy, and even conducted in the main with prudence, bred him great disquietude, involved him in danger, and was not concluded without some loss and dishonour.

The usurpations of the clergy, which had at first been gradual, were now become so rapid, and had mounted to such a height, that the contest between the regale and pontificale was really arrived at a crisis in England; and it became necessary to determine whether the king or the priests, particularly the archbishop of Canterbury, should be sovereign of the kingdom. The aspiring spirit of Henry, which gave inquietude to all his neighbours, was not likely long to pay a tame submission to the encroachments of subjects; and as nothing opens the eyes of men so readily as their interest, he was in no danger of falling, in this respect, into that abject superstition which retained his people in subjection. From the commencement of his reign, in the government of his foreign dominions, as well as of England, he had shown a fixed purpose to repress clerical usurpations, and to maintain those prerogatives which had been transmitted to him by his predecessors. During the schism of the papacy between Alexander and Victor, he had determined, for some time, to remain neuter: and when informed that the archbishop of Roüen, and the bishop of Mans, had, from their own authority, acknowledged Alexander as legitimate pope, he was so enraged, that though he spared the archbishop on account of his great age, he immediately issued orders for overthrowing the houses of the bishop of Mans and archdeacon of Roüen; and it was not till he had deliberately examined the matter, by those views which usually enter into the councils of princes, that he allowed that pontiff to exercise authority over any of his dominions. In England, the mild character and advanced years of Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, together with his merits in refusing to put the crown on the head of Eustace, son of Stephen, prevented Henry, during the life-time of that primate, from taking any measures against the multiplied encroachments of the clergy; but after his death, the king resolved to exert himself with more activity; and that he might be secure against any opposition, he advanced to that dignity Becket (s), his chancellor, on the 3rd of June, 1162, of whose compliance he thought he could entirely depend.

Thomas à Becket, the first man of English descent who, since the Norman conquest, had, during the course of a whole century, risen to any considerable station, was born, in 1119, of reputable parents in the city of London; and being endowed both with industry and capacity, he early insinuated himself into the favour of archbishop Theobald, and obtained from that prelate some preferments and offices. By their means he was enabled to travel for improvement to Italy, where he studied the civil and canon law at Bologna; and on his return he appeared to have made such proficiency in knowledge, that he was promoted by his patron to the archdeaconry of Canterbury, an office of considerable trust and profit. He was afterwards employed with success by Theobald in transacting business at Rome; and on Henry's accession he was recommended to that monarch as worthy of farther preferment. Henry, who knew that Becket had been instrumental in supporting that resolution of the archbishop, which had tended so much to facilitate his own advancement to the throne, was already prepossessed in his favour; and finding, on further acquaintance, that his spirit and abilities entitled him to any trust, he soon promoted him to the dignity of chancellor, one of the first civil offices in the kingdom. The chancellor, in that age, besides the custody of the great seal, had possession of all vacant prelacies and abbies; he was the guardian of all such minors and pupils as were the king's tenants; all baronies which escheated to the crown were under his administration; he was entitled to a place in council, even though he were not particularly summoned; and as he exercised also the office of secretary of state, and it belonged to him to countersign all commissions, writs, and letters-patent, he was a kind of prime minister, and was concerned in the dispatch of every business of importance. Besides exercising this high office, Becket, by the favour of the king or archbishop, was made provost of Beverley, dean of Hastings, and constable of the Tower: he was put in possession of the honours of Eye and Berkham, large baronies that had escheated to the crown: and to complete his grandeur, he was entrusted with the education of prince Henry, the king's eldest son, and heir of the monarchy. The pomp of his retinue, the sumptuousness of his furniture, the luxury of his table, the munificence of his presents, corresponded to these great preferments; or rather exceeded any thing that England had ever before seen in any subject. His historian and secretary, Fitz-Stephens, mentions, among other particulars, that his apartments were every day in winter covered with clean straw or hay, and in summer with green rushes or boughs; lest the gentlemen who paid court to him, and who could not, by reason of their great number, find a place at table, should soil their fine clothes by sitting on a dirty floor (t). A great number of knights were retained in his service; the greatest barons

(s) Thomas à Becket had enjoyed the office of chancellor five years, and was about the age of forty-three when he was advanced to the primacy.

(t) John Baldwin held the manor of Oterasfee, in Aylesbury, of the king in soccage, by the service of finding litter for the king's bed, viz. in summer grass or herbs, and two grey geese; and in winter, straw, and three eels, thrice in the year, if the king should come thrice in the year to Aylesbury. *Madox, Bar. were proud of being received at his table; his house was a place of education for the sons of the chief nobility; and the king himself frequently vouchsafed to partake of his entertainments. As his way of life was splendid and opulent, his amusements and occupations were gay, and partook of the cavalier spirit, which, as he had only taken deacon's orders, he did not think unbefitting his character. He employed himself at leisure hours in hunting, hawking, gaming, and horsemanship; he exposed his person in several military actions; he carried over, at his own charge, seven hundred knights to attend the king in his wars at Toulouse; in the subsequent wars on the frontiers of Normandy he maintained, during forty days, twelve hundred knights, and four thousand of their train; and in an embassy to France, with which he was entrusted, he astonished that court by the number and magnificence of his retinue.

Henry, besides committing all his more important business to Becket's management, honoured him with his friendship and intimacy; and whenever he was disposed to relax himself by sports of any kind, he admitted his chancellor to the party. An instance of their familiarity is mentioned by Fitz-Stephens, which, as it shows the manners of the age, it may not be improper to relate. One day, as the king and the chancellor were riding together in the streets of London, they observed a beggar who was shivering with cold. Would it not be very praiseworthy, said the king, to give that poor man a warm coat in this severe season? It would, surely, replied the chancellor; and you do well, Sir, in thinking of such good actions. Then he shall have one presently, cried the king: and seizing the skirt of the chancellor's coat, which was scarlet, and lined with ermine, began to pull it violently. The chancellor defended himself for some time; and they had both of them like to have tumbled off their horses in the street, when Becket, after a vehement struggle, let go his coat; which the king bestowed on the beggar, who, being ignorant of the quality of the persons, was not a little surprized at the present.

Becket, who by his complaisance and good humour had rendered himself agreeable, and by his industry and abilities, useful to his master, appeared to him the fittest person for supplying the vacancy made by the death of Theobald. As he was well acquainted with the king's intentions of retrenching, or rather confining within the ancient bounds, all ecclesiastical privileges, and always showed a ready disposition to comply with them, Henry, who never expected any resistance from that quarter, immediately issued orders for electing him archbishop of Canterbury. But this resolution, which was taken contrary to the opinion of Matilda, and many of the ministers, drew after it very unhappy consequences; and never prince of so great penetration appeared in the issue to have so little understood the genius and character of his minister.

No sooner was Becket installed in this high dignity, which rendered him for life the second person in the kingdom, with some pretensions of aspiring to be the first, than he totally altered his demeanour and conduct, and endeavoured to acquire the character of sanctity, of which his former busy and ostentatious course of life might, in the eyes of the people, have naturally bereaved him. Without consulting the king, he immediately returned into his hands the commission of chancellor; pretending that he must thenceforth detach himself from secular affairs, and be solely employed in the exercise of his spiritual function; but in reality, that he might break off all connections with Henry, and apprise him, that Becket, as primate of England, was now become entirely a new personage. He maintained, in his retinue, and attendants alone, his ancient pomp and lustre, which was useful to strike the vulgar: in his own person he affected the greatest austerity and most rigid mortification, which he was sensible would have an equal or a greater tendency to the same end. He wore sack-cloth next his skin, which, by his affected care to conceal it, was necessarily the more remarked by every one: he changed it so seldom, that it was filled with dirt and vermin: his usual diet was bread; his drink water, which he even rendered farther unpalatable by the mixture of unsavoury herbs: he tore his back with the frequent discipline which he inflicted on it: he daily on his knees washed, in imitation of Christ, the feet of thirteen beggars, whom he afterwards dismissed with presents: he gained the affections of the monks by his frequent charities to the convents and hospitals: every one who made profession of sanctity was admitted to his conversation, and returned full of panegyrics on the humility, as well as on the piety and mortification of the holy primate: he seemed to be perpetually employed in reciting prayers and pious lectures, or in perusing religious discourses: his aspect wore the appearance of seriousness, and mental recollection, and secret devotion: but all men of the least penetration saw that he was meditating some great design, and that the ambition and ostentation of his character had turned itself towards a new and more dangerous object.

Becket waited not till Henry should commence those projects against the ecclesiastical power, which he knew had been formed by that prince: he was himself the aggressor, and endeavoured to overawe the king by the intrepidity and boldness of his enterprizes. In 1163, he summoned the earl of Clare to surrender the barony of Tunbridge, which ever since the conquest had remained in the family of that nobleman; but which, as it had formerly belonged to the see of Canterbury, Becket pretended his predecessors were prohibited by the canons to alienate. The earl of Clare, besides the lustre which he derived from the greatness of his own birth, and the extent of his possessions, was allied to all the principal families in the kingdom; his sister, who was a celebrated beauty, had farther extended his credit among the nobility, and was even supposed to have gained the king's affections; and Becket could not better discover, than by attacking so powerful an interest, his resolution of maintaining with vigour the rights, real or pretended, of his see.

William de Eynsford, a military tenant of the crown, was patron of a living which belonged to a manor that held of the archbishop of Canterbury: but Becket, without regard to William's right, presented, on a new and illegal pretext, one Laurence to that living, who was violently expelled by Eynsford. The primate making himself, as was usual in spiritual courts, both judge and party, issued in a summary manner the sentence of excommunication against Eynsford, who complained to the king that he who held in capite of the crown should, contrary to the practice established by the Conqueror, and maintained ever since by his successors, be subjected to that terrible sentence, without the previous consent of the sovereign. Henry, who had now broken off all personal intercourse with Becket, sent him, by a messenger, his orders to absolve Eynsford, but received for answer, that it belonged not to the king to inform him whom he should absolve and whom excommunicate; and it was not till after many remonstrances and menaces, that Becket, though with the worst grace imaginable, was induced to comply with the royal mandate.

Henry, though he found himself thus grievously mistaken in the character of Becket, determined not to desist from his former intention of retrenching clerical usurpations. He was entirely master of his extensive dominions: the prudence and vigour of his administration, attended with perpetual success, had raised his character above that of any of his predecessors: the papacy seemed to be weakened by a schism which divided all Europe; and he rightly judged, that if the present favourable opportunity were neglected, the crown must, from the prevalent superstition of the people, be in danger of falling into an entire subordination under the mitre.

The union of the civil and ecclesiastical power serves extremely, in every civilized government, to the maintenance of peace and order; and prevents those mutual encroachments which, as there can be no ultimate judge between them, are often attended with the most dangerous consequences. Whether the supreme magistrate, who unites these powers, receive the appellation of prince or prelate, is not material: the superior weight which temporal interests commonly bear in the apprehensions of men above spiritual, renders the civil part of his character most prevalent; and in time prevents those gross impostures and bigoted persecutions, which in all false religions are the chief foundation of clerical authority. But during the progress of ecclesiastical usurpations, the state, by the resistance of the civil magistrate, is naturally thrown into convulsions; and it behoves the prince, both for his own interest, and for that of the public, to provide in time sufficient barriers against so dangerous and insidious a rival. This precaution had hitherto been much neglected in England, as well as in other catholic countries; and affairs at last seemed to have come to a dangerous crisis; crisis; a sovereign of the greatest abilities was now on the throne: a prelate of the most inflexible and intrepid character was possessed of the primacy: the contending powers appeared to be armed with their full force, and it was natural to expect some extraordinary event to result from their conflict.

Among their other inventions to obtain money, the clergy had inculcated the necessity of penance as an atonement for sin; and having again introduced the practice of paying them large sums as a commutation, or species of atonement for the remission of those penances, the sins of the people, by these means had become a revenue to the priests; and the king computed, that by this invention alone they levied more money upon his subjects than flowed, by all the funds and taxes, into the royal exchequer. That he might ease the people of so heavy and arbitrary an imposition, Henry required that a civil officer of his appointment should be present in all ecclesiastical courts, and should for the future give his consent to every composition which was made with sinners for their spiritual offences.

The ecclesiastics in that age had renounced all immediate subordination to the magistrate: they openly pretended to an exemption in criminal accusations from a trial before courts of justice; and were gradually introducing a like exemption in civil causes: spiritual penalties alone could be inflicted on their offences: and as the clergy had extremely multiplied in England, and many of them were consequently of very low characters, crimes of the deepest dye, murders, robberies, adulteries, rapes, were daily committed with impunity by the ecclesiastics. It had been found, for instance, on enquiry, that no less than a hundred murders had, since the king's accession, been perpetrated by men of that profession, who had never been called to account for these offences; and holy orders were become a full protection for all enormities. A clerk in Worcestershire, having deflowered a gentleman's daughter, had at this time proceeded to murder the father; and the general indignation against this crime moved the king to attempt the remedy of an abuse which was become so palpable, and to require that the clerk should be delivered up, and receive condign punishment from the magistrate (u). Becket insisted on the privileges of the church: confined the criminal in the bishop's prison, lest he should be seized by the king's officers; maintained that no greater punishment could be inflicted on him than degradation: and when the king demanded, that immediately after he was degraded he should be tried by the civil power, the primate asserted that it was iniquitous to try a man twice upon the same accusation, and for the same offence.

Henry, laying hold of so plausible a pretence, resolved to push the clergy with regard to all their privileges, which they had raised to an enormous height, and to determine at once those controversies which daily multiplied between the civil and the ecclesiastical jurisdictions. He summoned an assembly of all the prelates in England; and he put to them this concise and decisive question, Whether or not they were willing to submit to the ancient laws and customs of the kingdom? The bishops unanimously replied, that they were willing, "saving their own order:" a device by which they thought to elude the urgency of the king's demand, yet reserve to themselves, on a favourable opportunity, the power of resuming all their pretensions. The king was sensible of the artifice, and was extremely provoked. He left the assembly, with visible marks of displeasure: he required the primate instantly to give up the tuition of the prince royal, and to surrender the honours and castles of Eye and Berkham (v): the bishops were terrified, and expected still farther effects of his resentment. Becket alone was inflexible; and nothing but the interposition of the pope's legate and almoner, Philip, who dreaded a breach with so powerful a prince at so unseasonable a juncture, could have prevailed on him to retract the saving clause, and give a general and absolute promise of observing the ancient customs.

But Henry was not content with a declaration in such general terms: he resolved, ere it was too late, to define expressly those customs with which he required compliance, and to put a stop to clerical usurpations before they were fully consolidated, and could plead antiquity, as they already did a sacred authority, in their favour. The claims of the church were open and visible. After a gradual and insensible progress during many centuries, the mask had been taken off, and several ecclesiastical councils, by their canons, which were pretended to be irrevocable and infallible, had positively defined those privileges and immunities, which gave such general offence, and appeared so dangerous to the civil magistrate. Henry therefore deemed it necessary to define with the same precision the limits of the civil power; to oppose his legal customs to their divine ordinances; to determine the exact boundaries of the rival jurisdictions; and for this purpose he summoned a general council of the nobility and prelates at Clarendon, on the 25th of January, 1164, to whom he submitted this great and important question.

The barons were all gained to the king's party, either by the reasons which he urged, or by his superior authority: the bishops were overawed by the general combination against them; and the following laws, commonly called the "Constitutions of Clarendon," were voted without opposition by this assembly. It was enacted, that all suits concerning the advowson and presentation of churches should be determined in the civil courts: that the churches belonging to the king's see should not be granted in perpetuity without his consent: that clerks accused of any crime should be tried in the civil courts: that no person, particularly no clergyman of any rank, should depart the kingdom without the king's license: that excommunicated persons should not be bound to give security for continuing in their present place of abode: that laics should not be accused in spiritual courts, except by legal and reputable promoters and witnesses: that no chief tenant of the crown should be excommunicated, nor his lands be put under an interdict, except with the king's consent: that all appeals in spiritual causes should be carried from the archdeacon to the bishop, from the bishop to the primate, from him to the king; and should be carried no farther without the king's consent: that if any law-suit arose between a layman and a clergyman concerning a tenant, and it be disputed whether the land be a lay or an ecclesiastical fee, it should first be determined by the verdict of twelve lawful men to what class it belonged; and if it be found to be a lay-fee, the cause should finally be determined in the civil courts: that no inhabitant in demesne should be excommunicated for non-appearance in a spiritual court, till the chief officer of the place where he resides be consulted, that he may compel him by the civil authority to give satisfaction to the church: that the archbishops, bishops, and other spiritual dignitaries, should be regarded as barons of the realm; should possess the privileges, and be subjected to the burthens belonging to that rank; and should be bound to attend the king in his great councils, and assist at all trials, till the sentence, either of death or loss of members, be given against the criminal: that the revenue of vacant sees should belong to the king; the chapter, or such of them as he pleases to summon, should sit in the king's chapel till they made the new election with his consent, and that the bishop-elect should do homage to the crown: that if any baron or tenant in capite should refuse to submit to the spiritual courts, the king should employ his authority in obliging him to make such submissions; if any of them throw off his allegiance to the king, the prelates should assist the king with their censures in reducing him: that goods forfeited to the king should not be protected in churches or church-yards: that the clergy should no longer pretend to the right of enforcing payment of debts contracted by oath or promise; but should leave these lawsuits, equally with others, to the determination of the civil courts: and that the sons of villans or copy-holders should not be ordained clerks, without the consent of the lord of the manor in which they were born.

(u) By a contemporary historian the number of murders committed by clergymen, during the first nine years of Henry's reign, amounted to upwards of a hundred.

(v) These castles had been committed to the custody of Becket while he acted as chancellor, but at the time when he resigned the great seal he forgot to return these fortresses to the king: perhaps he thought the possession of these strong holds would be no hindrance to his being solely employed in the exercise of his spiritual function; while his holding the office of chancellor would be an insurmountable barrier to the performing of the duties of his metropolitan office aright. The truth seems to be, that by retaining such appendages of his former elevated station in his hands, he augmented his power and opulence, and therefore he thought there could be no harm in the retention of them.

These

These articles, to the number of sixteen, were calculated to prevent the chief abuses which had prevailed in ecclesiastical affairs, and to put an effectual stop to the usurpations of the church, which, gradually stealing on, had threatened the total destruction of the civil power. Henry, therefore, by reducing those ancient customs of the realm to writing, and by collecting them in a body, endeavoured to prevent all future dispute concerning them; and by passing so many ecclesiastical ordinances in a national and civil assembly, he fully established that superiority of the legislature above all papal decrees or spiritual canons, and gained a signal victory over the ecclesiastics. But knowing that the bishops, though overawed by the present combination of the crown and the barons, would take the first favourable opportunity of denying the authority which had enacted these constitutions, he resolved that they should all set their seal to them, and give a promise to observe them. None of the prelates opposed his will, except Becket (w), who, though urged by the earls of Cornwall and Leicester, the barons of principal authority in the kingdom, obstinately withheld his assent, and refused to sign his name. At last, Richard de Hastings, grand prior of the templars in England, threw himself on his knees before him; and with many tears entreated him, if he paid any regard either to his own safety or that of the church, not to provoke, by a fruitless opposition, the indignation of a great monarch, who was resolutely bent on his purpose, and who was determined to take full revenge on every one that should dare to oppose him. Becket, finding himself deserted by all the world, even by his own brethren, was at last obliged to comply; and he promised, "legally, with good faith, and without fraud or reserve," to observe the Constitutions; and again took an oath to that purpose. The king, thinking that he had now finally prevailed in this great enterprize, sent the Constitutions to pope Alexander, who then resided in France; and he required that pontiff's ratification of them; but Alexander, who, though he had owed the most important obligations to the king, perceived that these laws were calculated to establish the independency of England on the papacy, and of the royal power on the clergy, condemned them in the strongest terms; abrogated, annulled, and rejected them. There were only six articles, the least important, which, for the sake of peace, he was willing to ratify.

Becket, when he observed that he might hope for support in an opposition, expressed the deepest sorrow for his compliance; and endeavoured to engage all the other bishops in a confederacy to adhere to their common rights, and to the ecclesiastical privileges, in which he represented the interest and honour of God to be so deeply concerned. He redoubled his austerities, in order to punish himself for his criminal consent to the Constitutions of Clarendon: he proportioned his discipline to the enormity of his supposed offence; and refused to exercise any part of his archiepiscopal function, till he should receive absolution from the pope; which was readily granted him. Henry, informed of his present disposition, resolved to take vengeance for this refractory behaviour, and attempted to crush him, by means of that very power which Becket had been so anxious to support. He applied to the pope, requesting him to grant the commission of legate in his dominions to the archbishop of York; but Alexander, as politic as he, though he granted the commission, annexed a clause, that it should not impower the legate to execute any act in prejudice of the archbishop of Canterbury; and the king, finding how fruitless such an authority would prove, sent back the commission by the same messenger that brought it.

The primate, however, who found himself still exposed to the king's indignation, endeavoured twice to escape secretly from the kingdom; but was as often detained by contrary winds; and Henry hastened to make him feel the effects of an obstinacy, which he deemed so criminal. He instigated John, mareschal of the exchequer, to sue Becket in the archiepiscopal court for some lands, part of the manor of Pageham; and to appeal thence to the king's court for justice. On the day appointed for trying the cause, the primate sent four knights to represent certain irregularities in John's appeal; and at the same time to excuse himself, on account of sickness, for not appearing personally that day in the court. This offence was represented as a grievous contempt of court; the four knights were menaced, and with difficulty escaped being sent to prison, as offering falsehoods to the court; and Henry, being determined to prosecute Becket to the utmost, summoned at Northampton a great council, in October, 1164, which he purposed to make the instrument of his vengeance against the inflexible prelate.

The king had raised Becket from a low station to the highest offices, had honoured him with his countenance and friendship, had trusted to his assistance in forwarding his favourite project against the clergy; and when he found him suddenly become his most rigid opponent, while every one beside complied with his will, rage at the disappointment, and indignation against such signal ingratitude, transported him beyond all bounds of moderation; and the bishops themselves concurred in the sentence which was denounced against their primate. In vain did Becket urge, that his court was proceeding with the utmost regularity and justice in trying the mareschal's cause; which, however, he said, would appear from the sheriff's testimony to be entirely unjust and iniquitous: that he himself had discovered no contempt of the king's court; but, on the contrary, by sending four knights to excuse his absence, had virtually acknowledged its authority: that he also, in consequence of the king's summons, personally appeared at present in the great council, ready to justify his cause against the mareschal, and to submit his conduct to their enquiry and jurisdiction: that even should it be found that he had been guilty of non-appearance, the laws had fixed a very slight penalty to that offence; and that, as he was an inhabitant of Kent, where his archiepiscopal palace was seated, he was by law entitled to some greater indulgence than usual in the rate of his fine. These pleas, however, not being admitted, he was condemned as guilty of a contempt of the king's court, and as wanting in the fealty which he had sworn to his sovereign; and all his goods and chattels were confiscated. Henry, bishop of Winchester, the prelate who had been so powerful in the preceding reign, was obliged, by order of the court, to pronounce the sentence against him. The primate submitted to the decree; but the king agreed to take five hundred pounds of him in lieu of the confiscation; and all the prelates, except Gilbert Folliot, bishop of London, became sureties for his payment of the fine.

The king now proceeded to the adduction of other charges against him. Next day, he demanded of Becket the sum of three hundred pounds, which the primate had levied upon the honours of Eye and Berkham, while in his possession. Becket, after premising that he was not obliged to answer to this suit, because it was not contained in his summons; after remarking that he had expended more than that sum in repairs of those castles, and of the royal palace at London; expressed his resolution, that money should not be any ground of quarrel between him and his sovereign: he agreed to pay the sum; and immediately gave sureties for it. In the subsequent meeting, the king demanded the payment of five hundred marks, which he had lent Becket before his promotion to the see of Canterbury; and another sum to the same amount, for which that prince had been surety for him to a Jew of Toulouse. Immediately after these two claims, he preferred a third, of still greater importance: he required him to give in the accounts of his administration while chancellor, and to pay the balance due from the revenues of all the prelacies, abbies, and baronies, which had, during that time, been subjected to his management. Becket observed, that, as this demand was totally unexpected, he had not come prepared to answer it; but he required a delay, and promised in that case to give satisfaction. The king insisted upon sureties; and Becket desired leave to consult his suffragans in a case of such importance.

There is good ground for supposing that Becket had appropriated large sums to his own use; but the king was remiss in not calling him to an account before for his malversations. Two years had since elapsed; no demand had been made upon him; it was not till the quarrel arose concerning ecclesiastical privileges, that the claim was started, and the primate was required to produce his accounts. To find sureties, that he should answer the claim, which in the king's estimation amounted to forty-four thousand marks, was impracticable; and Becket's suffragans were at a loss what counsel to give him in such an emergency. By the advice of the bishop of Winchester he offered two thousand marks as a general satisfaction for all demands; but this offer was rejected by the king. Some prelates exhorted him to resign his see, on condition of receiving an acquittal: others were of opinion, that he ought to submit himself to the king's mercy; but the primate, thus pushed to the utmost, had too much courage to sink under the oppression:

(w) It should, however, be remarked, that this prelate had made oath that he would obey the Constitutions of Clarendon.

he determined to brave the storm, to trust to the sacredness of his character for protection, to involve his cause with that of God and religion, and to stand the utmost efforts of royal indignation.

After a few days spent in deliberation, Becket went to church, and said mass, where he had previously ordered, that the introit to the communion service should begin with these words, "Princes sat and spake against me;" the passage appointed for the martyrdom of St. Stephen, whom the primate thereby tacitly pretended to resemble in his sufferings for righteousness' sake. He went thence to court arrayed in his sacred vestments: so soon as he arrived within the palace-gate, he took the cross into his own hands, bore it aloft as his protection, and marched in that posture into the royal apartments. The king, who was in an inner room, was astonished at this parade, by which he seemed to menace him and his court with excommunication; and he sent some of the prelates to remonstrate with him on account of such audacious behaviour. These prelates complained to Becket, that, by subscribing himself to the Constitutions of Clarendon, he had seduced them to imitate his example; and that now, when it was too late, he pretended to shake off all subordination to the civil power, and appeared desirous of involving them in the guilt which must attend any violation of those laws, established by their consent, and ratified by their subscriptions. Becket replied, that he had indeed subscribed the Constitutions of Clarendon, "legally, with good faith, and without fraud or reserve;" but in these words was virtually implied a salvo for the rights of their order, which being connected with the cause of God and his church, could never be relinquished by their oaths and engagements: that if he and they had erred in resigning the ecclesiastical privileges, the best atonement they could now make was to retract their consent, which, in such a case, could never be obligatory, and to follow the pope's authority, who had solemnly annulled the Constitutions of Clarendon, and had absolved them from all oaths which they had taken to observe them: that a determined resolution was evidently embraced to oppress the church; the storm had first broken upon him; for a slight offence, and which too was falsely imputed to him, he had been tyrannically condemned to a grievous penalty; a new and unheard-of claim was since started, in which he could expect no justice; and he plainly saw that he was the destined victim, who, by his ruin, must prepare the way for the abrogation of all spiritual immunities: that he strictly inhibited them who were his suffragans from assisting at any such trial, or giving their sanction to any sentence against him; he put himself and his see under the protection of the supreme pontiff, and appealed to him against any penalty which his iniquitous judges might think proper to inflict upon him: and that, however terrible the indignation of so great a monarch as Henry, his sword could only kill the body; while that of the church, entrusted into the hands of the primate, could kill the soul, and throw the disobedient into everlasting perdition.

Appeals to the pope, even in ecclesiastical causes, had been abolished by the Constitutions of Clarendon, and were become criminal by law; but an appeal in a civil cause, such as the king's demand upon Becket, was a practice altogether new and unprecedented; it tended directly to the subversion of the government, and could receive no colour of excuse. The king might have pushed the affair to the utmost extremity against him, if he had been inclined; but he did not seem inclined to do so. Becket refused to hear the sentence, which the barons, sitting apart from the bishops, and joined to some sheriffs and barons of the second rank, had given upon the king's claim.

The earl of Leicester, one of the chief justiciaries, came to Becket from an inner room, and desired him to attend to his sentence. "My sentence!" exclaimed the archbishop; "I decline the judgement of this tribunal, as I am solely amenable, under God, to the jurisdiction of our lord the pope, to whom I now make my appeal from the sentence of those profane children who have presumed to judge their spiritual father." While the earl and his companions were returning to the king with Becket's answer, the archbishop retired from the hall; and though the sentence included an order for his immediate imprisonment, no one ventured to obstruct his retreat. He then sent a message to the king asking permission to leave the kingdom. Henry replied, that he would deliberate with his council on the propriety of acceding to his request on the following day; but the primate left Northampton that night, at which the king was not displeased; he took shipping on the 10th of November, 1164, and arrived safely at Gravelines on the same evening.

The prosecution of Becket had a tendency to turn the minds of some people on his side, and procured him countenance and protection abroad. Philip, earl of Flanders, and Louis, king of France, jealous of the rising greatness of Henry, were well pleased to give him disturbance in his government; and forgetting that this was the common cause of princes, they affected to pity extremely the condition of the exiled primate; and the latter even honoured him with a visit to Soissons, in which city he had invited him to fix his residence. The pope, whose interests were more immediately concerned in supporting him, gave a cold reception to a magnificent embassy which Henry sent to accuse him; while Becket himself, who had come to Sens in order to justify his cause before the pontiff, was received with the greatest marks of distinction. The king, in turn sequestered the revenues of Canterbury; and banished all the primate's relations and domestics, to the number of four hundred, whom he obliged to swear, before their departure, that they would instantly join their patron. But this policy, by which Henry endeavoured to reduce Becket sooner to necessity, lost its effect: the pope, when they arrived beyond sea, absolved them from their oath, and distributed them among the convents in France and Flanders: a residence was assigned to Becket himself in the convent of Pontigny, where he lived for some years in great magnificence, partly from a pension granted him on the revenues of that abbey, partly from remittances made him by the French monarch.

The more to ingratiate himself with the pope, Becket resigned into his hands the see of Canterbury, in 1165, to which, he affirmed, he had been uncanonically elected by the authority of the royal mandate; and Alexander, in his turn, besides investing him anew with that dignity, pretended to abrogate, by a bull, the sentence which the great council of England had passed against him. Henry, after attempting in vain to procure a conference with the pope, who departed soon after for Rome, whither the prosperous state of his affairs now invited him, made provisions against the consequences of that breach which impended between his kingdom and the apostolic see. He issued orders to his justiciaries, inhibiting, under severe penalties, all appeals to the pope or archbishop; forbidding any one to receive any mandates from them, or apply in any case to their authority; declaring it treasonable to bring from either of them an interdict upon the kingdom, and punishable in secular clergymen by the loss of their eyes and by castration, in regulars by amputation of their feet, and in laics with death; and menacing with sequestration and banishment the persons themselves, as well as their kindred, who should pay obedience to any such interdict: and he farther obliged all his subjects to swear to the observance of those orders. These were edicts of the utmost importace, affected the lives and properties of all the subjects, and even changed, for the time, the national religion, by breaking off all communication with Rome: yet were they enacted by the sole authority of the king, and were derived entirely from his will and pleasure.

The spiritual powers, which, in the primitive church, were, in a great measure, dependent on the civil, had by a gradual progress reached an equality and independence; and though the limits of the two jurisdictions were difficult to ascertain or define, it was not impossible, but by moderation on both sides, government might still have been conducted in that imperfect and irregular manner which attends all human institutions. But as the ignorance of the age encouraged the ecclesiastics daily to extend their privileges, and even to advance maxims totally incompatible with civil government, Henry had thought it high time to put an end to their pretensions, and formally, in a public council, to fix those powers which belonged to the magistrate, and which he was for the future determined to maintain. In this attempt he was led to re-establish customs, which, though ancient, were beginning to be abolished by a contrary practice, and which were still more strongly opposed by the prevailing opinions and sentiments of the age. Principle, therefore, stood on the one side, power on the other. Becket, in order to prejudice the king, filled all places with exclamations against the violence which he had suffered. He impiously compared himself to Christ, who had been condemned by a lay tribunal, and who was crucified anew in the present oppressions under which his church laboured: he took it for granted, as a point incontestible, that his cause was the cause of God: he assumed the character of champion for the patrimony of the Divinity: he pretended to be the spiritual father of the king and all the people of England; and he even told Henry, that kings reign solely by the authority of the church. The king, that he might employ the weapons of temporal power remaining in his hands, suspended the payment of Peter-pence; he made advances towards an alliance with the emperor, Frederic Barbarossa, who was at that time engaged in war with pope Alexander; he discovered some intentions of acknowledging Pascal III. the present antipope, who was protected by that emperor; and by these expedients he endeavoured to terrify the enterprizing pontiff from proceeding to extremities against him.

But the violence of Becket, still more than the nature of the controversy, kept affairs from remaining long in suspence between the parties. That prelate, instigated by revenge, and animated by the present glory attending his situation, pushed matters to a decision, and issued a censure, in 1166, excommunicating the king's chief ministers by name, and comprehending in general all those who favoured or obeyed the Constitutions of Clarendon: these Constitutions he abrogated and annulled; he absolved all men from the oaths which they had taken to observe them; and suspended the spiritual thunder over Henry himself.

The situation of Henry was so unhappy, that he could employ no expedient for saving his ministers from this terrible censure, but by appealing to the pope himself, and having recourse to a tribunal whose authority he had himself attempted to abridge in this very article of appeals, and which, he knew, was so deeply engaged on the side of his adversary. But even this expedient was not likely to be long effectual. Becket had obtained from the pope a legatine commission over England; and in virtue of that authority, which admitted of no appeal, he summoned the bishops of London, Salisbury, and others, to attend him, and ordered, under pain of excommunication, the ecclesiastics, sequestered on his account, to be restored in two months to all their benefices. But John of Oxford, the king's agent with the pope, had the address to procure orders for suspending this sentence; and gave the pontiff hopes of a speedy reconcilement between the king and Becket; so that two legates, William of Pavia, and Otho, were sent to Normandy, where the king then resided, and they endeavoured to find expedients for that purpose. But the pretensions of the parties were, as yet, too opposite to admit of an accommodation: the king required, that all the Constitutions of Clarendon should be ratified: Becket, that, previously to any agreement, he and his adherents should be restored to their possessions: and as the legates had no power to pronounce a definitive sentence on either side, the negociation soon after came to nothing. The cardinal of Pavia also, being much attached to Henry, took care to protract the negociation; to mitigate the pope, by the accounts which he sent of that prince's conduct; and to procure him every possible indulgence from the see of Rome. About this time the king had also the address to obtain a dispensation for the marriage of his third son Geoffrey, with the heiress of Bretagne; a concession which gave great scandal both to Becket, and to his zealous patron the king of France.

The intricacies of the feudal law had, in that age, rendered the boundaries of power between the prince and his vassals, and between one prince and another, as uncertain as those between the crown and the mitre; and all wars took their origin from disputes, which, had there been any tribunal possessed of power to enforce their decrees, ought to have been decided only before a court of judicature. Henry, in prosecution of some controversies, in which he was involved with the count of Auvergne, a vassal of the duchy of Guienne, had invaded the territories of that nobleman; who had recourse to the king of France, his superior lord, for protection, and thereby kindled a war between the two monarchs. But this war was, as usual, no less feeble in its operations, than it was frivolous in its cause and object; and after occasioning some mutual depredations, and some insurrections among the barons of Poictou and Guienne, was terminated by a peace. The terms of this peace were rather disadvantageous to Henry, and prove that that prince had, by reason of his contest with the church, lost the superiority which he had hitherto maintained over the crown of France.

The pope and the king began at last to perceive, that, in the present situation of affairs, neither of them could expect a decisive victory over the other, and that they had more to fear than to hope from the duration of the struggle. Though the vigour of Henry's government had confirmed his authority in all his dominions, his throne might be shaken by a sentence of excommunication; and if England itself could, by its situation, be more easily guarded against the contagion of superstitious prejudices, his French provinces at least, would be much exposed, on that account, to some great revolution or convulsion. He could not, therefore, imagine that the pope, while he retained such a check upon him, would formally recognize the Constitutions of Clarendon, which both put an end to papal pretensions in England, and would give an example to other states of asserting a like independency. Pope Alexander, on the other hand, being still engaged in dangerous wars with the emperor Frederic, might apprehend, that Henry, rather than relinquish claims of such importance, would join the party of his enemy; and as the trials hitherto made of the spiritual weapons by Becket, had not succeeded to his expectation, and every thing had remained quiet in all the king's dominions, nothing seemed impossible to the capacity and vigilance of so great a monarch. The disposition of minds on both sides produced frequent attempts towards an accommodation; but as both parties knew that the essential articles of the dispute could not then be terminated, they entertained a perpetual jealousy of each other, and were anxious not to lose the least advantage in the negociation. The nuncios Gratian and Vivian, having received a commission to endeavour a reconciliation, met with the king in Normandy; and after all differences seemed to be adjusted, Henry offered to sign the treaty, with a salvo to his royal dignity; which gave such umbrage to Becket, that the negociation, in the end, became fruitless, and the excommunications were renewed against the king's ministers. Another negociation was conducted at Montmirail, in presence of the king of France and the French prelates; where Becket also offered to make his submissions, with a salvo to the honour of God, and the liberties of the church; which, for a like reason, was offensive to the king, and rendered the treaty abortive. A third conference, which took place in 1169, under the same mediation, was broken off, by Becket's insisting on a like reserve in his submissions; and even in a fourth treaty, when all the terms were adjusted, and when the primate expected to be introduced to the king, and to receive the kiss of peace, Henry refused him that honour, under pretence, that, during his anger, he had made a vow to that purport. This formality served to prevent the conclusion of the treaty; and though the difficulty was attempted to be overcome by a dispensation which the pope granted to Henry from his vow, that prince could not be prevailed on to depart from the resolution he had taken.

In one of these conferences, at which the French king was present, Henry said to that monarch: "There have been many kings of England, some of greater, some of less authority than myself: there have also been many archbishops of Canterbury, holy and good men, and entitled to every kind of respect: let Becket but act towards me with the same submission which the greatest of his predecessors have paid to the least of mine, and there shall be no controversy between us." Louis was so struck with this state of the case, and with an offer which Henry made to submit his cause to the French clergy, that he condemned the primate, and withdrew his friendship from him for some time; but the bigotry of that prince, and their common animosity against Henry, soon produced a renewal of their former good correspondence.

All difficulties were at last adjusted between the parties; and the king allowed Becket to return, July 22, 1170. Becket was not required to give up any rights of the church, or resign any of those pretensions which had been the original ground of the controversy. It was agreed that all these questions should be buried in oblivion; but that Becket and his adherents should, without making farther submission, be restored to all their livings, and that even the possessors of such benefices as depended on the see of Canterbury, and had been filled during the primate's absence, should be expelled, and Becket have liberty to supply the vacancies. In return for concessions which entrenched so deeply on the honour and dignity of the crown, Henry reaped only the advantage of seeing his ministers absolved from the sentence of excommunication, and of preventing the interdict, which was ready to be laid on all his dominions. So anxious was Henry to accommodate all differences, and to reconcile himself with Becket, that he took the most extraordinary steps to flatter his vanity, and even, on one occasion, held the stirrup of that haughty prelate while he mounted his horse.

But the king attained not even that temporary tranquillity lity which he had hoped to reap from these expedients. During the heat of his quarrel with Becket, while he was every day expecting an interdict to be laid on his kingdom, and a sentence of excommunication to be fulminated against his person, he had thought it prudent to have his son, prince Henry, associated with him in the royalty, and to make him be crowned king by the hands of Roger, archbishop of York. By this precaution he both ensured the succession of that prince, which, considering the many past irregularities in that point, could not but be esteemed somewhat precarious; and he preserved at least his family on the throne, if the sentence of excommunication should have the effect which he dreaded, and should make his subjects renounce their allegiance to him. Though this design was conducted with expedition and secrecy, Becket, before it was carried into execution, had got intelligence of it; and being desirous of obstructing all Henry's measures, as well as anxious to prevent this affront to himself, who pretended to the sole right, as archbishop of Canterbury, to officiate in the coronation, he had inhibited all the prelates of England from assisting at this ceremony, had procured from the pope a mandate to the same purport, and had incited the king of France to protest against the coronation of young Henry, unless the princess, daughter of that monarch, should at the same time receive the royal unction. Henry, after apologizing to Louis for the omission with regard to Margaret, and excusing it on account of the secrecy and dispatch requisite for conducting that measure, promised that the ceremony should be renewed in the persons both of the prince and princess; and he assured Becket, that besides receiving the acknowledgements of Roger, and the other bishops, for the seeming affront put on the see of Canterbury, the primate should, as a farther satisfaction, recover his rights by officiating in this coronation. But the violent spirit of Becket, elated by the power of the church, and by the victory which he had already obtained over his sovereign, was not content with this voluntary compensation, but resolved to make the injury, which he pretended to have suffered, a handle for taking revenge on all his enemies. On his arrival in England he met the archbishop of York, and the bishops of London and Salisbury, who were on their journey to the king in Normandy: he notified to the archbishop the sentence of suspension, and to the two bishops that of excommunication, which at his solicitation the pope had pronounced against them. Reginald de Warrenne, and Gervase de Cornhill, two of the king's ministers who were employed on their duty in Kent, asked him, on hearing of this bold attempt, whether he meant to bring fire and sword into the kingdom? but the primate, heedless of the reproof, proceeded, in the most ostentatious manner, to take possession of his diocese. In Rochester, and all the towns through which he passed, he was received with the shouts and acclamations of the populace. As he approached Southwark, the clergy, the laity, men of all ranks and ages, came forth to meet him, and celebrated with hymns of joy his triumphant entrance. And though he was obliged, by order of the young prince, who resided at Woodstock, to return to his diocese, he found that he was not mistaken when he reckoned upon the highest veneration of the public towards his person and dignity. He proceeded, therefore, with the more courage to dart his spiritual thunders: he issued the sentence of excommunication against Robert de Broc, and Nigel de Sackville, with many others, who either had assisted at the coronation of the prince, or been active in the late persecution of the exiled clergy. This violent measure, by which he in effect denounced war against the king himself, is ascribed to the vindictive disposition and imperious character of Becket.

Though Henry dropped, for the present, the prosecution of Becket, he still reserved to himself the right of maintaining, that the Constitutions of Clarendon, the original ground of the quarrel, were both the ancient customs and the present law of the realm: and though he knew that the papal clergy asserted them to be impious in themselves, as well as abrogated by the sentence of the pope, he intended, in spite of their clamours, steadily to put those laws in execution, and to trust to his own abilities, and to the course of events, for success in that perilous enterprize. He hoped that Becket's experience of a six years' exile would, after his pride was fully gratified by his restoration, be sufficient to teach him more reserve in his opposition; or if any controversy arose, he expected thenceforth to engage in a more favourable cause, and to maintain with advantage, while the primate was now in his power, the ancient and undoubted customs of the kingdom against the usurpations of the clergy. But Becket determined not to betray the ecclesiastical privileges by his connivance, and apprehensive lest a prince of such profound policy, if allowed to proceed in his own way, might probably in the end prevail, resolved to take all the advantage which his present victory gave him, and to disconcert the cautious measures of the king, by the vehemence and rigour of his own conduct. Assured of support from Rome, he was little intimidated by dangers, which his courage taught him to despise, and which, even if attended with the most fatal consequences, would serve only to gratify his ambition and thirst of glory.

When the suspended and excommunicated prelates arrived at Baieux in Normandy, where the king then resided, and complained to him of the violent proceedings of Becket, he instantly perceived the consequences; was sensible that his whole plan of operations was overthrown; foresaw that the dangerous contest between the civil and spiritual powers, a contest which he himself had first roused, but which he had endeavoured, by all his late negociations and concessions, to appease, must come to an immediate and decisive issue; and he was thence thrown into commotion. The archbishop of York remarked to him, that so long as Becket lived, he could never expect to enjoy peace or tranquillity: the king himself, being vehemently agitated, burst forth into an exclamation against his servants, whose want of zeal, he said, had so long left him exposed to the enterprizes of that ungrateful and imperious prelate. Four gentlemen of his household, Reginald Fitz-Urse, William de Tracey, Hugh de Moreville, and Richard Brito, taking these passionate expressions to be a hint for Becket's death, immediately communicated their thoughts to each other; and swearing to avenge their prince's quarrel, secretly withdrew from court. Some menacing expressions which they had dropped, gave a suspicion of their design; and the king dispatched a messenger after them, charging them to attempt nothing against the person of the primate: but these orders arrived too late to prevent their fatal purpose. The four assassins, though they took different roads to England, arrived nearly about the same time at Saltwoode, near Canterbury; and being there joined by some assistants, they proceeded in great haste to the archiepiscopal palace. They found the primate, who trusted entirely to the sacredness of his character, very slenderly attended; and though they threw out many menaces and reproaches against him, he was so incapable of fear, that, without using any precautions against their violence, he immediately went to St. Benedict's church to hear vespers. They followed him thither, on the 29th of December, attacked him before the altar, and having cloven his head with many blows, retired without opposition (x).

Though the murder of Thomas à Becket was attended with every aggravating circumstance that could operate on the weak minds of the people, yet no tumult ensued in any part of the kingdom; not a single attempt was made to

(x) This was the tragical end of Thomas à Becket, a prelate of the most lofty, intrepid, and inflexible spirit, who was able to cover to the world, and probably to himself, the enterprizes of pride and ambition, under the disguise of sanctity, and of zeal for the interests of religion. That he was a man of extensive abilities there can be no doubt, since the concurring accounts of all ancient historians tend to confirm the fact: but the actions of his life most certainly afford not the smallest proof of superior wisdom. If we believe that, during his enjoyment of the high office of chancellor, his ostentatious display of extraordinary pomp and magnificence, and his avowed fondness for scenes of dissipation, were wholly affected, and that he had adopted a regular system of hypocrisy, in order to attain that elevated station to which he was afterwards promoted, we must indeed allow him to have been possessed of acute penetration and consummate art: but if from thence we are induced to admit (as some authors have) the sincerity of his conduct as primate; to believe that he was truly of opinion that the cause of religion could be promoted by the encouragement of clerical usurpations, the protection of ecclesiastical culprits, a contempt for the laws of the realm, a violation of solemn oaths, and an attempt to excite a rebellion: if we are led to believe that Becket could really entertain such sentiments, notwithstanding the prevalent spirit of superstition, we must strenuously maintain that his talents were marked with the strongest trait of imbecility. On the other hand, if we transfer his hypocrisy from the Chancellor to the Primate—for the suspicion to which every transition, that is sudden and violent, is justly liable, renders it impossible to exempt him from the charge of dissimulation—we are equally at a loss to discover any vestige of his wisdom. In either case, we find that Thomas à Becket was destitute of the grand requisite in every minister, but more especially in the chief minister of religion—virtue. He was, however, possessed of those inferior qualities which too frequently cause the want of it to be overlooked. His personal to inflict vengeance on the assassins, or even to bring them to justice. They passed the night in the neighbourhood of Canterbury, wholly free from molestation; from whence they soon after departed, without endeavouring to see the young king or any of his ministers, or daring to return to the continent to Henry. They retired to the castle of Knaresborough in Yorkshire, which belonged to Hugh de Moreville, where they remained several months in solitude; but, being at length commanded by the king to submit to the judgement of the pope, they repaired to Rome, from whence they were ordered to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

On the first report of Becket's violent measures, Henry had purposed to have him arrested, and had already taken some steps towards the execution of that design; but the intelligence of his murder threw him into great consternation; and he was immediately sensible of the dangerous consequences likely to result from so unexpected an event. An archbishop of reputed sanctity assassinated before the altar, in the exercise of his functions, and on account of his zeal in maintaining ecclesiastical privileges, must attain the highest honours of martyrdom; while his murderer would be ranked among the most bloody tyrants that ever were exposed to the hatred and detestation of mankind. Interdicts and excommunications, weapons in themselves so terrible, would, he foresaw, be armed with double force, when employed in a cause so much calculated to work on the human passions, and so peculiarly adapted to the eloquence of popular preachers and declaimers. In vain would he plead his own innocence, and even his ignorance of the fact: he was sufficiently guilty, if the church thought proper to esteem him such; and his concurrence in Becket's martyrdom, becoming a religious opinion, would be received with that implicit credit which belonged to the most established articles of faith. These considerations gave the king great concern; and as it was his interest to clear himself from all suspicion, he took no care to conceal the depth of his affliction. He shut himself up from the light of day, and from all commerce with his servants; he even refused, during three days, all food and sustenance: the courtiers, apprehending dangerous effects from his despair, at last broke in upon his solitude; and they employed every topic of consolation, induced him to accept of nourishment, and occupied his leisure in taking precautions against the consequences which he so justly apprehended from the murder of the primate.

The point of chief importance to Henry was to convince the pope of his innocence; or rather, to persuade him that he would reap greater advantages from the submissions of England, than from proceeding to extremities against that kingdom. The archbishop of Roüen, the bishops of Worcester and Evreux, with five persons of inferior quality, were sent to Rome, in 1171, and orders were given them to perform their journey with the utmost expedition. Though the name and authority of the court of Rome were so terrible in the remote countries of Europe, which were sunk in profound ignorance, and were entirely unacquainted with its character and conduct; the pope was so little revered at home, that his enemies surrounded the gates of Rome itself, and even controlled his government in that city; and the ambassadors who, from a distant extremity of Europe, carried to him the abject submissions of the greatest potentate of the age, found the utmost difficulty to make their way to him, and to throw themselves at his feet. It was at length agreed that Richard Barre, one of their number, should leave the rest behind, and run all the hazards of the passage, in order to prevent the fatal consequences which might ensue from any delay in giving satisfaction to his holiness. He found, on his arrival, that Alexander was already wrought up to the greatest rage against the king, that Becket's partizans were daily stimulating him to revenge, that the king of France had exhorted him to fulminate the most dreadful sentence against England, and that the very mention of Henry's name before the sacred college was received with every expression of horror and execration. The Thursday before Easter was now approaching, when it is customary for the pope to denounce annual curses against all his enemies; and it was expected that Henry should, with all the preparations peculiar to the discharge of that sacred artillery, be solemnly comprehended in the number. But Barre found means to appease the pontiff, and to deter him from a measure which, if it failed of success, could not afterwards be easily recalled: the anathemas were only levelled in general against all the actors, accomplices, and abettors of Becket's murder. The abbot of Valasse, and the archdeacons of Salisbury and Lisieux, with others of Henry's ministers, who soon after arrived, besides asserting their prince's innocence, made oath before the whole consistory, that he would stand to the pope's judgement in the affair, and make every submission that should be required of him. The terrible blow was sonal accomplishments were great: he was deeply skilled, like most of the dignified clergy of that age, in all the insidious arts of sophistry; which, being decorated with the specious embellishments of erudition, wore the appearance, and had too often the effect, of solid argument. He was endued with a considerable portion of native cunning; his spirit was lofty and imperious; his courage no dangers could daunt; his designs, though seldom adopted with prudence, were, from his inflexible perseverance in their prosecution, sometimes crowned with that success which should be the sole reward of wisdom and integrity. His favourite schemes were of a most pernicious tendency, being calculated to emancipate the ministers of religion from the necessary restraints of law, and to subject his king and country to the domination of a foreign power. His vanity was excessive; he was obstinate and implacable, equally unmoved by the entreaties of his friends, or the threats of his enemies. His conduct was invariably marked by a spirit of violence, revenge, and ambition, strangely derogatory to his sacred character, as it evinced a more anxious solicitude in the pursuit of terrestrial objects than in the attainment of religious consolation. Among the numerous vices of this extraordinary man, his signal ingratitude to his royal benefactor holds a conspicuous place, and has fixed an indelible stain upon that character which, stripped of the vain garb in which the weak sons of superstition have arrayed it, is now exposed to posterity in its native colours, and discovers the sinner in the saint.

So strangely superstitious were the people of this age, that, some time after the death of Thomas à Becket, the world began to ring with the noise of his miracles; insomuch that Petrus Blesensis asserted, that England need not envy the Indies; they had their Thomas the Apostle, we have Thomas the Martyr. The following, selected from a number of miracles said to have been wrought by Thomas à Becket, serve to shew how easily the people of this realm were deceived by the machinations of the designing monks:

The English legend in the life of Thomas à Becket relates, that when he was at Rome, on a particular fast day, a fowl being provided for his dinner, because no fish could be bought, the capon was miraculously turned into a carp, rather than the holy man should break the orders of the church.

Polydore Virgil, lib. 13. tells a remarkable story of God's miraculously vindicating Thomas against his enemies. His words are, "Thomas being accounted the king's enemy, began to be so contemned and hated by the common people, that coming to a town called Stroud, (near Rochester) the inhabitants of that place, intending to put an affront upon this good despised father, cut off the horse's tail which he rode upon: but hereby they brought a perpetual reproach upon themselves; for afterwards, by the pleasure of God, it happened, that all the race of those men, who were concerned in this transaction, were born with tails like brute beasts, (whence comes the proverb of Kentish long tails.) But this note of infamy is long since worn off, together with that generation of men that so sinned." This latter clause was well inserted, because it might save people the trouble of looking for men with tails.

A great number of miracles were said to have been wrought by St. Thomas after his death; but as it is not our intention to dwell upon such ridiculous accounts, we shall just briefly mention a few, by which the wickedness of the designing monks may appear. They inform us, that as soon as Thomas was slain, the gates were shut, and the bells rang of themselves.—Before he was buried, as he lay in the choir upon a bier, in the morning, lifting up his right hand, he pronounced a benediction on the monks.—They also acquaint us, that the water of an adjoining well, by the influence of St. Thomas appeared bloody, and that it changed colour several times. In the Salisbury Breviary it is said,

> Aqua Thomæ quinquies varians colorem,
> In lac semel transiit, quater in cruorem;
> Ad Thomæ memoriam quater lux descendit,
> Et in sancti gloriam cereos accendit.

That is,

> Five times his water changed colour quite,
> Four times blood-red, and once not milk more white;
> And that St. Thomas' fame might never dwindle, > Four times did light descend, and torches kindle.

—A bird that was taught to speak, being seized on by a sparrow hawk, called upon St. Thomas for help, and the sparrow hawk fell down dead. St. Thomas likewise had the reputation, after his death, of restoring eyes to the blind, and the parts of virility to those who had been deprived of them through the sentence of the law for some misdemeanour. A felon having been condemned to have his eyes put out, and to undergo castration, had the sentence executed upon him, and was in danger of death by loss of blood; he put his trust in God, our Lady, and holy St. Thomas, and the next day rubbing his eyes, he received his sight again, and a little after, rubbing the other place, what he had been deprived of were also restored, and he became a perfect man. We forbear to comment on these absurdities, and shall only observe, that they were attested with more impudence by the villainous monks of that age, than any which ever disgraced the legends of the most credulous confessor. Gervase of Canterbury says, that when he wrote, two volumes of his miracles were to be seen in Christ Church, Canterbury, equal to any which we read of in the Gospel. His body was removed to a sumptuous shrine, enriched with splendid gifts from all parts of Christendom. Pilgrimages were performed to obtain his intercession with Heaven, and it was computed that, in one year, above a hundred thousand pilgrims arrived at Canterbury, and paid their devotions at his tomb. Among these was Louis, king of France; who, according to Mezeray, left "rich marks of his piety" behind him.

thus eluded; the cardinals Albert and Theodin were appointed legates to examine the cause, and were ordered to proceed to Normandy for that purpose; and though Henry's foreign dominions were already laid under an interdict by the archbishop of Sens, Becket's great partizan, and the pope's legate in France, the general expectation, that the monarch would easily exculpate himself from any concurrence in the guilt, kept every one in suspense, and prevented the bad consequences which might be dreaded from that sentence.

The clergy, meanwhile, though their rage was diverted from falling on the king, were not idle in magnifying the sanctity of Becket; in extolling the merits of his martyrdom; and in exalting him above all that devoted tribe who in several ages had, by their blood, cemented the fabric of the temple. Other saints had only borne testimony by their sufferings to the general doctrines of christianity; but Becket had sacrificed his life to the power and privileges of the clergy; and this peculiar merit challenged, and not in vain, a suitable acknowledgement to his memory. Endless were the panegyrics on his virtues; and two years after his death he was canonized by pope Alexander; a solemn jubilee was established for annually celebrating his merits.

It may not be amiss to remark, before we conclude the subject of Thomas à Becket, that the king, during his controversy with that prelate, was on every occasion more anxious than usual to express his zeal for religion, and to avoid all appearance of negligence on that head. He gave his consent to the imposing of a tax on all his dominions for the delivery of the Holy Land, now threatened by Saladin: this tax amounted to two-pence a pound for one year, and a penny a pound for the four subsequent. Almost all the princes of Europe laid a like imposition on their subjects, which received the name of Saladin's tax.

As soon as Henry found that he was in no immediate danger from the thunders of the Vatican, he undertook an expedition against Ireland; a design which he had long projected, and by which he hoped to recover his credit, which was somewhat impaired by his late transaction with the hierarchy. But before we proceed to give an account of his expedition against that country, it will not be improper to lay before the reader a precinct narrative of the state of that island.

As Britain was first peopled from Gaul, so was Ireland (y) probably from Britain; and the inhabitants of all these countries seem to have been so many tribes of the Celtæ, who derive their origin from an antiquity that lies far beyond the records of any history or tradition. The Irish from the beginning of time had been buried in the most profound barbarism and ignorance; and as they were never conquered, or even invaded by the Romans, from whom all the western world derived its civility, they continued still in the most rude state of society, and were distinguished by those vices alone to which human nature, not tamed by education, or restrained by laws, is always subject. The small principalities into which they were divided, exercised perpetual rapine and violence against each other; the uncertain succession of their princes was a continual source of domestic convulsions; the usual title of each petty sovereign was the murderer of his predecessor; courage and force, though exercised in the commission of crimes, were more honoured than pacific virtues; and the most simple arts of life, even tillage and agriculture, were almost wholly unknown among them. They had felt the invasions of the Danes and the other northern tribes; but these inroads, which had spread barbarism in other parts of Europe, rather tended to improve the Irish; and the only towns which were to be found in the island, had been planted along the coast by the freebooters of Norway and Denmark. The other inhabitants exercised pasturage in the open country; sought protection from danger in their forests and morasses; and being divided by the fiercest animosities against each other, were still more intent on the means of mutual injury, than on the expedients for common or private interest.

Besides many small tribes, there were in the age of Henry II. five principal sovereignties in the island, Munster, Leinster, Meath, Ulster, and Connaught; and as it had been usual for the one or the other of these to take the lead in their wars, there was commonly some prince, who seemed, for the time, to act as monarch of Ireland. Roderic O'Connor, king of Connaught, was then advanced to this dignity; but his government, ill obeyed, even within his own territory, could not unite the people in any measure, either for the establishment of order, or for defence against foreigners. The ambition of Henry had, very early in his reign, been moved by the prospect of these advantages, to attempt the subjection of Ireland; and a pretence was only wanting to invade a people who, being always confined to their own island, had never given any reason of complaint to their neighbours. For this purpose, he had recourse to Rome, which assumed a right to dispose of kingdoms and empires; and not foreseeing the dangerous disputes, which he was one day to maintain with that see, he helped, for present, or rather for an imaginary convenience, to give sanction to claims which were now become dangerous to all sovereigns. Adrian IV. who then filled the papal chair, was by birth an Englishman; and being on that account the more disposed to oblige Henry, he was easily persuaded to act as master of the world, and to make, without any hazard or expence, the acquisition of a great island to his spiritual jurisdiction. The Irish had, by former missions from the Britons, been imperfectly converted to christianity; and, what the pope regarded as the surest mark of their imperfect conversion, they followed the doctrines of their first teachers, and had never acknowledged any subjection to the see of Rome. Adrian, therefore, in 1156, issued a bull in favour of Henry: in which, after premising that this prince had ever shewn an anxious care to enlarge the church of God on earth, and to increase the number of his saints and elect in heaven; he represents his design of subduing Ireland as derived from the same pious motives: he considers his care of previously applying for the apostolic function as a sure earnest of success and victory; and having established it as a point incontestible, that all Christian kingdoms belong to the patrimony of St. Peter, he acknowledges it to be his own duty to sow among them the seeds of the gospel, which might in the last day fructify to their eternal salvation: he exhorts the king to invade Ireland, in order to extirpate the vice and wickedness of the natives, and oblige them to pay yearly from every house, a penny to the see of Rome: he gives him entire right and authority over the island, commands all the inhabitants to obey him as their sovereign, and invests with full power all such godly instruments as he should think proper to employ in an enterprize thus calculated for the glory of God and the salvation of the souls of men. Henry, though armed with this authority, did not immediately put his design in execution; but being detained by more interesting business on the continent, waited for a favourable opportunity of invading Ireland.

Dermot Macmorrogh, king of Leinster, had, by his licentious tyranny, rendered himself odious to his subjects, who seized with alacrity the first occasion that offered of throwing off the yoke, which was become grievous and oppressive to them. This prince had formed a design on Dovergilda, wife of Oric, prince of Breffny; and taking advantage of her husband's absence, who, being obliged to visit a distant part of his territory, had left his wife secure, as he thought, in an island surrounded by a bog; he suddenly invaded the place and carried off the princess. This exploit, though usual among the Irish, and rather deemed a proof of gallantry and spirit, provoked the resentment of the husband; who, having collected forces, and being strengthened by the alliance of Roderic, king of Connaught, invaded the dominions of Dermot, and expelled him his kingdom. The exiled prince had recourse to Henry in 1168, who was at this time in Guienne, craved his assistance in restoring him to his sovereignty, and offered, on that event, to hold his kingdom in vassalage under the crown of England. Henry, whose views were already turned towards making acquisitions in Ireland, readily accepted the offer; but being at that time embarrassed by the rebellions of his French subjects, as well as by his disputes with the see of Rome, he declined for the present embarking in the enterprize, and gave Dermot no farther assistance than letters patent, by which he empowered all his subjects to aid the Irish prince in the recovery of his dominions. Dermot, supported by this authority, came to Bristol; and after endeavouring, though for some time in vain, to engage adventurers in his cause, he at last formed a treaty with Richard, surnamed Strongbow, earl of Strigul, or Pembroke. This nobleman, who was of the illustrious house of Clare, had impaired his fortune by expensive pleasures; and being ready for any desperate undertaking, he promised assistance to Dermot, on condition that he should espouse Eva, daughter of that prince, and be declared heir to all his dominions. While Richard was assembling his succours, Dermot went into Wales; and meeting with Robert Fitz-Stephens, constable of Abertivi, and Maurice Fitz-Gerald, he also engaged them in his service, and obtained their promise of invading Ireland. Being now assured of succour, he returned privately to his own state; and lurking in the monastery of Fernes, which he had founded (for this ruffian was also a founder of monasteries), he prepared every thing for the reception of his English allies.

(y) The name by which Ireland was formerly distinguished by the natives themselves was Erin; from whence are evidently derived Jerna, Juverna, Jouernia, Ouernia, Bernia, and several other appellations bestowed on it by ancient writers. The early Britons called it Yverdon; the Romans, Hibernia; and the Saxons Iren-land, or the Country of Iren, or Erin. The etymology of the word Erin has not been strictly ascertained; but the conjecture of Camden, who derives it from an Irish word that signifies West, is the most consistent with probability, as Ireland is the most western island of Europe.

The troops of Fitz-Stephens being first ready, he landed in Ireland with thirty knights, sixty esquires, and three hundred archers, in the spring of 1169; but this small body, who were brave men, not unacquainted with discipline, and completely armed, a thing almost unknown in Ireland, struck a great terror into the barbarous inhabitants, and seemed to menace them with some signal revolution. The conjunction of Maurice de Prendergast, who, about the same time, carried over ten knights and sixty archers, enabled Fitz-Stephens to attempt the siege of Wexford, a town inhabited by the Danes; and after gaining an advantage, he made himself master of the place. Fitz-Gerald arrived soon after, with ten knights, thirty esquires, and a hundred archers; and being joined by the former adventurers, Dermot found himself at the head of a force which nothing in Ireland was able to withstand. Roderic, the chief monarch of the island, was foiled in different actions; the prince of Ossory was compelled to submit, and give hostages for his peaceable demeanour; and Dermot, not content with being restored to his kingeom of Leinster, projected the deposition of Roderic, and aspired to the sole dominion of the island.

In prosecution of these views, he sent a messenger to the earl of Strigul, challenging the performance of his promise, and displaying the advantages which might now be reaped by a reinforcement of warlike troops from England. Richard, not satisfied with the general allowance given by Henry to all his subjects, went to that prince, then in Normandy; and having obtained a cold or ambiguous permission, prepared himself for the execution of his design. He first sent over Raymond, one of his retinue, with ten knights and seventy archers, who, landing near Waterford, defeated a body of three thousand Irish that had ventured to attack him; and as Richard (z) himself, who brought over two hundred horse, and a body of archers, joined, a few days after, the victorious English, they made themselves masters of Waterford, and proceeded to Dublin, which was taken by assault. Roderic, in revenge, cut off the head of Dermot's natural son, who had been left as a hostage in his hands; and Richard, marrying Eva, became soon after, by the death of Dermot (a), sovereign of the kingdom of Leinster, and prepared, in pursuance of his father-in-law's maxims, to extend his authority over all Ireland. Roderic, and the other Irish princes, were alarmed at the danger; and combining their forces, besieged Dublin with an army of thirty thousand men: but earl Richard, making a sudden sally at the head of ninety knights, with their followers, put this numerous army to rout, chased them off the field, and pursued them with great slaughter. None in Ireland now dared to oppose themselves to the English.

Henry, jealous of the progress made by his own subjects, sent orders to recall all the English, and he made preparations to attack Ireland in person: but Richard, and the other adventurers, found means to appease him, by making him the most humble submissions, and offering to hold their acquisitions in vassalage to his crown. That monarch embarked his army at Milford Haven, on board a fleet of four hundred and forty transports; and, sailing from thence with a fair wind, landed, on the 26th of October, near the town of Waterford, at the head of five hundred knights, besides other soldiers: he found the Irish so dispirited by their late misfortunes, that, in a progress which he made through the island, he had no other occupation than to receive the homage of his new subjects. He left most of the Irish chieftains or princes in possession of their ancient territories; bestowed some lands on the English adventurers, and gave earl Richard the commission of seneschal of Ireland. By these trivial exploits, scarcely worth relating, except for the importance of the consequences, was Ireland subdued, and annexed to the English crown.

From Waterford he advanced with his army to Dublin, which city he entered on the 21st of November, without having heard the smallest tidings of an enemy. In this metropolis of his newly acquired kingdom he celebrated the festival of Christmas, in a temporary palace, composed of wood, that was erected for the purpose: and here he was visited by many of the tributary chieftains, who could not refrain from bursting into exclamations of surprize at the sight of such abundance and variety of provisions which they beheld. During his residence at Dublin, where he passed the first months of the year 1172, he took some pains to regulate the affairs of his new dominions, and to establish a kind of police by the introduction of the English laws and customs. The Irish clergy, in the acts of a council held at Cashel on the 25th of March this year, confessed their obligations to him in the most grateful terms; acknowledging that, previous to his arrival in Ireland, many evil customs had obtained, the abolition of which had been effected by his wisdom and authority. In order to render his conquest more secure, he put garrisons into all the places of importance which he had in his possession, and appointed Hugh Lacy, a nobleman whose courage, wisdom, and fidelity, he had frequently experienced, governor of Dublin and chief justiciary of the kingdom.

The low state of commerce and industry during those ages made it impracticable for princes to support regular armies, which might retain a conquered country in subjection; and the extreme barbarism and poverty of Ireland, could still less afford means of bearing the expence. The only expedient, by which a conquest could then be maintained, was by pouring in a multitude of new inhabitants, dividing among them the lands of the vanquished, establishing them in all offices of trust and authority, and thereby transforming the ancient inhabitants into a new people. By this policy, the northern invaders of old, and of late the duke of Normandy, had been able to fix their dominion, and to erect kingdoms, which remained stable on their foundations, and were transmitted to the posterity of the first conquerors. But the state of Ireland rendered it so little inviting to the English, that only a few of desperate fortunes could be persuaded, from time to time, to transport themselves to that island; and instead of reclaiming the natives from their uncultivated manners, they were gradually assimilated to the ancient inhabitants, and degenerated from the customs of their own nation. It was also found requisite to bestow great military and arbitrary powers on their leaders, who commanded a handful of men amidst such hostile multitudes; and in a little time, law and equity became as much unknown in the English settlements, as they had ever been among the Irish tribes. Palatinates were erected in favour of the new adventurers, who were allowed to enjoy an independent authority. The natives, never fully subdued, still retained their animosity against the conquerors: their hatred was retaliated by like injuries; and from these causes, the Irish, during the course of four centuries, remained still savage and untractable: it was not till the latter end of Elizabeth's reign, that the island was fully subdued; nor till that of her successor, James, that it gave hopes of becoming a useful conquest to the English.

Besides that the easy and peaceable submission of the Irish left Henry no farther occupation in that island, he was recalled from it by another incident, which was of the highest importance to his interest and safety. The two legates, Albert and Theodwin, to whom was committed the trial of his conduct in the murder of archbishop Becket, were arrived in Normandy; and being impatient of delay, sent him frequent letters, full of menaces, if he protracted any longer making his appearance before them. He embarked at Wexford on Easter Monday, and in the evening of the same day landed at Pontfinnan, in South Wales; from whence he proceeded to Portsmouth, and embarked for Barfleur, in Normandy, where he arrived on the 9th of May. He had a conference with the pope's legate at Savigné, but their demands were so exorbitant, that he broke off the negociation, threatened to return to Ireland, and bade them do their worst against him. They perceived that the season was now past for taking advantage of that tragical incident; which, had it been pursued by interdicts and excommunications, was capable of throwing the whole kingdom into combustion. But the time which Henry had gained, had contributed to appease the minds of men: the event could not now have the same influence as when it was recent; and as the clergy every day looked for an accommodation with the king, they had not opposed the pretensions of his partizans, who had been very industrious in representing to the people his entire innocence in the murder of the primate, and his ignorance of the designs formed by the assassins. The legates, therefore, found themselves obliged to lower their terms; and Henry concluded an accommodation with them at Avranches, on the 27th of September. He declared upon oath, before the reliques of the saints, that, so far from commanding or desiring the death of the archbishop, he was extremely grieved when he received intelligence of it: but as the displeasure which he had expressed on account of that prelate's conduct, had probably been the occasion of his murder, he stipulated the following conditions as an atonement for the offence: he promised, that he should pardon all such as had been banished for adhering to Becket, and should restore them to their livings; that the see of Canterbury should be reinstated in all its ancient possessions; that he should pay the templars a sum of money sufficient for the subsistence of two hundred knights during a year in the Holy Land; that he should himself take the cross at the Christmas following, and, if the pope required it, serve three years against the infidels, either in Spain or Palestine; that he should not insist on the observance of such customs, derogatory to ecclesiastical privileges, as had been introduced in his own time; and that he should not obstruct appeals to the pope in ecclesiastical causes, but should content himself with exacting sufficient security from such clergymen as left his dominions to prosecute an appeal, that they should attempt nothing against the rights of his crown. Upon signing these concessions, Henry received absolution from the legates, and was confirmed in the grant of Ireland made by pope Adrian; and nothing proves more strongly the great abilities of this monarch, than his extricating himself, on such easy terms, from so difficult a situation. He had always insisted, that the laws established at Clarendon contained not any new claims, but the ancient customs of the kingdom; and he was still at liberty, notwithstanding the articles of this agreement, to maintain his pretensions. Appeals to the pope were indeed permitted by that treaty; but as the king was also permitted to exact reasonable securities from the parties, and might stretch his demands on this head as far as he pleased, he had it virtually in his power to prevent the pope from reaping any advantage by this seeming concession. And on the whole, the Constitutions of Clarendon remained still the law of the realm; though the pope and his legates seem so little to have conceived the king's power to lie under any legal limitations, that they were satisfied with his departing, by treaty, from one of the most momentous articles of these constitutions, without requiring any repeal by the states of the kingdom.

Henry, freed from this dangerous controversy with the ecclesiastics, and with the see of Rome, seemed now to have reached the pinnacle of human grandeur and felicity, and to be equally happy in his domestic situation and in his political government. A numerous progeny of sons and daughters gave both lustre and authority to his crown, prevented the dangers of a disputed succession, and repressed all pretensions of the ambitious barons. The king's precaution also, in establishing the several branches of his family, seemed well calculated to prevent all jealousy among the brothers, and to perpetuate the greatness of his family. He had appointed Henry his eldest son, to be his successor in the kingdom of England, the duchy of Normandy, and the counties of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine; territories which lay contiguous, and which, by that means, might easily lend to each other mutual assistance both against intestine commotions and foreign invasions. Richard, his second son, was invested in the duchy of Guienne, and county of Poictou; Geoffrey, his third son, inherited, in right of his wife, the duchy of Bretagne; and the new conquest of Ireland was destined for the appanage of John, his fourth son. He had also negociated in favour of this last prince, a marriage with Adelais, the only daughter of Humbert, count of Savoy and Maurienne; and was to receive as her dowry considerable demesnes in Piedmont, Savoy, Bresse, and Dauphine. But this exaltation of his family excited the jealousy of all his neighbours, who made those very sons, whose fortunes he had so anxiously established, the means of disturbing his government, and of embittering his future life.

Young Henry, who was now in his sixteenth year, and rising to man's estate, began to display his character, and aspire to independence: brave, ambitious, liberal, munificent, affable; he discovered qualities which gave great lustre to youth; prognosticate a shining fortune; but unless tempered in mature age with discretion, are the forerunners of the greatest calamities. It is said, that at the time when this prince received the royal unction, his father, in order to give greater dignity to the ceremony, officiated at table as one of the retinue; and observed to his son, that never king was more royally served. "It is nothing extraordinary," said young Henry to one of his courtiers, "if the son of a count should serve the son of a king." This saying, which might pass only for an innocent pleasure, or even for an oblique compliment to his father, was however regarded as a symptom of his aspiring temper; and his conduct soon after justified the conjecture.

Henry, agreeably to the promise which he had given both to the pope and French king, permitted his son to be crowned anew, in 1173, by the hands of the archbishop of Roüen, and associated the princess Margaret, spouse to young Henry, in the ceremony (b). He afterwards allowed him to pay a visit to his father-in-law at Paris, who took the opportunity of instilling into the young prince those ambitious sentiments to which he was naturally but too much inclined. Though it had been the constant practice of France, ever since the accession of the race of Capet, to crown the son during the life-time of the father, without conferring on him any present participation of royalty; Louis persuaded his son-in-law, that, by this ceremony, which in those ages was deemed so important, he had acquired a title to sovereignty, and that the king could not, without injustice, exclude him from immediate possession of the whole, or at least a part, of his dominions. In consequence of these extravagant ideas, young Henry, on his return, desired the king to resign to him either the crown of England, or the duchy of Normandy, together with the territories of Anjou and Maine; discovered great discontent on the refusal; spake in the most undutiful terms of his father; and soon after, in concert with Louis, made his escape to Paris, where he was protected and supported by that monarch.

While Henry was alarmed at this incident, and had the prospect of dangerous intrigues, or even of a war, which, whether successful or not, must be extremely calamitous and disagreeable to him, he received intelligence of new misfortunes, which affected him in the most sensible manner. Queen Eleanor, who had disgusted her first husband by her gallantries, was no less offensive to her second by her jealousy; and after this manner carried to extremity in the different periods of her life, every circumstance of female weakness. She communicated her discontents against Henry to her two younger sons, Geoffrey and Richard, persuaded them that they were also entitled to present possession of the territories assigned them; engaged them to fly secretly to the court of France; and was meditating, herself, an escape to the same court, and had even put on man's apparel for that purpose; when she was seized by orders from her husband, and thrown into confinement. Thus Europe saw with astonishment the best and most indulgent of parents at war with his whole family; three boys, scarcely arrived at the age of puberty, require a great monarch, in the full vigour of his age, and height of his reputation, to dethrone himself in their favour; and several princes not ashamed to support them in these unnatural and absurd pretensions.

Henry, reduced to this disagreeable situation, had recourse to the court of Rome. Though sensible of the danger attending the interposition of ecclesiastical authority in temporal disputes, he applied to the pope, as his superior lord, to excommunicate his enemies, and by these censures to reduce to obedience his undutiful children, whom he found such reluctance to punish by the sword of the magistrate. Alexander, well pleased to exert his power in so justifiable a cause, issued the bulls required of him; but it was soon found, that these spiritual weapons had not the same force as when employed in a spiritual controversy; and that the clergy were negligent in supporting a sentence, which was not calculated to promote the interests of their order. The king, after taking in vain this humiliating step, was obliged to have recourse to arms, and to inlist such auxiliaries, as are the usual resource of tyrants, and have seldom been employed by so wise and just a monarch.

The loose government which prevailed in all the states of Europe, the many private wars carried on among the neighbouring nobles, and the impossibility of enforcing any general execution of the laws, had encouraged a tribe of banditti to disturb every where the public peace, to infest the highways, to pillage the open country, and to brave all the efforts of the civil magistrate, and even the excommunications of the church, which were fulminated against them. Troops of them were sometimes enlisted in the service of one prince or baron, sometimes in that of another: they often acted in an independent manner, under leaders of their own: the peaceable and industrious inhabitants, reduced to poverty by their ravages, were frequently obliged, for subsistence, to betake themselves to a like disorderly course of life; and a continual intestine war, pernicious to industry, as well as to the execution of justice, was thus carried on in the bowels of every kingdom. Those desperate ruffians received the name sometimes of Brabançons, sometimes of Routiers or Cottereaux; but for what reason is not agreed by historians; and they formed a kind of society or government among themselves, which set at defiance the rest of mankind. The greatest monarchs were not ashamed, on occasion, to have recourse to their assistance; and as their habits of war and depredation had given them experience, hardiness and courage, they generally composed the most formidable part of those armies, which decided the political quarrels of princes. Several of them were enlisted among the forces levied by Henry's enemies; but the great treasures amassed by that prince enabled him to engage more numerous troops of them in his service; and the situation of affairs rendered even such banditti the only forces on whose fidelity he could depend. His licentious barons, disgusted with a vigilant government, were more desirous of being ruled by young princes, ignorant of public affairs, remiss in their conduct, and profuse in their grants; and as the king had ensured to his sons the succession to every particular province of his dominions, the nobles dreaded no danger in adhering to those who, they knew, must some time become their sovereigns. Prompted by these motives, many of the Norman nobility had deserted to his son Henry; the Breton and Gascon barons seemed equally disposed to embrace the quarrel of Geoffrey and Richard. Disaffection had crept in among the English; and the earls of Leicester and Chester in particular had openly declared against the king. Twenty thousand Brabançons, therefore, joined to some troops which he brought over from Ireland, and a few barons of approved fidelity, formed the sole force with which he intended to resist his host of enemies.

Louis, in order to bind the confederates in a closer union, summoned at Paris an assembly of the chief vassals of the crown, received their approbation of his measures, and engaged them by oath to adhere to the cause of young Henry. This prince, in return, bound himself by a like tie never to desert his French allies; and having made a new great seal, he lavishly distributed among them many considerable parts of those territories which he purposed to conquer from his father. The counts of Flanders, Boulogne, Blois, and Eu, partly moved by the general jealousy arising from Henry's power and ambition, partly allured by the prospect of reaping advantage from the inconsiderate temper and necessities of the young prince, declared openly in favour of the latter. William, king of Scotland, had also entered into this great confederacy; and a plan was concerted for a general invasion on different parts of the king's extensive and factious dominions.

Hostilities were first commenced by the counts of Flanders and Boulogne on the frontiers of Normandy. Those princes laid siege to Aumale, which was delivered into their hands by the treachery of its count; who surrendered himself prisoner; and on pretence of thereby paying his ransom, opened the gates of all his other fortresses. The two counts next besieged and made themselves masters of Drincourt: but the count of Boulogne was here mortally wounded in the assault; and this incident put some stop to the progress of the Flemish forces.

In another quarter, the king of France, being strongly assisted by his vassals, assembled an army of seven thousand knights and their followers on horseback, and a proportionable number of infantry; carrying young Henry along with him, he laid siege to Verneüil, which was vigorously defended by Hugh de Lacey and Hugh de Beauchamp, the governors. After he had lain a month before the place, the garrison, being straitened for provisions, capitulated; and they engaged, if not relieved within three days, to surrender the town, and to retire into the citadel. On the last of these days, Henry appeared with his army upon the heights above Verneüil. Louis, dreading an attack, sent the archbishop of Sens and the count of Blois to the English camp, and desired that next day should be appointed for a conference, in order to establish a general peace, and terminate the difference between Henry and his sons. The king, who passionately desired this accommodation, and suspected no fraud, gave his consent; but Louis, that morning, obliging the garrison to surrender according to capitulation, set fire to the place; and began to retire with his army. Henry provoked at this artifice, attacked the rear with vigour, put them to rout, and took several prisoners. The French army, as their time of service was now expired, immediately dispersed themselves into their several provinces; and left Henry free to prosecute his advantages against his other enemies.

The nobles of Bretagne, instigated by the earl of Chester and Ralph de Fougeres, were all in arms; but their progress was checked by a body of Brabançons, which the king, after Louis's retreat, had sent against them. The two armies came to an action near Dol; where the rebels were defeated, fifteen hundred slain on the field, and the leaders, the earls of Chester and Fougeres, obliged to take shelter in the town of Dol. Henry hastened to form the siege of that place, and carried on the attack with such ardour, that he obliged the governor and garrison to surrender themselves prisoners. By these vigorous measures and successes, the insurrections were quelled in Bretagne; and the king, thus fortunate in all quarters, willingly agreed to a conference with Louis, in hopes that his enemies, finding all their efforts frustrated, would terminate hostilities on moderate conditions.

The two monarchs met between Trie and Gisors; and Henry had here the mortification to see his three sons in the retinue of his inveterate enemy. As Louis had no other pretence for war than supporting the claims of the young princes, the king made them such offers as children might be ashamed to insist on, and could be extorted from him by nothing but his parental affection, or by the present necessity of his affairs. He insisted only in retaining the sovereign authority in all his dominions; but offered young Henry half the revenues of England, with some places of surety in that kingdom; or, if he rather chose to reside in Normandy, half the revenues of that duchy, with all those of Anjou. He made a like offer to Richard in Guienne; he promised to resign Bretagne to Geoffrey: and if these concessions were not deemed sufficient, he agreed to add to them whatever the pope's legates, who were present, should require of him. The earl of Leicester was also present at the negociation; and either from the impetuosity of his temper, or from a view of abruptly breaking off a conference which must cover the allies with confusion, he gave vent to the most violent reproaches against Henry, and he even put his hand to his sword, as if he meant to attempt some violence against him. This furious action threw the company into confusion, and put an end to the treaty.

The chief hopes of Henry's enemies seemed now to depend on the state of affairs in England, where his authority was exposed to imminent danger. One article of prince Henry's agreement with his foreign confederates was, that he should resign Kent, with Dover, and all its other fortresses, into the hands of the earl of Flanders: yet so little national or public spirit prevailed among the independent English nobility, so wholly bent were they on the aggrandizement each of himself and his own family, that notwithstanding this pernicious concession, the greater part of them had conspired to make an insurrection, and to support the prince's pretensions. The king's principal resource lay in the church and the bishops, with whom he was now in perfect agreement; whether that the decency of their character made them ashamed of supporting so unnatural a rebellion, or that they were satisfied with Henry's atonement for the murder of Becket, and for his former invasion of ecclesiastical immunities. That prince, however, having resigned none of the essential rights of his crown in the accommodation: he maintained still the same prudent jealousy of the court of Rome, admitting no legate into England, without his swearing to attempt nothing against the royal prerogatives; and he even obliged the monks of Canterbury, who pretended to a free election on the vacancy occasioned by the death of Becket, to chuse Roger, Prior of Dover, to supply his place.

The king of Scotland made an irruption into Northumberland, and committed great devastations; but being opposed by Richard de Lucy, whom Henry had left guardian of the realm, he retreated into his own country, and agreed to a cessation of arms. This truce enabled the guardian to march southward with his army, in order to oppose an invasion which the earl of Leicester, at the head of a body of Flemings, had made upon Suffolk. The Flemings had been joined by Hugh Bygod, who made them masters of his castle of Framlingham; and marching into the heart of the kingdom, where they hoped to be supported by Leicester's vassals, they were met by Lucy, who, assisted by Humphry Bohun, the constable, and the earls of Arundel, Gloucester, and Cornwall, had advanced to Farnham with a less numerous, but braver army, to oppose them. The Flemings were broken in an instant; ten thousand of them were put to the sword, the earl of Leicester was taken prisoner, and the remains of the invaders were glad to compound for a safe retreat into Flanders.

This great defeat did not dishearten the malcontents; who being supported by the alliance of so many foreign princes, and encouraged by the king's own sons, determined to persevere in their enterprize. The earl of Ferrars, Roger de Moubray, Archetil de Mallory, Richard de Moreville, Hamo de Mascie, together with many friends of the earls of Leicester and Chester, rose in arms in 1174. The fidelity of the earls of Clare and Gloucester were suspected: and the guardian, though vigorously supported by Geoffrey bishop of Lincoln, the king's natural son by the fair Rosamond, found it difficult to defend himself from so many open and concealed enemies. The more to augment the confusion, the king of Scotland, on the expiration of the truce, broke into the northern provinces with a great army of eighty thousand men; and Henry, who had baffled all his enemies in France, and put his frontiers in a posture of defence, now found England the seat of danger; and determined by his presence to overawe the malcontents, or by his conduct and courage to subdue them. He landed at Southampton on the 8th of July; and knowing the influence of superstition over the minds of the people, he hastened to Canterbury, in order to make atonement to the ashes of Thomas à Becket, and tender his submissions to a dead enemy. As soon as he came within sight of the church of Canterbury, he dismounted, walked barefoot towards it, prostrated himself before the shrine of the saint, remained in fasting and prayer during a whole day, and watched all night the holy reliques. Not content with this hypocritical devotion towards a man, whose violence and ingratitude had so long disquieted his government, and had been the object of his most inveterate animosity, he submitted to a penance still more singular and humiliating. He assembled a chapter of the monks, disrobed himself before them, put a scourge of discipline into the hands of each, and presented his bare shoulders to the lashes which these ecclesiastics successively inflicted upon him. Next day he received absolution; and departing for London, got soon after the agreeable intelligence of a great victory which his generals had obtained over the Scots, and which being gained, as was reported, on the very day of his absolution, was regarded as the earnest of his final reconciliation with Heaven and with Thomas à Becket.

William king of Scots, though repulsed before the castle of Prudhow, and other fortified places, had committed horrible depredations upon the northern provinces: but on the approach of Ralph de Glanville, the famous justiciary, seconded by Bernard de Baliol, Robert de Stuteville, Odonel de Umfreville, William de Vesci, and other northern barons, together with the bishop of Lincoln, he thought proper to retreat nearer his own country, and he fixed his camp at Alnwick. He had here weakened his army extremely, by sending out numerous detachments in order to extend his ravages; and he lay absolutely safe, as he imagined, from any attack of the enemy. But Glanville made a hasty march to Newcastle; and allowing his soldiers only a small interval for refreshment, immediately set out towards evening for Alnwick. He marched that night above thirty miles; arrived in the morning of the 13th of July, under cover of a mist, near the Scottish camp; and regardless of the numbers of the enemy, began the attack with his small but determined body of cavalry. William was living in such supine security, that he took the English, at first, for a body of his own ravagers, who were returning to the camp; but the sight of their banners convincing him of his mistake, he entered on the action with no greater body than a hundred horse, in confidence that the numerous army which surrounded him, would soon hasten to his relief. He was dismounted on the first shock, and taken prisoner; while his troops, hearing of this disaster, fled on all sides with precipitation. The dispersed ravagers made the best of their way to Scotland; and discord arising among them, they proceeded to mutual hostilities, and suffered more from each other's sword, than from that of the enemy.

This important victory proved decisive in favour of Henry, and entirely broke the spirit of the English rebels. The bishop of Durham, who was preparing to revolt, made his submissions; Hugh Bigod, though he had received a strong reinforcement of Flemings, surrendered all his castles, and threw himself on the king's mercy; no better resource was left to the earl of Ferrars and Roger de Moubray; the inferior rebels imitating the example, all England was restored to tranquillity in a few weeks; and as the king appeared to lie under the immediate protection of Heaven, it was deemed impious any longer to resist him. The clergy exalted anew the merits and powerful intercession of Becket; and Henry, instead of opposing this superstition, plumed himself on the new friendship of the saint, and propagated an opinion which was so favourable to his interests.

Prince Henry, who was ready to embark at Gravelines, with the earl of Flanders and a great army, hearing that his partizans in England were suppressed, abandoned the enterprize, and joined the camp of Louis, who, during the absence of the king, had made an irruption into Normandy, and had laid siege to Rouen. The place was defended with vigour by the inhabitants; and Louis, despairing of success by open force, tried to gain the town by stratagem. He proclaimed in his own camp a cessation of arms on pretence of celebrating the festival of St. Laurence; and when the citizens, supposing themselves in safety, remitted their guard, he purposed to take advantage of their security. Happily, some priests had, from mere curiosity, mounted a steeple, where the alarm-bell hung; and observing the French camp in motion, they immediately rang the bell, and gave warning to the inhabitants, who ran to their several stations. The French, who, on hearing the alarm, hurried to the assault, had already mounted the walls in several places; but being repulsed by the citizens, were obliged to retreat with loss. Next day Henry, who had hastened to the defence of his Norman dominions, passed over the bridge in triumph; and entered Rouen in sight of the French army. The city was now in safety; and the king, in order to brave the French monarch, commanded the gates, which had been walled up to be opened; and prepared to push his advantages against the enemy. Louis saved himself from this perilous situation by a new piece of deceit, not so justifiable. He proposed a conference for adjusting the terms of a general peace, which he knew would be greedily embraced by Henry, and while the king of England trusted to the execution of his promise, he made a retreat with his army into his own territories.

There was however, a necessity on both sides for an accommodation. Henry could no longer bear to see his three sons in the hands of his enemy; and Louis dreaded lest this monarch, victorious in all quarters, crowned with glory, and absolute master of his dominions, might take revenge for the many dangers and disquietudes which the arms, and still more the intrigues of France, had, in his disputes both with Becket and his sons, found means to raise against him. After making a cessation of arms, a conference was agreed on near Tours; where Henry granted his sons much less advantageous terms than he had formerly offered; and he received their submissions. The most material of his concessions were some pensions which he stipulated to pay them, and some castles which he granted them for the place of their residence; together with an indemnity for all their adherents, who were restored to their estates and honours.

Of all those who had embraced the cause of the young prince, William king of Scotland was the only considerable loser by that enterprize. Henry delivered from confinement, without exacting any ransom, about nine hundred knights, whom he had taken prisoners; but it cost William the ancient independency of his crown as the price of his liberty. He stipulated to do homage to Henry for Scotland and all his other possessions: he engaged that all the barons and nobility of his kingdom should also do homage; that the bishops should take an oath of fealty; that both should swear to adhere to the king of England against their native prince, if the latter should break his engagements; and that the fortresses of Edinburgh, Stirling, Berwick, Roxborough, and Jedborough, should be delivered into Henry's hands, till the performance of articles. The terms were settled August 10, 1175. This severe and humiliating treaty was executed in its full rigour. William, being released, brought up all his barons, prelates, and abbots; and they did homage to Henry in the cathedral of York, and acknowledged him and his successors for their superior lord. The English monarch stretched still farther the rigour of the conditions which he exacted. He engaged the king and states of Scotland to make a perpetual cession of the fortresses of Berwick and Roxborough, and to allow the castle of Edinburgh to remain in his hands for a limited time (c).

Henry having thus, contrary to expectation, extricated himself from a situation in which his throne was exposed to great danger, was employed for several years in the administration of justice, in the execution of the laws, and in guarding against those inconveniencies, which either the past convulsions of his state, or the political institutions of that age, unavoidably occasioned. The provisions which he made show such largeness of thought as qualified him for being a legislator; and they were commonly calculated as well for the future as the present happiness of his kingdom. In 1176 he exacted severe penalties against robbery, murder, false coining, arson; and ordained that these crimes should be punished by the amputation of the right hand and right foot. The pecuniary commutation for crimes had been gradually disused; and seems to have been entirely abolished by the rigour of these statutes. The superstitious trials by fire and water ordeals, though condemned by the church, still subsisted; but Henry ordained, that any man accused of murder, or any heinous felony, by the oath of the legal knights of the country, should, even though acquitted by the ordeal, be obliged to adjure the realm. Though sensible of the absurdity attending the trial by duel or battle, he did not venture to abolish it; but admitted either of the parties to challenge a trial by an assize or jury of twelve freeholders. This latter method of trial seems to have been very ancient in England, and was fixed by the laws of king Alfred; but the barbarous and violent genius of the age had of late given more credit to the trial by battle, which had become the general method of deciding all important controversies. It was never abolished by law in England; and there is an instance of it so late as the reign of Elizabeth; but the institution revived by this king, being found more reasonable and more suitable to a civilized people, gradually prevailed over it.

The partition of England into four divisions, and the appointment of itinerant justices to go the circuit in each division, and to decide the causes in the counties, was another important ordinance of this prince, which had a direct tendency to curb the oppressive barons, and to protect the inferior gentry and common people in their property. Those justices were either prelates or considerable noblemen; who, besides carrying the authority of the king's commission, were able, by the dignity of their own character, to give weight and credit to the laws.

That there might be fewer obstacles to the execution of justice, the king was vigilant in demolishing all the new erected castle of the nobility, in England as well as in his foreign dominions: and he permitted no fortress to remain in the custody of those whom he found reason to suspect.

But lest the kingdom should be weakened by this demolition of the fortresses, the king fixed an assize of arms, by which all his subjects were enjoined to put themselves in a situation for defending themselves and the realm. Every man possessed of a knight's fee was ordained to have for each fee a coat of mail, a helmet, a shield, and a lance; every free layman, possessed of goods to the value of sixteen marks, was to be armed in like manner; every one that possessed ten marks was obliged to have an iron gorget, a cap of iron, and a lance: all burgesses were to have a cap of iron, a lance, and a wambais; that is, a coat quilted with wool, tow or such like materials. It appears that archery, for which the English were afterwards so renowned, had not at this time become very common among them. The spear was the chief weapon employed in battle.

The king passed an equitable law, that the goods of a vassal should not be seized for the debt of his lord, unless the vassal be surety for the debt; and that the rents of vassals should be paid to the creditors of the lord, not to the lord himself. It is remarkable, that this law was enacted by the king in a council which he held at Verneüil, and which consisted of some prelates and barons of England, Normandy, Poictou, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and Bretagne; and the statute took place in all these last-mentioned territories (d), though totally unconnected with each other (e): a proof how irregular the ancient feudal government was, and how near the sovereigns, in some instances, approached to despotism, though in others they seemed scarcely to possess any authority (f).

The success which had attended Henry in his wars did not much encourage his neighbours to form any attempt against him; and his transactions with them, during several years, contain little memorable. Scotland remained in that state of feudal subjection to which he had reduced it, and gave him no farther inquietude. He sent over his fourth son, John, into Ireland, to make a more complete conquest of the island; but the petulance and incapacity of this prince, by which he enraged the Irish chieftains, obliged the king soon after to recal him. Louis king of France dying of an apoplexy about this time, was succeeded by his son Philip, not then sixteen years of age; who proved the ablest and greatest monarch that had governed that kingdom since the age of Charlemagne. The superior years, however, and experience of Henry, while they moderated his ambition, gave him such an ascendant over this prince, that no dangerous rivalship, for a long time, arose between them. The English monarch, in 1180, instead of taking advantage of his own situation, employed his good offices in composing the quarrels which arose in the royal family of France; and he was successful in mediating a reconciliation between Philip and his mother and uncles. These services were ill requited by Philip, who, when he came to man's estate, encouraged Henry's sons in their ungrateful and undutiful behaviour towards him.

Prince Henry, finding his income inadequate to support his expensive amusements, and equally impatient of obtaining power, renewed to the king the demand of his resigning Normandy; and on meeting with a refusal, he fled with his consort to the court of France; but Philip not being disposed to enter into a war for his sake, he accepted

(c) This was the first great ascendant which England obtained over Scotland; and indeed the first important transaction which had passed between the kingdoms. Few princes have been so fortunate as to gain considerable advantages over their weaker neighbours with less violence and injustice than was practised by Henry against the king of Scots, whom he had taken prisoner in battle, and who had wantonly engaged in a war, in which all the neighbours of that prince, and even his own family, were, without provocation, combined against him.

(d) It was usual for the kings of England, after the conquest of Ireland, to summon barons and members of that country to the English parliament. Molineux's Case of Ireland, p. 64, 65, 66.

(e) Spelman even doubts whether the law was not also extended to England. If it were not, it could only be because Henry did not chuse it; for his authority was greater in that kingdom than in his transmarine dominions.

(f) If a prince much dreaded and revered, like Henry, obtained but the appearance of general consent to an ordinance which was equitable and just, it became immediately an established law, and all his subjects acquiesced in it. If the prince was hated or despised; if the nobles who supported him had small influence; if the humours of the times disposed the people to question the justice of his ordinance; the fullest and most authentic assembly had no authority. Thus all was confusion and disorder; no regular idea of a constitution; force and violence decided every thing.

of his father's offers of reconciliation, and made him submissions. After this accommodation, Geoffrey, by the king's desire, did homage to his elder brother for the duchy of Bretagne; Richard, whom he had made master of Guienne, refused to obey Henry's orders, in doing homage to his elder brother for that duchy; and defended himself against young Henry and Geoffrey, who, uniting their arms, carried war into his territories. The contest was pursued with such malevolent fury, that no quarter was given on either side. The king, with great difficulty, composed this difference: but soon found his eldest son engaged in conspiracies, and ready to take arms against himself. While the young prince was conducting these criminal intrigues, he was seized with a fever at Martel, a castle near Turenne, to which he had retired in discontent; and when his physicians informed him that they did not think he could recover, he was struck with remorse for his undutiful behaviour towards his father. He sent a message to the king, who was not far distant, expressed his contrition, and entreated the favour of a visit, that he might at least die with the satisfaction of having obtained his forgiveness. Henry, who had so often experienced the prince's ingratitude and violence, apprehended that his sickness was feigned, and he was advised not to intrust himself into his son's hands; he, however, took a ring from his finger, which was well known to his son, and sent it to him by the archbishop of Bourdeaux, as a token of his forgiveness. The prince received it with great emotion; and pressing it to his lips, soon afterwards expired. When the king received intelligence of young Henry's death, which happened on the 11th of June, 1183, and the proofs of his sincere repentance, this good prince was affected with the deepest sorrow; he thrice fainted away; he accused his own hardheartedness in refusing the dying request of his son; and lamented that he had deprived that prince of the last opportunity of making atonement for his offences, and of pouring out his soul in the bosom of his reconciled father. This prince died in the twenty-eighth year of his age.

The behaviour of his surviving children did not tend to give the king any consolation for the loss. As prince Henry had left no posterity, Richard was become heir to all his dominions; and the king intended that John, his third surviving son and favourite, should inherit Guienne as his appanage; but Richard refused his consent, fled into that duchy, and even made preparations for carrying on war, as well against his father as against his brother Geoffrey, who was now put in possession of Bretagne.

At a council held at Windsor on the first of April, 1185, the king of Scotland attended, and received from Henry a grant of the county of Huntingdon. Prince John having, at the same time, been solemnly knighted, was sent to Ireland with a fleet of sixty sail, and a considerable army to take upon him the government of that country. When he landed at Waterford, he was received by the archbishop of Dublin, and several of the English nobility, who took the oaths of fealty. Many of the Irish chieftains of the vicinity, who had continued to live peaceably under the English government from the time of their first submission, came to congratulate him on his safe arrival, and to give him the kiss of peace. But the prince and the young noblemen of his train treated these venerable chiefs with scorn and derision; and, in obedience to an impulse of juvenile folly, plucked their beards, which were extremely long and thick. Justly enraged at this unprovoked insult, they retired, and fled for refuge into the territories of Limerick, Cork and Connaught; to whose princes they represented the case, and urged them to projects of revenge. All thoughts of subjection to the English government were now rejected with scorn; the petty princes of the country, hitherto at variance, now resolved to suppress their private animosities, the more effectually to enforce the assertion of their ancient liberty. Thus all the authority which the courtesy and prudence of Henry had acquired over the minds of the Irish, during his abode in their island, was forfeited, by the folly and imprudence of the prince and his youthful companions; whose mad conduct occasioned a war, in which John lost almost the whole of his army before the expiration of the year; when the king thought it necessary to recal him, and trust the direction of affairs in Ireland to John de Courcy, whose valour and prudence he had experienced on many occasions.

Henry's presence on the continent was now requisite, to extinguish the flames of war, which had again broken out between his two turbulent sons, Richard and Geoffrey. For this purpose he embarked at Dover on the 16th of April; and landing at Whitsand, pursued his journey to Normandy, where he immediately collected an army. He was, however, desirous of bringing the matter to an amicable termination, without being under the necessity of interfering in a forcible manner; to effect which, he sent a messenger to prince Richard, to command him to lay down his arms, and resign the disputed territory to his mother, queen Eleanor, to whom it belonged; threatening, in case of a refusal, to assert her rights at the head of his army. This remonstrance had the desired effect. Richard, by the advice of his friends; or, perhaps, dreading an insurrection of the Gascons in her favour; or, retaining some sense of duty towards her; readily paid obedience to the commands of Henry; after which he returned in peace to his father's court, and was again received into favour.

No sooner was this quarrel accommodated, than Geoffrey, perhaps the most vicious of all Henry's children, broke out into violence; demanded Anjou to be annexed to his dominions of Bretagne; and on meeting with a refusal, fled to the court of France and levied forces against his father. Henry was freed from this danger by his son's death, who was killed in consequence of a fall he received in a tournament at Paris (g). The widow of Geoffrey, soon after his decease, was delivered of a son, who received the name of Arthur, and was invested in the duchy of Bretagne, under the guardianship of his grandfather, who, as duke of Normandy, was also superior lord of that territory. Philip, as lord paramount, disputed some time his title to this wardship; but was obliged to yield to the inclinations of the Bretons, who preferred the government of Henry.

But the rivalship between these potent princes, and all their inferior interest, seemed now to have given place to the general passion for the relief of the Holy Land, and the expulsion of the Saracens. Those infidels, though obliged to yield to the immense inundation of Christians in the first crusade, had recovered courage after the torrent was past; and attacking on all quarters the settlements of the Europeans, had reduced these adventurers to great difficulties, and obliged them to apply again for succours from the west. A second crusade, under the emperor Conrade, and Louis VII. king of France, in which above two hundred thousand men were sacrificed to their frantic enthusiasm, brought them but a temporary relief; and those princes, after losing such immense armies, and seeing the flower of their nobility fall by their side, returned with little honour into Europe. But these repeated misfortunes, which drained the western world of its people and treasure, were not yet sufficient to cure men of their passion for those spiritual feats of knight-errantry; and a new incident rekindled with fresh fury the zeal of the ecclesiastics and military adventurers among the Latin Christians. Saladin, a prince of great generosity, bravery, and conduct, having on the death of the khalif Alad, fixed himself on the throne of Egypt, began to extend his conquests over the East; and finding the settlement of the Christians in Palestine an invincible obstacle to the progress of his arms, (for he had already reduced Syria, Arabia, Persia, and Mesopotamia,) he bent the whole force of his policy and valour to subdue that small and barren, but important territory. Taking advantage of the dissensions which prevailed among the champions of the cross, and having secretly gained the count of Tripoli, who commanded their armies, he invaded the frontiers with a mighty power in 1187; and, aided by the treachery of that count, gained over them at Tiberiade a complete victory, which utterly annihilated the force of the kingdom of Jerusalem, whose monarch, Guy de Lusignan, was taken prisoner (h).

(g) This prince was distinguished from his two elder brothers by the superior degree of cunning which he possessed. In him the fire of youth was checked by the coolness of hypocrisy; he was deeply versed in all the intricate mazes of political deception; and endued with that persuasive eloquence so admirably calculated to render that dangerous knowledge a source of advantage to its possessor. His projects of ambition were never repressed by the interference of filial affection, or sentiments of remorse. His father's continual indulgence had excited no impulse of gratitude in his bosom; and even in the hour of death he evinced no signs of repentance for his unnatural conduct. Henry, therefore, who was well acquainted with his son's character, expressed no concern at his death, though an excess of paternal fondness was one of his principal failings,—if a failing it can be called.

(h) The loss which the Christians mostly lamented in this celebrated battle, was the real cross on which our Saviour was crucified, that fell into the hands of the Infidels. Bigord, a contemporary historian, asserts with great gravity, that, after this dismal event, all the children who were born throughout Christendom, had only twenty, or two and twenty teeth instead of thirty, or two and thirty, which was their former complement. The same miraculous author asserts, that about this period, during

The holy city itself fell into his hands, after a feeble resistance; the kingdom of Antioch was almost entirely subdued; and except some maritime towns, nothing considerable remained of those boasted conquests, which, nearly a century before, it had required the efforts of all Europe to obtain.

The western Christians were thrown into the most astonishing consternation on receiving this dismal intelligence. Pope Urban III. was so much affected at the news, that it was pretended he died of grief; and his successor, Gregory VIII. employed the whole time of his short pontificate in rousing to arms all the Christians who acknowledged his authority. The general cry was, that they were unworthy of enjoying any inheritance in heaven, who did not vindicate from the domination of the Infidels the inheritance of God on earth, and deliver from slavery that country which had been consecrated by the footsteps of their Redeemer. William, archbishop of Tyre, having procured a conference between Henry and Philip near Gisors, on the 21st of January, 1188, enforced all these topics; gave a pathetic description of the miserable state of the Eastern Christians; and employed every argument to excite the ruling passions of the age, superstition, and jealousy of military honour. The two monarchs immediately took the cross from the hands of the archbishop; many of their most considerable vassals imitated their example; and as the emperor Frederic I. entered into the same confederacy, some well-grounded hopes of success were entertained: and men flattered themselves, that an enterprize which had failed under the conduct of many independent leaders, or the temerity of imprudent princes, might at last, by the efforts of such potent and able monarchs, be brought to a happy termination.

Henry hastened his return to England, where he landed January 31, to prepare for his intended expedition to Palestine. He convened a great council of the prelates and barons, on the 11th of February, at Gritington, in Northamptonshire; in which a tax was imposed, amounting to the tenth of all rents for a year, and the tenth of all moveable goods, on such as remained at home; but as they exempted from this burden most of the regular clergy, the secular aspired to the same immunity; pretended that their duty obliged them to assist the crusade with their prayers alone; and it was with some difficulty they were constrained to desist from an opposition, which in them, who had been the chief promoters of those pious enterprizes, appeared with the worst grace imaginable. This backwardness of the clergy is perhaps a symptom, that the enthusiastic ardour which had at first seized the people for crusades, was now by time and ill success considerably abated; and that the frenzy was chiefly supported by the military genius and love of glory in the monarchs of that age. Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, preached before the council, on the mystery of the cross; and, by his persuasive eloquence, impelled a considerable number of prelates, nobles, knights, and their vassals, to enlist in this holy war. He afterwards made a progress through Wales with the same view, and met with equal success.

But before this great machine could be put in motion, there were still many obstacles to surmount. Philip, jealous of Henry's power, entered into a private confederacy with young Richard, and, working on his ambitious and impatient temper, persuaded him, instead of supporting and aggrandizing that monarchy which he was one day to inherit, to seek present power and independence by disturbing and dismembering it. In order to give a pretence for hostilities between the two kings, Richard made an irruption into the territories of Raymond count of Toulouse in 1189, who immediately carried complaints of this violence before the king of France as his superior lord. Philip remonstrated with Henry; but received for answer, that Richard had confessed to the Archbishop of Dublin, that his enterprize against Raymond had been undertaken by the approbation of Philip himself, and was conducted by his authority. The king of France, who might have been covered with shame and confusion by this detection, still prosecuted his design, and invaded the English provinces of Berri and Auvergne, under colour of revenging the quarrel of the count of Toulouse. Henry now found his presence requisite on the continent, and therefore embarked for France, where he landed on the 11th of July, and retaliated, by making inroads upon the frontiers of that nation, and burning Dreux. As this war, which destroyed all hopes of success in the projected crusade, gave great scandal, the two kings held a conference in October, at the accustomed place between Gisors and Trie, in order to find means of accommodating their differences: they separated on worse terms than before; and Philip, to shew his disgust, ordered a great elm, under which the conferences had been usually held, to be cut down; as if he had renounced all desire of accommodation, and was determined to carry the war to extremities against the king of England. But his own vassals refused to serve under him in so invidious a cause, and he was obliged to come afresh to a conference with Henry, and to offer terms of peace. These terms were such as entirely opened the eyes of the king of England, and fully convinced him of the perfidy of his son, and his secret alliance with Philip, of which he had before only entertained suspicion. The king of France required that Richard should be crowned king of England in the lifetime of his father, should be invested in all his transmarine dominions, and should immediately espouse Alice, Philip's sister, to whom he had formerly been affianced, and who had already been conducted into England. Henry had experienced such fatal effects, both from the crowning of his eldest son, and from that prince's alliance with the royal family of France, that he rejected these terms; and Richard, in consequence of his secret agreement with Philip, immediately revolted from his father, in the presence of all the nobles who attended the conference, did homage to the king of France for all the dominions which Henry held of that crown, and received the investitures as if he had already been the lawful possessor. This unexpected occurrence being naturally productive of infinite confusion, the conference broke up.

Cardinal Albano, the legate of pope Clement III. displeased with these increasing obstacles to the crusade, excommunicated Richard, as the chief spring of discord; but the sentence of excommunication, which, when it was properly prepared, and was zealously supported by the clergy, had often great influence in that age, proved ineffectual in the present case. The chief barons of Poictou, Guienne, Normandy, and Anjou, being attached to the young prince, and finding that he had now received the investiture from their superior lord, declared for him, and made inroads into the territories of such as still adhered to the king. Henry, disquieted by the daily revolts of his mutinous subjects, and dreading still worse effects from their turbulent disposition, had again recourse to papal authority; and engaged the cardinal Anagni, who had succeeded Albano in the legateship, to threaten Philip with laying an interdict on all his dominions. But Philip, who was a prince of great vigour and capacity, despised the menace, and told Anagni, that it belonged not to the pope to interpose in the temporal disputes of princes, much less in those between him and his rebellious vassal. He even proceeded so far as to reproach him with partiality, and with receiving bribes from the king of England; while Richard, still more outrageous, offered to draw his sword against the legate, and was hindered by the interposition alone of the company, from committing violence upon him.

The king of England was now obliged to defend his dominions by arms, and to engage in a war with France and his eldest son, a prince of great valour, on such disadvantageous terms. Ferte-Bernard fell first into the hands of the enemy: Mans was next taken by assault; and Henry, who had thrown himself into that place, escaped with some difficulty: Amboise, Chaumont, and Chateau de Loire, opened their gates on the appearance of Philip and Richard: Tours was menaced; and the king, who had retired to Saumur, and had daily instances of the cowardice or infidelity of his governors, expected the most dismal issue to all his enterprizes. While he was in this state of despondency, the duke of Burgundy, the earl of Flanders, and the archbishop of Rheims, interposed with their good offices; and the intelligence which he received of the taking of Tours, and which made him fully sensible of the desperate situation of his affairs, so subdued his spirit that he submitted to all the rigorous terms which were imposed upon him. He agreed, that Richard should marry the prinduring his residence at the monastery of Argenteuil, one moon-light morning, a little before the break of day, the moon, which was then in the full, quitted its station in the firmament; descended upon the earth; and after resting there some time, as if to recover its strength, returned very leisurely to the place assigned it by the Creator. This was certainly a historian worthy the crusaders!

cess Alice; that that prince should receive the homage and oath of fealty of all his subjects both in England and his transmarine dominions; that he himself should pay twenty thousand marks to the king of France as a compensation for the charges of the war; that his own barons should engage to make him observe this treaty by force, and in case of his violating it, should promise to join Philip and Richard against him; and that all his vassals who had entered into confederacy with Richard, should receive an indemnity for the offence.

But the mortification which Henry, who had been accustomed to give the law in most treaties, received from these disadvantageous terms, was the least that he met with on this occasion. When he demanded a list of those barons to whom he was bound to grant a pardon for their connections with Richard, he was astonished to find at the head of them the name of his second son John; who had always been his favourite, whose interests he had ever anxiously at heart, and who had even, on account of his ascendant over him, often excited the jealousy of Richard. The unhappy father, already overloaded with cares and sorrows, finding his last disappointment in his domestic tenderness, broke out into expressions of the utmost despair, cursed the day in which he received his miserable being, and bestowed on his ungrateful and undutiful children a malediction which he never could be prevailed on to retract. The more his heart was disposed to friendship and affection, the more he resented the barbarous return which his four sons had successively made to his parental care; and this finishing blow, by depriving him of every comfort in life, quite broke his spirit, and threw him into a lingering fever, of which he expired at the castle of Chinon near Saumur, on the 6th of July, 1189, which was the thirty-fifth year of his reign, and the fifty-seventh of his age. His natural son Geoffrey, who alone had behaved dutifully towards him, attended his corpse to the nunnery of Fontevrault; where it lay in state in the abbey-church. Next day Richard, who came to visit the dead body of his father, and who, notwithstanding his criminal conduct, was not wholly destitute of generosity, was struck with horror and remorse at the sight; and as the attendants observed, that at that very instant, blood gushed from the mouth and nostrils of the corpse, he exclaimed, agreeably to a vulgar superstition, that he was his father's murderer; and he expressed a deep sense, though too late, of that undutiful behaviour which had brought his parent to an untimely grave.

Thus died the greatest prince of his time for wisdom, virtue, and abilities, and the most powerful in extent of dominion of all those that had ever filled the throne of England. His character, in private as well as in public life, is almost without a blemish; and he seems to have possessed every accomplishment, both of body and mind, which makes a man either estimable or amiable. He was of a middle stature, strong and well proportioned: his countenance was lively and engaging; his conversation affable and entertaining: his elocution easy, persuasive, and ever at command. He loved peace, but possessed both bravery and conduct in war; was provident without timidity; severe in the execution of justice without rigour; and temperate without austerity. He preserved health, and kept himself from corpulency, to which he was somewhat inclined, by an abstemious diet, and by frequent exercise, particularly hunting. When he could enjoy leisure, he recreated himself either in learned conversation or in reading; and he cultivated his natural talents by study above any prince of his time. His affections, as well as his enmities, were warm and durable; and his long experience of the ingratitude and infidelity of men never destroyed the natural sensibility of his temper, which disposed him to friendship and society. His character has been transmitted to us by several writers who were his contemporaries; and it extremely resembles, in its most remarkable features, that of his maternal grandfather Henry I. Excepting only, that ambition, which was a ruling passion in both, found not in the first Henry such unexceptionable means of exerting itself, and pushed that prince into measures, which were both criminal in themselves, and were the cause of farther crimes, from which his grandson's conduct was happily exempted.

This prince, says Hume, whose observations are exceedingly just, like most of his predecessors of the Norman line, except Stephen, passed more of his time on the continent than in this island: he was surrounded with the English gentry and nobility, when abroad: the French gentry and nobility attended him when he resided in England: both nations acted in the government as if they were the same people; and, on many occasions, the legislatures seem not to have been distinguished. As the king and all the English barons were of French extraction, the manners of that people acquired the ascendant, and were regarded as the models of imitation. All foreign improvements, therefore, such as they were, in literature and politeness, in laws and arts, seem now to have been, in a great measure, transplanted into England; and that kingdom was become little inferior in all the fashionable accomplishments, to any of its neighbours on the continent. The more homely but more sensible manners and principles of the Saxons, were exchanged for the affectations of chivalry and the subtilties of school philosophy: the feudal ideas of civil government, the Romish sentiments in religion, had taken entire possession of the people: by the former, the sense of submission towards princes was somewhat diminished in the barons; by the latter, the devoted attachment to papal authority was much augmented among the clergy. The Norman and other foreign families established in England, had now struck deep root; and being entirely incorporated with the people, whom at first they oppressed and despised, they no longer thought that they needed the protection of the crown for the enjoyment of their possessions, or considered their tenure as precarious. They aspired to the same liberty and independence which they saw enjoyed by their brethren on the continent, and desired to restrain those exorbitant prerogatives and arbitrary practices, which the necessities of war, and the violence of conquest had at first obliged them to indulge in their monarch. That memory also of a more equal government under the Saxon princes, which remained with the English, diffused still farther the spirit of liberty, and made the barons both desirous of more independence to themselves, and willing to indulge it to the people. And it was not long ere this secret revolution in the sentiments of men produced, first violent convulsions in the state, then an evident alteration in the maxims of government.

The history of all the preceding kings of England since the conquest, gives evident proofs of the disorders attending the feudal institutions; the licentiousness of the barons, their spirit of rebellion against the prince and laws, and of animosity against each other: the conduct of the barons in the transmarine dominions of those monarchs, afforded perhaps still more flagrant instances of these convulsions; and the history of France, during several ages, consists almost entirely of narrations of this nature. The cities, during the continuance of this violent government, could neither be very numerous, nor populous; and there occur instances which seem to evince, that, though these are always the first seat of law and liberty, their police was in general loose and irregular, and exposed to the same disorders with those by which the country was generally infested. It was a custom in London for great numbers, to the amount of a hundred or more, the sons and relations of considerable citizens, to form themselves into a licentious confederacy, to break into rich houses and plunder them, to rob and murder the passengers, and to commit with impunity all sorts of disorder. By these crimes, it had become so dangerous to walk the streets by night, that the citizens durst no more venture abroad after sun-set, than if they had been exposed to the incursions of a public enemy. The brother of the earl of Ferrars had been murdered by some of these nocturnal rioters; and the death of so eminent a person, which was much more regarded than that of many thousands of an inferior station, so provoked the king, that he swore vengeance against the criminals, and became thenceforth more rigorous in the execution of the laws.

There is another instance given by historians, which proves to what a height such riots had proceeded, and how open these criminals were in committing their robberies. A band of them had attacked the house of a rich citizen, with an intention of plundering it; had broken through a stone wall with hammers and wedges; and had already entered the house sword in hand; when the citizen, armed cap-a-pee, and supported by his faithful servants, appeared in the passage to oppose them: he cut off the right hand of the first robber that entered: and made such stout resistance, that his neighbours had leisure to assemble and come to his relief. The man who lost his hand was taken; and was tempted by the promise of pardon to reveal his confederates; among whom was one John Senex, esteemed among the richest and best-born citizens in London. He was convicted by the ordeal; and though he offered five hundred marks for his life, the king refused the money, and ordered him to be hanged (i).

Henry's care in administering justice had gained him so great a reputation, that even foreign and distant princes made him arbiter, and submitted their differences to his judgment. Sanchez, king of Navarre, having some controversies with Alfonso, king of Castile, was contented, though Alfonso had married the daughter of Henry, to chuse this prince for a referee; and they agreed, each of them to consign three castles into neutral hands, as a pledge of their not departing from his award. Henry made the cause to be examined before his great council, and gave a sentence, which was submitted to by both parties. These two Spanish kings sent each a stout champion to the court of England, in order to defend his cause by arms, in case the way of duel had been chosen by Henry.

Henry so far abolished the barbarous and absurd practice of confiscating ships which had been wrecked on the coast, that he ordained, if one man or animal were alive in the ship, that the vessel and the goods should be restored to the owners.

The reign of Henry was remarkable also for an innovation which was afterwards carried farther by his successors, and was attended with the most important consequences. This prince was disgusted with the species of military force which was established by the feudal institutions, and which, though it was extremely burdensome to the subject, yet rendered very little service to the sovereign. The barons, or military tenants, came late into the field; they were obliged to serve only forty days; they were unskilful and disorderly in all their operations; and they were apt to carry into the camp the same refractory and independent spirit, to which they were accustomed in their civil government. Henry, therefore, introduced the practice of making commutation of their military service for money; and he levied scutages from his baronies and knights fees, instead of requiring the personal attendance of his vassals. There is mention made, in the history of the exchequer, of these scutages in his second, fifth, and eighteenth years; and other writers give us an account of three more of them. When the prince had thus obtained money, he made a contract with some of those adventurers in which Europe at that time abounded: they found him soldiers of the same character with themselves, who were bound to serve for a stipulated time; the armies were less numerous, but more useful, than when composed of all the military vassals of the crown: the feudal institutions began to relax; the kings became rapacious for money, on which all their power depended: the barons, seeing no end of exactions, sought to defend their property; and as the same causes had nearly the same effects in the different countries of Europe, the several crowns either lost or acquired authority, according to their different success in the contest.

This prince was also the first that levied a tax on the moveables or personal estates of his subjects, nobles as well as commons. Their zeal for the holy wars made them submit to this innovation; and a precedent being once obtained, this taxation became, in following reigns, the usual method of supplying the necessities of the crown. The tax of Danegeld, so generally odious to the nation, was remitted in this reign.

It was a usual practice of the kings of England to repeat the ceremony of their coronation thrice every year, on assembling the states at the three great festivals. Henry, after the first years of his reign, never renewed this ceremony, which was found to be very expensive and useless. None of his successors revived it. It is considered as a great act of grace in this prince, that he mitigated the rigour of the forest laws, and punished any transgressions of them, not capitally, but by fines, imprisonments, and other more moderate penalties.

Since we are here collecting some detached incidents, which show the genius of the age, and which could not so well enter into the body of our history, it may not be improper to mention the quarrel between Roger archbishop of York, and Richard archbishop of Canterbury. We may judge of the violence of military men and laymen, when ecclesiastics could proceed to such extremities. Cardinal Haguezun being sent, in 1176, a legate into Britain, summoned an assembly of the clergy at London; and as both the archbishops pretended to sit on his right hand, this question of precedency begat a controversy between them. The monks and retainers of archbishop Richard fell upon Roger, in the presence of the cardinal and of the synod, threw him to the ground, trampled him under foot, and so bruised him with blows, that he was taken up half dead, and his life was, with difficulty, saved from their violence. The archbishop of Canterbury was obliged to pay a large sum of money to the legate, in order to suppress all complaints with regard to this enormity.

We are told by Gyraldus Cambrensis, that the monks and prior of St. Swithun threw themselves, one day, prostrate on the ground and in the mire before Henry, complaining with many tears and much doleful lamentation, that the bishop of Winchester, who was also their abbot, had cut off three dishes from their table. How many has he left you? said the king. Ten only, replied the disconsolate monks. I myself, exclaimed the king, never have more than three; and I enjoin your bishop to reduce you to the same number.

This king left only two legitimate sons, Richard who succeeded him, and John who inherited no territory, though his father often intended to leave him a part of his extensive dominions. He was thence commonly denominated Lackland. Henry left three legitimate daughters, Maud, born in 1156, and married to Henry, duke of Saxony; Eleanor, born in 1162, and married to Alfonso, king of Castile; Joan, born in 1165, and married to William king of Sicily.

Henry is said by ancient historians to have been of a very amorous disposition: they mention two of his natural sons by Rosamond (k), namely, Richard Longespee, or Longsword (so called from the sword he usually wore,) who was afterwards married to Ela, the daughter and heir of the earl of Salisbury; and Geoffrey, first bishop of Lincoln, then archbishop of York.

CHAP. II.

RICHARD I. SURNAMED CŒUR DE LION.

RICHARD's compunction on account of his undutiful behaviour towards his father was durable, and greatly influenced him in the choice of his ministers and servants after his accession to the throne. Those who had favoured his rebellion, instead of meeting with that trust and honor which they expected, were surprized to find themselves under

(i) It appears from a statute of Edward I. that these disorders were not remedied even in that reign. It was then made penal to go out at night after the hour of the curfew, to carry a weapon, or to walk without a light or lanthorn. It is said in the preamble to this law, that both by night and by day, there were continual frays in the streets of London.

(k) This lady was the first mistress of Henry. She was the daughter of Walter Clifford, baron of Herefordshire, and the most celebrated beauty in England. Their intrigue must have commenced in the year 1149, during the short stay Henry made in the west before he went to join the Scots at Carlisle, when he was but little more than sixteen years of age; for from that period he was never in England till 1153; and his youngest son was almost twenty years old when he was elected bishop of Lincoln, in 1179: the eldest must therefore have been born in 1150, unless we suppose that his mother followed her lover into France, of which there is not the smallest intimation in any of our ancient authors. At Henry's return into England, in the year 1153, he renewed his amour with her; and she must have borne him Geoffrey, her second son, in the course of that year. As he was then married, it is probable he might be fearful of exciting the jealousy of Eleanor; and therefore solicitous to conceal his intrigue from her knowledge. The necessity of this precaution he might conceive to be still greater when she came with him to England, after his accession to the throne: and this circumstance gave rise to the romantic tradition, mentioned by Brompton, of his having formed a kind of labyrinth at Woodstock to screen his mistress from the sight and vengeance of his queen; but the tale of her having been poisoned there by Eleanor, is wholly without foundation. Before her death Rosamond retired to the nunnery of Godstow, where she expired. Henry bestowed large revenues on the convent, from respect to her memory; in return for which he required that lamps should be kept constantly burning about her remains, which were placed near the high altar, in a tomb covered with silk: but during the reign of his successor, Hugh bishop of Lincoln, commanded them to be taken away, as being unworthy of so holy a place; in consequence of which they were removed to the chapter-house of the nunnery, and there interred. Many other proofs of Henry's incontinence are recorded by historians; but his love for Rosamond, or any other woman, was distinguished by no other weakness than what was inseparable from the passion itself, and the irregular indulgence of it: he never sacrificed to them one hour of business, nor suffered them to interfere in the government of his kingdom; nor was he guilty of profusion in the bestowal either of honours or riches on their relations or dependents. No worthless man ever rose to power by their favours: no worthy man ever incurred disgrace by their malice. Henry, indeed, was too frequently a lover; but he was always a king.

under disgrace with the new king, and on all occasions despised by him. He had learned that the panders of a prince were unfit companions for a monarch. The faithful ministers of Henry, who had vigorously opposed the enterprizes of his sons, were received with friendship, and continued in the enjoyment of those offices which they had discharged under their former master, with honour, rectitude, and ability (l).

Richard was so little apprehensive of any impediment to his succession, that he remained on the continent more than a month after the death of his father; during which time he paid a visit to the French monarch, who invested him with the duchy of Normandy. That he might make atonement to one parent for his breach of duty to the other, he immediately sent orders for the release of the queen dowager from the confinement in which she had long been detained; and he entrusted her with the government of England till his own arrival. His bounty to his brother John was rather profuse and imprudent. Besides bestowing on him the county of Mortague in Normandy, granting him a pension of four thousand marks a year, and marrying him to Avisa the daughter of the earl of Gloucester, by whom he inherited all the possessions of that opulent family, he increased his appanage, which the late king had destined him, by other extensive grants and concessions. He conferred on him the whole estate of William Peverell, which had escheated to the crown: he put him in possession of eight castles, with all the forests and honours annexed to them: he delivered over to him no less than seven earldoms, Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, Nottingham, Dorset, Lancaster, and Derby: and endeavouring, by favours, to fix that vicious prince in his duty, he put it too much in his power, whenever he pleased, to depart from it. He likewise bestowed the see of York on Henry's natural son Geoffrey.

The king, impelled more by the love of military glory than by superstition, acted, from the beginning of his reign, as if the sole purpose of his government had been the relief of the Holy Land, and the recovery of Jerusalem from the Saracens. His zeal against infidels being communicated to his subjects, broke out in London on the day of his coronation (m), and made them find a crusade less dangerous, attended with more immediate profit. The prejudices of the age had made the lending of money on interest pass by the invidious name of usury: yet the necessity of the practice had still continued it, and the greater part of that kind of dealing fell principally into the hands of the Jews; who, being already deemed infamous on account of their religion, had no honour to lose, and were apt to exercise a profession, odious in itself, by every kind of rigour, and even sometimes by rapine and extortion. The industry and frugality of this people had put them in possession of all the ready money, which the idleness and profusion common to the English with other European nations, enabled them to lend at exorbitant and unequal interest. The monkish writers represent it as a great stain on the wise and equitable government of Henry, that he had carefully protected this infidel race from all injuries and insults; but the zeal of Richard afforded the populace a pretence for venting their animosity against them. The king had issued an edict prohibiting their appearance at his coronation; but some of them bringing him large presents from their nation, presumed, in confidence of that merit, to approach the hall in which he dined: being discovered, they were exposed to the insults of the bystanders; they took to flight; the people pursued them; the rumour was spread, that the king had issued orders to massacre all the Jews; a command so agreeable was executed in an instant on such as fell into the hands of the populace: those who had kept at home were exposed to equal danger; the people, moved by rapacity and zeal, broke into their houses, which they plundered, after having murdered the owners; where the Jews barricadoed their doors and defended themselves with vigour, the rabble set fire to the houses, and made way through the flames to exercise their pillage and violence; the usual licentiousness of London, which the sovereign power with difficulty restrained, broke out with fury and continued these outrages; the houses of the rich citizens, though Christians, were next attacked and plundered; and weariness and satiety at last put an end to the disorder; yet, when the king impowered Glanville, the justiciary, to inquire into the authors of these crimes, the guilt was found to involve so many of the most considerable citizens, that it was deemed more prudent to drop the prosecution; and very few suffered the punishment due to this enormity. But the disorder stopped not at London. The inhabitants of some other cities of England, particularly Lynn, Stamford, York, Lincoln, and other towns in which the Jews were numerous, hearing of this slaughter of the Jews, imitated the example: in York, five hundred of that nation, who had retired into the castle for safety, and found themselves unable to defend the place, murdered their own wives and children, threw the dead bodies over the walls upon the populace, and then setting fire to the houses, perished in the flames. The gentry of the neighbourhood, who were all indebted to the Jews, ran to the cathedral, where their bonds were kept, and made a solemn bonfire of the papers before the altar (n).

The ancient situation of England, when the people possessed little riches and the public no credit, made it impossible for sovereigns to bear the expence of a steady or durable war, even on their frontiers; much less could they find regular means for the support of distant expeditions like those into Palestine, which were more the result of popular frenzy than of sober reason or deliberate policy. Richard, therefore, knew that he must carry with him all the treasure necessary for his enterprize, and that both the remoteness of his own country and its poverty, made it unable to furnish him with those continued supplies which the exigencies of so perilous a war must necessarily require. His father had left him a treasure of above a hundred thousand marks; and the king, negligent of every consideration but his present object, endeavoured to augment this sum by all expedients, how pernicious soever to the public, or dangerous to royal authority. He put to sale the revenues and manors of the crown; the offices of greatest trust and power, even those of forester and sheriff, which anciently were so important (o), became venal; the dignity of chief justiciary, in whose hands was lodged the whole execution of the laws, was sold to Hugh de Puzas, bishop of Durham, for a thousand marks; the same prelate bought the earldom of Northumberland for his own life; and the honor of Sudbery, for him and his successors in that see for ever. The king received considerable sums from the barons of Bedfordshire, and the knights of Surrey, for permitting them to clear certain parts of their respective counties which had been converted into forest ground. Many of the champions of the cross, who had repented of their vow, purchased the liberty of violating it; and Richard, who stood less in need of men than of money, dispensed, on these conditions, with their attendance. Elated with the hopes of fame, which in that age attended no wars but those against the infidels, he was blind to every other consideration; and when some of his wiser ministers objected to this dissipation of the revenue and power of the crown, he replied, that he would sell London itself, could he find a purchaser. Nothing indeed could be a stronger proof how negligent he was of all future interests in comparison of the crusade, than his selling, for so small a sum as ten thousand marks, the vassalage of Scotland, together with the fortresses of Roxborough and Berwick, the greatest acquisition that had been made by his father during the course of his victorious reign; and his accepting the homage of William in the usual terms, merely for the territories which that prince held in England. The English of all ranks and stations, were oppressed by numerous exactions: menaces were employed, both against the innocent and the guilty, in order to extort money from them: and where a pretence was wanting against the rich, the king obliged them by the fear of his displeasure, to lend him sums which, he knew, it would never be in his power to repay.

But though Richard sacrificed every interest and consideration

(l) Richard seized the person of Stephen de Tours, whom the late king had entrusted with the care of his foreign treasures. Although this officer immediately delivered up his valuable charge, he was not released till he had gratified the rapacity of the new king by the surrender of his private fortune. Richard then continued him in his office of seneschal of Anjou, which he exercised with ability and diligence.

(m) The third of September, 1189.—Richard, after he had settled his affairs on the continent, embarked for England, and landed at Portsmouth on the 13th of August.

(n) The compiler of the Annals of Waverly, in relating these infamous events, blesses the Almighty for thus delivering over this impious race to destruction. Gale's Collec. vol. iii. p. 165.

sideration to the success of this pious enterprize, he carried so little the appearance of sanctity in his conduct, that Fulk, curate of Neuilly, a zealous preacher of the crusade, who from that merit had acquired the privilege of speaking the boldest truths, advised him to rid himself of his notorious vices, particularly his pride, avarice, and voluptuousness, which he called the king's three favourite daughters. "You counsel well," replied Richard, "and I have already provided husbands for them all. I give the first to the Templars, the second to the Benedictines, and the third to my prelates."

Richard, jealous of attempts which might be made on England during his absence on the crusade, laid prince John, as well as his natural brother Geoffrey archbishop of York, under engagements, confirmed by their oaths, that neither of them should enter the kingdom till his return; though before his departure, he withdrew this prohibition on the request of his mother. The administration of government was left in the hands of Hugh bishop of Durham, and of Longchamp bishop of Ely, whom he appointed justiciaries and guardians of the realm. The latter was a Frenchman of mean birth, and of a violent character; who by art and address had insinuated himself into the royal favour, whom Richard had created chancellor, and whom he had engaged the pope also to invest with legatine authority, that, by centering every kind of power in his person, he might the better ensure the public tranquillity. All the military and turbulent spirits flocked about the person of the king, and were impatient to distinguish themselves against the infidels in Asia, whither his inclinations and his engagements led him. Having made the above arrangement for the government of England, Richard embarked at Dover on the 11th of December, and landed the same evening at Gravelines; from whence he pursued his journey through Flanders into Normandy. Soon after his arrival on the continent he had an interview with the king of France, at Gue St. Remi, to settle all the preliminaries of their intended expedition.

The emperor Frederic, a prince of great spirit and conduct, had already taken the road to Palestine at the head of one hundred and fifty thousand men, collected from Germany and other northern nations. Having surmounted every obstacle thrown in his way by the artifices of the Greeks and the power of the infidels, he had penetrated to the borders of Syria; when, bathing in the cold river Cydnus during the greatest heat of the summer season, he was seized with a mortal distemper, which put an end to his life and his rash enterprize. His army, under the command of his son Conrade, reached Palestine; but was so diminished by fatigue, famine, maladies, and the sword, that it scarcely amounted to eight thousand men; and was unable to make any progress against the great power, valour, and conduct of Saladin. These reiterated calamities attending the crusades had taught the kings of England and France the necessity of trying another road to the Holy Land; and they determined to conduct their armies thither by sea, to carry provisions along with them, and by means of their naval power, to maintain an open communication with their own states, and with the western parts of Europe. The place of rendezvous was appointed in the plains of Vezelay, on the borders of Burgundy; Philip and Richard, on their arrival there, on the 29th of June, 1190, found their combined army amount to one hundred thousand men.

The French prince and the English here reiterated their promises of cordial friendship, pledged their faith not to invade each other's dominions during the crusade, mutually exchanged the oaths of all their barons and prelates to the same effect, and subjected themselves to the penalty of interdicts and excommunications, if they should ever violate this public and solemn engagement. They left Vezelay on the first of July, and marched in one body to Lyons; but, finding it extremely inconvenient to proceed in the same order, the two kings parted at that city. Philip took the road to Genoa, Richard that to Marseilles, with a view of meeting their fleets, which were severally appointed to rendezvous in these harbours. They put to sea on the 14th of September; and, nearly about the same time, were obliged, by stress of weather, to take shelter in Messina, where they were detained during the whole winter. The king of France with his army remained in the city, and Richard took up his quarters in the suburbs. This incident laid the foundation of animosities which proved fatal to their enterprize (q).

The last king of Sicily and Naples was William II. who had married Joan, sister to Richard, and who, dying without issue, had bequeathed his dominions to his parental aunt Constantia, the only legitimate surviving descendant of Roger, the first sovereign of those states who had been honoured with the royal title. This princess had, in expectation of that rich inheritance, been married to Henry VI. the reigning emperor; but Tancred, her natural brother, had fixed such an interest among the barons, that, taking advantage of Henry's absence, he had acquired possession of the throne, and maintained his claim, by force of arms, against all the efforts of the Germans. The approach of the crusaders gave him apprehensions for his unstable government; and he was uncertain, whether he had most reason to dread the presence of the French or of the English monarch. Philip was engaged in a strict alliance with the emperor his competitor: Richard was disgusted by his rigours towards the queen-dowager, whom the Sicilian prince had confined in Palermo; because she had opposed with all her interest his succession to the crown. Tancred, therefore, sensible of the present necessity, resolved to pay court to both these formidable princes; and his attempts were not unsuccessful. He persuaded Philip that it was improper for him to interrupt his enterprize against the infidels, by any attack upon a Christian state: he restored Queen Joan to her liberty; and found means to make an alliance with Richard, who stipulated by treaty to marry his nephew Arthur, the young duke of Bretagne, to one of the daughters of Tancred. But before these terms of friendship were settled, Richard, jealous both of Tancred and the inhabitants of Messina, had taken up his quarters in the suburbs, as above-mentioned, and had possessed himself of a smal fort, which commanded the harbour; and he kept himself on his guard against their machinations. The citizens took umbrage in October. Mutual insults and attacks passed between them and the English: Philip, who had fixed his quarters in the town, endeavoured to accommodate the quarrel, and held a conference with Richard for that purpose. While the two kings, meeting in the open fields, were engaged in discourse on this subject, a body of those Sicilians seemed to be drawing towards them; and Richard pushed forwards, in order to inquire into the reason of this extraordinary movement. The English, insolent from their power, and inflamed with former animosities, wanted but a pretence for attacking the Messinese: they soon chased them off the field, drove them into the town, and entered with them at the gate. The king employed his authority to restrain them from committing violence on the defenceless inhabitants; but he gave orders, in token of his victory, that the standard of England should be erected on the walls. Philip, who considered that place as his quarters, exclaimed against the insult, and ordered some of his troops to pull down the standard: but Richard informed him by a messenger, that, though he himself would willingly remove that ground of offence, he would not permit it to be done by others; and if the French king attempted such an insult upon him, he should not succeed but by the utmost effusion of blood. Philip, content with this species of haughty submission, recalled his orders: the difference was seemingly accommodated; but still left the remains of rancour and jealousy in the breasts of the two sovereigns.

Tancred, who, for his own security, desired to inflame their mutual hatred, employed an artifice which might have been attended with consequences still more fatal. He showed Richard a letter in the beginning of 1191, signed by the French king, and delivered to him, as he pretended, by the duke of Burgundy; in which that monarch desired Tancred to fall upon the quarters of the English, and promised to assist him in putting them to the sword, as common enemies. The unwary Richard gave credit to the information; but was too candid not to betray his discontent to Philip, who absolutely denied the letter, and charged the Sicilian prince with forgery and falsehood. Richard either was, or pretended to be, entirely satisfied.

(q) Richard and Philip were, by the situation and extent of their dominions, rivals in power; by their age and inclinations, competitors for glory; and these causes of emulation which, had the princes been employed in the field against the common enemy, might have stimulated them to martial enterprizes, soon excited, during the present leisure and repose, quarrels between monarchs of such a fiery character. Equally haughty, ambitious, intrepid, and inflexible, they were irritated with the least appearance of injury, and were incapable, by mutual condescensions, to efface those causes of complaint which unavoidably arose between them. Richard, candid, sincere, undesigning, impolitic, violent, laid himself open, on every occasion, to the designs of his antagonist: who, provident, interested, intriguing, failed not to take all advantages against him: and thus both, the circumstances of their disposition in which they were similar, and those in which they differed, rendered it impossible to preserve that harmony which was so necessary to the success of their understanding.

Lest these jealousies and complaints should multiply between them, it was proposed, that they should, by a solemn treaty, obviate all future differences, and adjust every point that could possibly hereafter become a controversy between them. But this expedient started a new dispute, which might have proved more dangerous than any of the foregoing, and which deeply concerned the honour of Philip's family. When Richard, in every treaty with the late king, insisted on being permitted to marry Adelais of France, he had only sought a pretence for quarrelling; and never meant to take to his bed a princess suspected of a criminal amour with his own father. After he became master, he no longer spake of that alliance: he even took measures for espousing Berengaria, daughter of Sanchez king of Navarre, with whom he had become enamoured during his abode in Guienne: queen Eleanor was daily expected with that princess at Messina: and when Philip renewed to him his applications for espousing his sister Adelais, Richard gave him an absolute refusal (p). It is certain, from the treaty itself, which remains in Rymer's Fœdera, vol. i. p. 69, that Philip permitted Richard to give his hand to Berengaria; and having settled all other controversies with that prince, he immediately set sail for the Holy Land, on the 30th of March, 1191. Richard awaited some time the arrival of his mother and bride; and when they joined him, he separated his fleet into two squadrons, and set forward on his enterprize on the 10th of April, with a fleet of two hundred sail. Queen Eleanor returned to England; but Berengaria, and the queen dowager of Sicily, his sister, attended him on the expedition.

The English fleet, two days after leaving the port of Messina, met with a furious tempest; and the squadron on which the two princesses were embarked, was driven on the coast of Cyprus, and some of the vessels were wrecked near Limisso the capital of that island. Isaac, king of Cyprus, who assumed the magnificent title of emperor, pillaged the ships that were stranded, threw the seamen and passengers into prison, and even refused to the princesses liberty, in their dangerous situation, of entering the harbour of Limisso. But Richard, who arrived soon after, took ample vengeance on him for the injury. He disembarked his troops; defeated the tyrant, who opposed his landing; entered Limisso by storm; gained next day a second victory; obliged Isaac to surrender at discretion; and established governors over the island. The Greek prince, being thrown into prison and loaded with irons, complained of the little regard with which he was treated: upon which Richard ordered silver fetters to be made for him; and this emperor, pleased with the distinction, expressed a sense of the generosity of his conqueror. The king here espoused Berengaria, on the 12th of May, who, immediately embarking, carried along with her to Palestine, (where she landed on the first of June,) the daughter of the Cypriot prince; a dangerous rival, who was believed to have seduced the affections of her husband. Such, says Hume, were the libertine character and conduct of the heroes engaged in this pious enterprize!

The English army arrived in time to partake in the glory of the siege of Acre or Ptolemais, which had been attacked for above two years by the united force of all the Christians in Palestine, and had been defended by the utmost efforts of Saladin and the Saracens. The remains of the German army, conducted by the emperor Frederic, and the separate body of adventurers who continually poured in from the West, had enabled the king of Jerusalem to form this important enterprize: but Saladin, having thrown a strong garrison into the place under the command of Caracos, his own master in the art of war, and molesting the besiegers with continual attacks and sallies, had protracted the success of the enterprize, and wasted the force of his enemies. The arrival of Philip and Richard inspired new life into the Christians; and these princes, acting by concert, and sharing the honour and danger of every action, gave hopes of a final victory over the infidels. They agreed on this plan of operations: when the French monarch attacked the town, the English guarded the trenches: next day, when the English prince conducted the assault, the French succeeded him in providing for the safety of the assailants. The emulation between those rival kings and rival nations produced extraordinary acts of valour: Richard, in particular, animated with a more precipitate courage than Philip, and more agreeable to the romantic spirit of that age, drew to himself the general attention, and acquired a great and splendid reputation. But this harmony was of short duration; and occasions of discord soon arose between these jealous and haughty monarchs.

The family of Boüillon, which had first been placed on the throne of Jerusalem, ending in a female, Fulk, count of Anjou, grandfather to Henry II. of England, married the heiress of that kingdom, and transmitted his title to the younger branches of his family. The Anjevin race ending also in a female, Guy de Lusignan, by espousing Sibylla, the heiress, had succeeded to the title; and though he lost his kingdom by the invasion of Saladin, he was still acknowledged by all the Christians for king of Jerusalem. But as Sibylla died without issue, during the siege of Acre, Isabella, her youngest sister, put in her claim to that titular kingdom, and required Lusignan to resign his pretensions to her husband Conrade marquis of Montferrat. Lusignan, maintaining that the royal title was unalienable and indefeazable, had recourse to the protection of Richard, attended on him before he left Cyprus, and engaged him to embrace his cause. There needed no other reason for throwing Philip into the party of Conrade; and the opposite views of these great monarchs brought faction and dissention into the Christian army, and retarded all its operations. The Templars, the Genoese, and the Germans, declared for Philip and Conrade; the Flemings, the Pisans, the knights of the hospital of St. John, adhered to Richard and Lusignan. But notwithstanding these disputes, as the length of the siege had reduced the Saracen garrison to the last extremity, they surrendered themselves prisoners on the 12th of July, stipulated that the garrison should be allowed to march out only in their shirts, leaving all their arms and baggage behind them; that Saladin should restore the true cross, with two thousand five hundred Christian prisoners of the greatest note; that he should cause to be paid to the two victorious monarchs two hundred thousand pieces of gold, called Bysantines, for the ransom of the garrison, who were to be retained as hostages till the payment of the money (r). Thus this great enterprize, which had long engaged the attention of all Europe and Asia, was at last, after the loss of three hundred thousand men, six archbishops, twelve bishops, forty earls, and five hundred barons, brought to a happy period.

But Philip, instead of pursuing the hopes of farther conquest, and of redeeming the holy city from slavery, being disgusted with the ascendant assumed and acquired by Richard, and having views of many advantages which he might reap by his presence in Europe, declared his resolution of returning to France; and he pleaded his bad state of health as an excuse for his desertion of the common cause. He left, however, to Richard, ten thousand of his troops, under the command of the duke of Burgundy; and he renewed his oath never to commence hostilities against that prince's dominions during his absence. But he had no sooner reached Italy than he applied, it is pretended, to pope Celestine III. for a dispensation from this vow; and when denied that request, he still proceeded, though after a covert manner, in a project, which the present situation of England rendered inviting, and which gratified, in an eminent degree, both his ambition and his revenge.

Immediately after Richard had left England, and begun his march to the Holy Land, the two prelates, whom

(q) It is pretended by Hoveden, and other historians, that he was able to produce such convincing proofs of Adelais's infidelity, and even of her having borne a child to Henry, that her brother desisted from his applications, and chose to conceal the dishonour of his family, and consign it to oblivion.

(r) However great the glory acquired by Richard in the siege of Acre, the lustre of it was tarnished by an act of vindictive inhumanity. Saladin having refused to restore the cross, and pay the sum stipulated by the treaty, Richard was so enraged at his perfidy, that he ordered the Mohammedan hostages, amounting to two thousand seven hundred persons, to be brought out before the town, and beheaded in the sight of their countrymen. This mark of cruelty was immediately retaliated by Saladin, who ordered the instant decapitation of a considerable number of Christian prisoners.

he

he had appointed guardians of the realm, broke out into animosities against each other, and threw the kingdom into combustion. Longchamp, presumptuous in his nature, elated by the favour which he enjoyed with his master, and armed with the legatine commission, could not submit to an equality with the bishop of Durham: he even arrested his colleague, and extorted from him a resignation of the earldom of Northumberland, and of his other dignities, as the price of his liberty. The king, informed of these dissensions, ordered, by letters from Marseilles, that the bishop should be reinstated in his offices; but Longchamp had still the boldness to refuse compliance, on pretence that himself was better acquainted with the king's secret intentions. He proceeded to govern the kingdom by his sole authority; to treat all the nobility with arrogance; and to display his power and riches with an invidious ostentation. He never travelled without a strong guard of fifteen hundred foreign soldiers, collected from that licentious tribe with which the age was generally infested. Nobles and knights were proud of being admitted into his train: his retinue wore the aspect of royal magnificence; and when, in his progress through the kingdom, he lodged in any monastery, his attendants, it is said, were sufficient to devour, in one night, the revenue of several years. The king, who was detained in Europe longer than the haughty prelate expected, hearing of this ostentation, which exceeded even what the habits of that age indulged in ecclesiastics; being also informed of the insolent and tyrannical conduct of his minister; thought proper to restrain his power: he sent new orders, appointing Walter archbishop of Roüen, William Mareshal earl of Strigul, Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, William Briewere, and Hugh Bardolf, counsellors to Longchamp; and commanding him to take no measure of importance without their concurrence and approbation. But the violence of this turbulent prelate had diffused such general terror among the people, that even the archbishop of Roüen and the earl of Strigul durst not produce the king's mandate; and Longchamp still maintained an uncontrouled authority over the nation. But when he proceeded so far as to throw into prison, Geoffrey archbishop of York, who had opposed his measures, this breach of ecclesiastical privileges excited such an universal ferment, that prince John, disgusted with the small share he possessed in the government, and personally disobliged by Longchamp, ventured to summon, at Reading, a general council of the nobility and prelates, and cite him to appear before them. Longchamp thought it dangerous to entrust his person in their hands, and he shut himself up in the Tower of London; but being soon obliged to surrender that fortress, he fled beyond sea, concealed under a female habit, and was deprived of his offices of chancellor and chief justiciary; the last of which was conferred on the archbishop of Roüen, a prelate of prudence and moderation. The commission of legate, however, which had been renewed to Longchamp by pope Celestine, still gave him, notwithstanding his absence, great authority in the kingdom, enabled him to disturb the government, and forwarded the views of Philip, who watched every opportunity of annoying Richard's dominions. That monarch held a conference with the seneschal of Normandy on the 20th of January, 1192, in which he demanded the cession of Gisors; and, his request being rejected with scorn, he attempted to carry open war into Normandy; but as the French nobility refused to follow him in an invasion of a state which they had sworn to protect, and as the pope, who was the general guardian of all princes that had taken the cross, threatened him with ecclesiastical censures, he desisted from his enterprize, and employed against England the expedient of secret policy and intrigue. He debauched prince John from his allegiance; promised him his sister Adelais in marriage; offered to give him possession of all Richard's transmarine dominions; and had not the authority of queen Eleanor, and the menaces of the English council, prevailed over the inclinations of that turbulent prince, he was ready to have crossed the seas, and to have put in execution his criminal projects.

The jealousy of Philip was every moment excited by the glory which the great actions of Richard were gaining him in the East, and which, being compared to his own desertion of that popular cause, threw a double lustre on his rival. His envy, therefore, prompted him to obscure that fame which he had not equalled; and he embraced every opportunity of throwing the most violent and improbable calumnies on the king of England. There was a petty prince in Asia, commonly called "The old man of the mountain," who had acquired such an ascendant over his fanatical subjects, that they paid the most implicit deference to his commands; esteemed assassination meritorious, when sanctified by his mandate; courted danger, and even certain death, in the execution of his orders; and fancied, that when they sacrificed their lives for his sake, the highest joys of paradise were the infallible reward of their devoted obedience. It was the custom of this prince, when he imagined himself injured, to dispatch secretly some of his subjects against the aggressor, to charge them with the execution of his revenge, to instruct them in every art of disguising their purpose; and no precaution was sufficient to guard any man, however powerful, against the attempts of those subtle and determined ruffians. The greatest monarchs stood in awe of this prince of the Assassins (for that was the name of his people; whence the word has passed into most European languages), and it was the highest indiscretion in Conrade marquis of Montferrat to offend and affront him. The inhabitants of Tyre, who were governed by that nobleman, had put to death some of this dangerous people: the prince demanded satisfaction: for, as he piqued himself on never beginning any offence, he had his regular and established formalities in requiring atonement: Conrade treated his messengers with disdain, the prince issued the fatal orders: two of his subjects, who had insinuated themselves in disguise among Conrade's guards, openly, in the streets of Sidon, wounded him mortally; and when they were seized and put to the most cruel tortures, they triumphed amidst their agonies, and rejoiced that they had been destined by Heaven to suffer in so just and meritorious a cause. Every one in Palestine knew from what hand the blow came. Richard was entirely free from suspicion. Though that monarch had formerly espoused the cause of Lusignan against Conrade, he had become sensible of the bad effects attending those dissentions, and had voluntarily conferred on the former the kingdom of Cyprus, on condition that he should resign to his rival all pretensions to the crown of Jerusalem. Conrade himself, with his dying breath, had recommended his widow to the protection of Richard; the prince of the Assassins avowed the action in a formal narrative which he sent to Europe; yet on this foundation, the king of France thought fit to build the most egregious calumnies, and to impute to Richard the murder of the marquis of Montferrat, whose elevation he had once openly opposed. He filled all Europe with exclamations against the crime; appointed a guard for his own person, in order to defend himself against a like attempt; and endeavoured by these artifices, to cover the infamy of attacking the dominions of a prince, whom himself had deserted, and who was engaged with so much glory in a war, universally acknowledged to be the common cause of the christian world.

After Philip's departure, the whole burden of the war devolved upon Richard, who found himself in a very perplexed situation, owing to the contest between Guy of Lusignan and Conrade marquis of Montferrat about the crown of Jerusalem. This competition had occasioned great dissentions in the army, till an accommodation was effected by the interposition of the other christian princes, by which it was settled, that Lusignan should possess the kingdom for life; that the succession should fall to Conrade and his heirs; and that, in the interim, they should divide its revenues between them.

Notwithstanding this pacification, Conrade still maintained a correspondence with Saladin, and avoided a junction with the king of England: who having repaired the walls of Ascalon, quitted that city on the 25th of August, and directed his march towards Joppa along the sea coast, for the convenience of being supplied with provisions from his fleet. Saladin, at the head of an army of three hundred thousand men, attended his motions, and harassed his troops with perpetual skirmishes, in which astonishing acts of valour were performed on both sides. At length Richard, in no wise dismayed by the superiority of their numbers, determined to bring the enemy to a general engagement: accordingly, on the 6th of September was fought one of the greatest battles of that age. Early in the day, the right wing of the christians, commanded by James d'Avesnes, and the left, commanded by the duke of Burgundy, were thrown into disorder; when Richard, who led on the main body, restored the battle; and, by a wonderful display of personal courage and military skill, turned the tide of success in favour of the christians. The Saracens were completely defeated, with the loss of forty thousand men, who perished in the field.

After

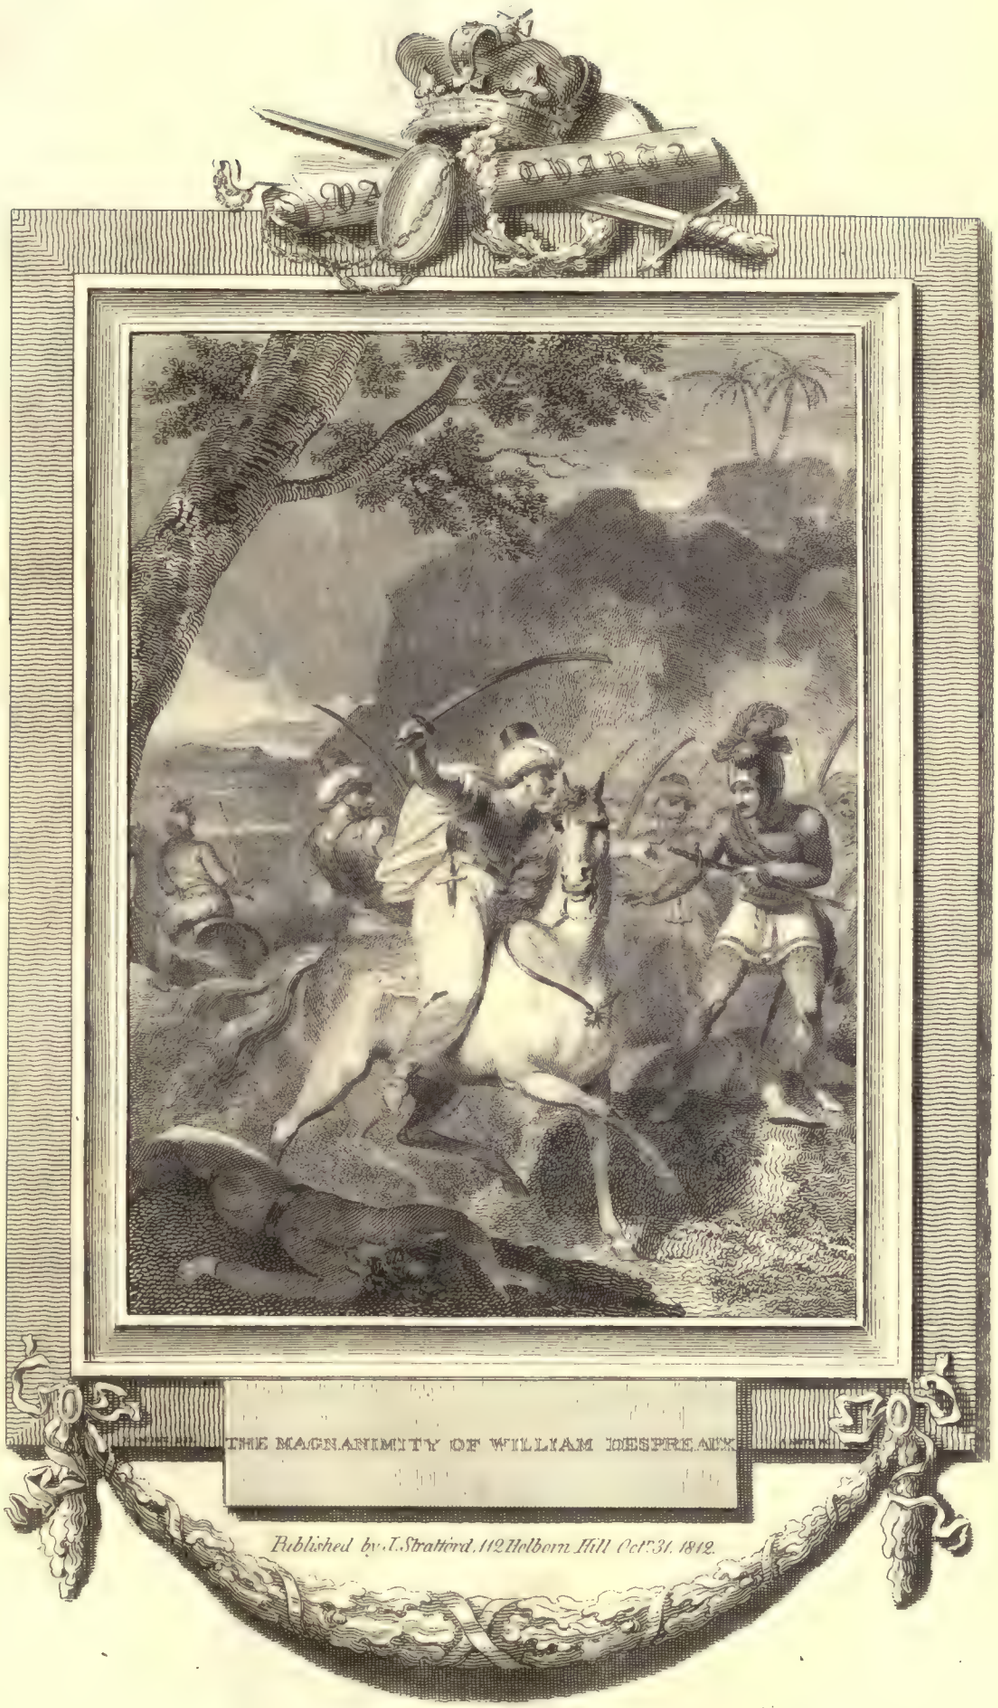
After this important victory the Christian army continued their march to Joppa, which they found deserted by its inhabitants, and almost demolished. Richard proposed, therefore, to proceed with all possible expedition to Ascalon; but the duke of Burgundy, who had received secret instructions from his sovereign to thwart all the projects of the king of England, insisted, with such inflexible pertinacity, on staying to repair Joppa, that he was compelled to consent.

During his stay in this city an adventure befel Richard that had nearly been attended with fatal consequences. As he was one day returning from hunting, finding himself considerably fatigued, he alighted from his horse, and laid himself down to sleep beneath a tree, with only six attendants about his person: when he was rouzed by the sudden appearance of a party of Saracen horse. As they were but few in number, he mounted his horse and pursued them, till they drew him into an ambuscade, that consisted of a whole squadron. Richard, who was unused to fly, defended himself with wonderful bravery; but four of his attendants being slain, he must inevitably have been taken, but for a stratagem of William Despreaux, one of his company; who, seeing his danger, cried out in the Saracen language, "I am the king of England!" This exclamation immediately drew the attention of the enemy on himself, and all their efforts were accordingly directed to make themselves masters of his person, which gave Richard time to provide for his safety by flight; while the Saracens, content with their success, conducted their prisoner to Saladin. Despreaux had the prudence not to discover himself till he came into the presence of the Sultan, to whom he ingenuously confessed the stratagem he had adopted to save his sovereign. Saladin highly commended his fidelity, but being sensible that Richard would not suffer so faithful a servant to remain long in captivity, fixed his ransom so high, that he procured ten emirs, or Saracen princes, in exchange for him.

After remaining seven weeks at Joppa, Richard, in the beginning of November, began his march to Jerusalem; but his progress was considerably retarded, as well by the heavy rains and frequent assaults of the enemy, as by the numerous castles that had been demolished by the Saracens, which he found it necessary to rebuild: and when he had surmounted every obstacle, and had arrived in the vicinity of the holy city, in the last week of December, the Templars, Hospitallers, and Pisans, at the instigation of the duke of Burgundy, opposed the commencement of the siege, and compelled him to return to Ascalon.

There appeared now an absolute necessity of abandoning for the present all hopes of farther conquest, and of securing the acquisitions of the christians by an accommodation with Saladin. Richard, therefore, concluded a truce with that monarch, and stipulated, that Acre, Joppa, and other sea-port towns of Palestine, should remain in the hands of the Christians, and that every one of that religion should have liberty to perform his pilgrimage to Jerusalem unmolested. This truce was concluded for three years, three months, three weeks, three days, and three hours; a magical number, which had probably been devised by the Europeans, and which was suggested by a superstition well suited to the object of the war (s).

There remained, after the truce, no business of importance to detain Richard in Palestine; and the intelligence which he received, concerning the intrigues of his brother John, and those of the king of France, made him sensible, that his presence was necessary in Europe. He left the port of Acon in a swift sailing vessel, on the 9th of October, (having previously sent away the queens of England and Sicily,) and as he dared not to pass through France, he sailed to the Adriatic; where being shipwrecked near Aquileia, he put on the disguise of a pilgrim, with a purpose of taking his journey secretly through Germany. Pursued by the governor of Istria, he was forced out of the direct road to England, and was obliged to pass by Vienna; where his expenses and liberalities betrayed the monarch in the habit of the pilgrim; and he was arrested on the 20th of December, by order of Leopold duke of Austria. This prince had served under Richard at the siege of Acre; but being disgusted by some insult of that monarch, he was so ungenerous as to seize the present opportunity of gratifying at once his avarice and revenge; and he threw the king into prison. The emperor Henry VI. who also considered Richard as an enemy, on account of the alliance contracted by him with Tancred king of Sicily, dispatched messengers to the duke of Austria, required the royal captive to be delivered to him, and stipulated a large sum of money as a reward for this service. Thus the king of England, who had filled the whole world with his renown, found himself, in the beginning of 1193, during the most critical state of his affairs, confined in a dungeon, and loaded with irons, in the heart of Germany, and entirely at the mercy of his enemies, the basest and most sordid of men.



The English council was astonished on receiving this fatal intelligence; and foresaw all the dangerous consequences which might naturally arise from that event. The queen-dowager wrote reiterated letters to pope Celestine, exclaiming against the injury which her son had sustained; representing the impiety of detaining in prison the most illustrious prince that had yet carried the banners of Christ into the Holy Land; claiming the protection of the apostolic see, which was due even to the meanest of those adventurers; and upbraiding the pope, that, in a cause where justice, religion, and the dignity of the church, were so much concerned, a cause which it might well befit his holiness himself to support by taking in person a journey to Germany, the spiritual thunders should so long be suspended over those sacrilegious offenders. The zeal of Celestine corresponded not to the impatience of the queen-mother; and the regency of England were, for a long time, left to struggle alone with all their domestic and foreign enemies.

The king of France, quickly informed of Richard's confinement by a message from the emperor, prepared himself to take advantage of the incident; and employed every means of force and intrigue, of war and negociation, against the dominions and the person of his unfortunate rival. He revived the calumny of Richard's assassinating the marquis of Montferrat; and by that absurd pretence he induced his barons to violate their oaths, by which they had engaged that, during the crusade, they never would, on any account, attack the dominions of the king of England. He made the emperor the largest offers, if he would deliver into his hands the royal prisoner, or at least detain him in perpetual captivity: he even formed an alliance by marriage with the king of Denmark, desired that the ancient Danish claim to the crown of England should be transferred to him, and solicited a supply of shipping to maintain it. But the most successful of Philip's negociations was with prince John, who, forgetting every tye to his brother, his sovereign, and his benefactor, thought of nothing but how to make his own advantage of the public calamities. That traitor, on the first invitation from the court of France, suddenly went abroad, had a conference with Philip, and made a treaty, of which the object was the perpetual ruin of his unhappy brother. He stipulated to deliver into Philip's hands all that part of Normandy which lies north of the Seine, except Roüen, and some other towns: he received, in return, the investiture of all Richard's transmarine dominions; and it is reported by several historians, that he even did homage to the French king for the crown of England.

This treaty being concluded, Philip invaded Normandy; and by the treachery of John's emissaries, made himself master, without opposition, of many fortresses, Neufchatel, Neauffle, Gisors, Pacey, Ivree: he subdued the counties of Eu and Aumale; and advancing to form the siege of Roüen, he threatened to put all the inhabitants to the sword, if they dared to make resistance. Fortunately, Robert earl of Leicester appeared in that critical moment. This gallant nobleman, who had acquired great honour dur-

(s) The liberty, in which Saladin indulged the Christians, to perform their pilgrimages to Jerusalem, was an easy sacrifice on his part; and the furious wars which he waged in defence of the barren territory of Judea, were not with him, as with the European adventurers, the result of superstition, but of policy. The advantage indeed of science, moderation, humanity, was at that time entirely on the side of the Saracens; and this gallant emperor, in particular, displayed, during the course of the war, a spirit and generosity, which even his bigotted enemies were obliged to acknowledge and admire. Richard, equally martial and brave, carried with him more of the barbarian character; and was guilty of acts of ferocity, which threw a stain on his celebrated victories. When Saladin refused to ratify the capitulation of Acre, the king of England ordered all his prisoners, to the number of five thousand, to be butchered; and the Saracens found themselves obliged to retaliate upon the Christians by a like cruelty. Saladin died at Damascus soon after concluding this truce with the princes of the crusade. It is memorable, that, before he expired, he ordered his winding-sheet to be carried as a standard through every street in the city; while a crier went before, and proclaimed with a loud voice, "This is all that remains to the mighty Saladin, the conqueror of the East." By his last will he ordered charities to be distributed to the poor, without distinction of Jew, Christian, or Mohammedan.

ing the crusade, and who, being more happy than his master in finding his passage homewards, took on him the command in Roüen, and exerted himself, by his exhortations and example, to infuse courage into the dismayed Normans, whom he advised to despise the menaces of the French king. Philip was repulsed in every attack; the time of service from his vassals expired; and he consented to a truce with the English regency, on the 9th of July, 1193: he received in return the promise of twenty thousand marks, and had four castles put into his hands, as security for the payment.

Prince John, who, with a view of increasing the general confusion, went over to England, was still less successful in his enterprizes. He was only able to make himself master of the castles of Windsor and Wallingford; but when he arrived in London, and claimed the kingdom as heir to his brother, of whose death he pretended to have received certain intelligence, he was rejected by all the barons, and measures were taken to oppose and subdue him. The justiciaries, supported by the general affection of the people, provided so well for the defence of the kingdom, that John was obliged, after some fruitless efforts, to conclude a truce with them; and before its expiration, he thought proper to return into France, where he openly avowed his alliance with Philip.

In the mean time the high spirit of Richard suffered in Germany every kind of insult and indignity. The French ambassadors, in their master's name, renounced him as a vassal to the crown of France, and declared all his fiefs to be forfeited to his liege-lord. The emperor, that he might render him more impatient for the recovery of his liberty, and make him submit to the payment of a larger ransom, treated him with the greatest severity, and reduced him to a condition worse than that of the meanest malefactor. He was even produced before the diet of the empire at Worms, on the 13th of July, and accused by Henry of many crimes and misdemeanors; of making an alliance with Tancred, the usurper of the crown of Sicily; of turning the arms of the crusade against a Christian prince, and subduing Cyprus; of affronting the duke of Austria before Acre; of obstructing the progress of the Christian arms by his quarrels with the king of France; of assassinating Conrade marquis of Montferrat; and of concluding a truce with Saladin, and leaving Jerusalem in the hands of the Saracen emperor. Richard, whose spirit was not broken by his misfortunes, and whose genius was rather roused by these frivolous or scandalous imputations; after premising that his dignity exempted him from answering before any jurisdiction, except that of Heaven; yet condescended, for the sake of his reputation, to justify his conduct before that great assembly. He observed, that he had no hand in Tancred's elevation, and only concluded a treaty with a prince, whom he found in possession of the throne: that the king or rather tyrant of Cyprus, had provoked his indignation by the most ungenerous and unjust proceedings; and though he chastised this aggressor, he had not retarded a moment the progress of his chief enterprize: that if he had at any time been wanting in civility to the duke of Austria, he had already been sufficiently punished for that sally of passion; and it better became men, embarked together in so holy a cause, to forgive each other's infirmities, than to pursue a slight offence with such unrelenting vengeance; that it had sufficiently appeared by the event, whether the king of France or he were most zealous for the conquest of the Holy Land, and were most likely to sacrifice private passions and animosities to that great object; that if the whole tenor of his life had not shewn him incapable of a base assassination, and justified him from that imputation in the eyes of his very enemies, it was in vain for him, at present, to make his apology, or plead the many irrefragable arguments which he could produce in his own favour: and that, however he might regret the necessity, he was so far from being ashamed of his truce with Saladin, that he rather gloried in that event; and thought it extremely honourable, that, though abandoned by all the world, supported only by his own courage and by the small remains of his national troops, he could yet obtain such conditions from the most powerful and most warlike emperor that the east had ever yet produced. Richard, after thus deigning to apologize for his conduct, burst out into indignation at the cruel treatment which he had met with; that he, the champion of the cross, still wearing that honourable badge, should, after expending the blood and treasure of his subjects in the common cause of Christendom, be intercepted by Christian princes in his return to his own country, be thrown into a dungeon, be loaded with irons, be obliged to plead his cause, as if he were a subject and a malefactor; and, what he still more regretted, be thereby prevented from making preparations for a new crusade, which he had projected, after the expiration of the truce, and from redeeming the sepulchre of Christ, which had so long been profaned by the dominion of infidels. The spirit and eloquence of Richard made such impression on the German princes, that they exclaimed loudly against the conduct of the emperor; the pope threatened him with excommunication; and Henry, who had hearkened to the proposals of the king of France and prince John, found that it would be impracticable for him to execute his and their base purposes, or to detain the king of England any longer in captivity. He therefore concluded with him a treaty for his ransom, and agreed to restore him to his freedom for the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand marks, about three hundred thousand pounds of our present money; of which one hundred thousand marks were to be paid before he received his liberty, and sixty-seven hostages delivered as a security for the payment of the remainder. The emperor, as if to gloss over the infamy of this transaction, made at the same time a present to Richard of the kingdom of Arles, comprehending Provence, Dauphiny, Narbonne, and other states, over which the empire had some antiquated claims; a present which the king very wisely neglected to attempt taking possession of.

The captivity of the superior lord was one of the cases provided for by the feudal tenures; and all the vassals were in that event obliged to give an aid for his ransom. Twenty shillings were therefore levied on each knight's fee in England; but as this money came in slowly, and was not sufficient for the intended purpose, the voluntary zeal of the people readily supplied the deficiency. The churches and monasteries melted down their plate, to the amount of thirty thousand marks; the bishops, abbots, and nobles, paid a fourth of their yearly rent; the parochial clergy contributed a tenth of their tithes; and the requisite sum being thus collected, queen Eleanor, and Walter archbishop of Roüen, set out with it for Germany on the 4th of February, 1194; paid the money to the emperor and the duke of Austria at Mentz; delivered them hostages for the remainder, and freed Richard from captivity. His escape was very critical. Henry had been detected in the assassination of the bishop of Liege, and in an attempt of a like nature on the duke of Louvain; and finding himself extremely disagreeable to the German princes on account of these odious practices, he had determined to seek support from an alliance with the king of France; to detain Richard, the enemy of that prince, in perpetual captivity; to keep in his hands the money which he had already received for his ransom; and to extort fresh sums from Philip and prince John, who were very liberal in their offers to him. He therefore gave orders that Richard should be pursued and arrested; but the king making all imaginable haste, had already embarked at the mouth of the Scheldt, and was out of sight of land, when the messengers of the emperor reached Antwerp.

Richard landed at Sandwich on the 20th of March, and proceeded to London. The joy of the English was extreme on the appearance of their monarch, who had suffered so many calamities, who had acquired so much glory, and who had spread the reputation of their name into the East, whither their fame had never before been able to extend. He gave them, soon after his arrival, an opportunity of publicly displaying their exultation, by ordering himself to be crowned anew at Winchester, on the 17th of April; as if he intended, by that ceremony, to reinstate himself in his throne, and to wipe off the ignominy of his captivity. Their satisfaction was not damped, even when he declared his purpose of resuming all those exorbitant grants, which he had been necessitated to make before his departure for the Holy Land. The barons also, in a great council, confiscated, on account of his treason, all prince John's possessions in England; and assisted the king in reducing the fortresses which still remained in the hands of his brother's adherents. Richard, having settled every thing in England, he collected his forces, embarked at Portsmouth on board a fleet of a hundred sail, and landed at Barfleur in Normandy, on the 12th of May; being impatient to make war on Philip, and to revenge himself for the many injuries which he had received from that monarch. As soon as Philip heard of the king's deliverance from captivity, he wrote to his confederate John, in these terms: "Take care of yourself: the devil is broken loose."

When we consider such powerful and martial monarchs, inflamed with personal animosity against each other, enraged by mutual injuries, excited by rivalship, impelled by opposite interests, and instigated by the pride and violence of their own temper; our curiosity is naturally raised, and we expect an obstinate and furious war, distinguished by the greatest events, and concluded by some remarkable catastrophe. Yet are the incidents, which attend those hostilities, so frivolous, that scarcely any historian can entertain such a passion for military descriptions as to venture on a detail of them: a certain proof of the extreme weakness of princes in those ages, and of the little authority they possessed over their refractory vassals! The whole amount of the exploits on both sides is, the taking of a castle, the surprize of a straggling party, a renconter of horse, which resembles more a rout than a battle. Richard obliged Philip to raise the siege of Verneüil; he took Lochis, a small town in Anjou; he made himself master of Beaumont, and some other places of little consequence; and after these trivial exploits, the two kings began already to hold conferences for an accommodation. Philip insisted that, if a general peace were concluded, the barons on each side should, for the future, be prohibited from carrying on private wars against each other: but Richard replied, that this was a right claimed by his vassals, and he could not debar them from it. After this fruitless negociation, there ensued an action between the French and English cavalry at Fretteval, on the 5th of July, in which the former were routed, and the king of France's cartulary and records, which commonly at that time attended his person, were taken. But this victory leading to no important advantages, a truce for a year was at last, from mutual weakness, concluded between the two monarchs, on the 23rd of that month.

During this war, prince John deserted from Philip, threw himself at his brother's feet, craved pardon for his offences, and by the intercession of queen Eleanor was received into favour. "I forgive him," said the king, "and hope I shall as easily forget his injuries, as he will my pardon." John was incapable even of returning to his duty, without committing a baseness. Before he left Philip's party, he invited to dinner all the officers of the garrison which that prince had placed in the citadel of Evreux; he massacred them during the entertainment; fell, with the assistance of the townsmen, on the garrison, whom he put to the sword; and then delivered up the place to his brother.

The king of France was the great object of Richard's resentment and animosity; the conduct of John, as well as that of the emperor and duke of Austria, had been so base, and was exposed to such general odium and reproach, that the king deemed himself sufficiently revenged for their injuries; and he seems never to have entertained any project of vengeance against any of them. The duke of Austria, about this time, having crushed his leg by the fall of his horse at a tournament, on St. Stephen's day, was thrown into a fever; and being struck on the approaches of death, with remorse for his injustice to Richard, he ordered, by will, all the English hostages in his hands to be set at liberty, and the remainder of the debt due to him to be remitted; his son, who seemed inclined to disobey these orders, was constrained by his ecclesiastics to execute them. The emperor also made advances for Richard's friendship, in 1195, and offered to give him a discharge of all the debt not yet paid to him, provided he would enter into an offensive alliance against the king of France; a proposal which Richard embraced. The treaty with the emperor took no effect; but it served to rekindle the war between France and England before the expiration of the truce. This war was not distinguished by any more remarkable incidents than the foregoing. After mutually ravaging the open country, and taking a few insignificant castles, the two kings concluded a peace at Louviers, on the 5th of December, and made an exchange of some territories with each other. Their inability to wage war occasioned the peace; but their mutual antipathy engaged them again in war before two months had expired, which commenced about the middle of January, 1196. Richard imagined, that he had now found an opportunity of gaining great advantages over his rival, by forming an alliance with the counts of Flanders, Toulouse, Boulogne, Champagne, and other considerable vassals of the crown of France. But he soon experienced the insincerity of those princes; and was not able to make any impression on that kingdom, while governed by a monarch of so much vigour and activity as Philip. The most remarkable incident of this war was the taking prisoner in battle the bishop of Beauvais, a martial prelate, who was of the family of Dreux, and a near relation of the French king's. Richard, who hated that bishop, threw him into prison, and loaded him with irons; and when the pope demanded his liberty, and claimed him as his son, the king sent to his holiness the coat of mail which the prelate had worn in battle, and which was all besmeared with blood; and he replied to him, in the terms employed by Jacob's sons to that patriarch, "This have we found: Know now whether it be thy son's coat or no (t)." This new war between the rival kings of England and France, though carried on with such virulence, that both parties frequently put out the eyes of their prisoners, was soon finished by a truce of five years; and immediately after signing this treaty, the monarchs were ready, on some new offence, to break out again into hostilities. After the conclusion of this truce, the pope again exerted his mediatory powers in order to effect a lasting peace, that the two kings might be enabled to undertake a second expedition to Palestine, and the cardinal of St. Mary, the pope's legate, accommodated the difference. This prelate even engaged the princes to commence a treaty for a more durable peace; but the death of Richard put an end to the negociation.

Vidomar, viscount of Limoges, a vassal of the king's, had found a valuable treasure, consisting of ancient coins and medals, of which he sent part to that prince; but Richard, as superior lord, claimed the whole; and, at the head of some Brabançons, besieged the viscount in the castle of Chalus, near Limoges, in order to make him comply with his demand. The garrison offered to surrender; but the king replied, that, since he had taken the pains to come thither and besiege the place in person, he would take it by force, and would hang every one of them. The same day Richard, accompanied by Marcadée, leader of his Brabançons, approached the castle in order to survey it; when one Bertrand de Gourdon, an archer, took aim at him, and pierced his shoulder with an arrow. The king, however, gave orders for the assault on the 28th of March, 1129, took the place, and hanged all the garrison, except Gourdon, who had wounded him, and who was reserved for a more deliberate and cruel execution. The wound was not in itself dangerous; but the unskilfulness of the surgeon made it mortal: he so mangled Richard's shoulder in extracting the arrow, that a gangrene ensued. That prince, sensible that his life was drawing towards a period, sent for Gourdon, and asked him, "Wretch, what have I ever done to you, to oblige you to seek my life?" "What have you done to me?" replied coolly the prisoner: "You killed with your own hands my father and my two brothers; and you intended to have hanged myself: I am now in your power, and you may take revenge, by inflicting on me the most severe torments; but I shall endure them all with pleasure, provided I can think that I have been so happy as to rid the world of such a tyrant." Richard, struck with the reasonableness of this reply, and humbled by the near approach of death, ordered Gourdon to be set at liberty, and a sum of money to be given him; but Marcadée, unknown to him, seized the unhappy man, flayed him alive, and then hanged him. Richard died on the 6th of April, in the tenth year of his reign, and the forty-second of his age (u); leaving no issue behind him, except one natural son.

The most shining part of this prince's character are his military talents. No man, even in that romantic age, carried personal courage and intrepidity to a greater height; and this quality gained him the appellation of Cœur de Lion, or the Lion-hearted. He passionately loved glory, chiefly military glory; and as his conduct in the field was not inferior to his valour, he seems to have possessed every talent necessary for acquiring it. His resentments also were high; his pride unconquerable; and his subjects, as well as his neighbours, had therefore reason to apprehend, from the continuance of his reign, a perpetual scene of blood and violence. Of an impetuous and vehement spirit, he was distinguished by all the good, as well as the bad qualities, incident to that character; he was open, frank, generous, generous, sincere, and brave; he was revengeful, domineering, ambitious, haughty, and cruel; and was thus better calculated to dazzle men by the splendour of his enterprizes, than either to promote their happiness or his own grandeur, by a sound and well-regulated policy. As the splendor of military talents make great impression on the minds of people, he seems to have been much beloved by his English subjects; and he is remarked to have been the first prince of the Norman line that bore any sincere regard to them. He passed however only four months of his reign in that kingdom: the crusade employed him nearly three years; he was detained about fourteen months in captivity; the rest of his reign was spent either in war, or preparations for war, against his perfidious neighbour, Philip king of France: and he was so pleased with the fame which he had acquired in the East, that he determined, notwithstanding his past misfortunes, to have farther exhausted his kingdom, and to have exposed himself to new hazards, by conducting another expedition against the infidels in the Holy Land.

(t) Genesis, chap. xxxvii. ver. 32.

(u) In compliance with Richard's own request, his bowels were interred in the abbey of St. Sauveur de Charroux, in Poictou, his heart, which proved to be be of an astonishing magnitude, was deposited, in a silver shrine, in the cathedral of Roüen; and his body was buried at the feet of his father in the church of Fontevrault.

Though the English pleased themselves with the glory which the king's martial genius procured them, his reign was extremely oppressive, and somewhat arbitrary, by the high taxes which he levied on them, and often without consent of the states or great council. In the ninth year of his reign, he levied a tax of five shillings on each hyde of land; and because the clergy refused to contribute their share, he put them out of the protection of law, and ordered the civil courts to give them no sentence for any debts which they might claim. Twice in his reign he ordered all his charters to be sealed anew, and the parties to pay fees for the renewal. It is said that Hubert, his justiciary, sent him over to France, in the space of two years, no less a sum than one million one hundred thousand marks, besides bearing all the charges of the government in England. This account, however, is quite incredible, unless we suppose that Richard made a thorough dilapidation of the demesnes of the crown, which it is not likely he could do with any advantage after his former resumption of all grants. A king, who possessed such a revenue, could never have endured fourteen months captivity, for not paying one thousand five hundred marks to the emperor, and be obliged at last to leave hostages for a third of the sum. The prices of commodities in this reign are also a certain proof that no such enormous sum could be levied on the people. A hyde of land, which consisted of about a hundred and twenty acres, was commonly let at twenty shillings a year, money of that time. As there were two hundred and forty three thousand six hundred hydes in England, it is easy to compute the amount of all the landed rents of the kingdom. The general and stated price of an ox was four shillings; of a labouring or draught horse the same; of a sow, one shilling; of a sheep with fine wool, ten pence; and of one with coarse wool, sixpence. These commodities seem not to have advanced in their prices since the conquest, and to have still been ten times cheaper than at present.

Richard renewed the severe laws against transgressors in his forests, whom he punished by castration and putting out their eyes, as in the reign of his great grandfather. He established by law one weight and measure throughout his kingdom. An useful institution, which the mercenary disposition and necessities of his successor engaged him to dispense with for money.

The disorders in London, derived from its bad police, had risen to a great height during this reign; and in the year 1196, there seemed to be formed so regular a conspiracy among the numerous malefactors, as threatened the city with destruction. There was one William Fitz-Osbert, commonly called Longbeard, a lawyer who had rendered himself extremely popular among the lower rank of citizens; and, by defending them on all occasions, had acquired the appellation of the advocate or the saviour of the people. He exerted his authority, by injuring and insulting the more substantial citizens, with whom he lived in a state of hostility, and who were every moment exposed to the most outrageous violences from him and his licentious emissaries. Murders were daily committed in the streets; houses were broken open and pillaged in day-light; and it is pretended by some historians, that no less than fifty-two thousand persons (but the number is without doubt greatly exaggerated) had entered into an association, by which they bound themselves to obey all the orders of this dangerous ruffian. Archbishop Hubert, who was then chief justiciary, summoned him before the council to answer for his conduct; but he came so well attended, that no one dared to accuse him, or to give evidence against him; and he was permitted to return in triumph to the city; but the primate, finding the impotence of law, contended himself with exacting from the citizens hostages for their good behaviour. He kept, however, a watchful eye on Fitz-Osbert; and seizing a favourable opportunity, attempted to commit him to custody; but the criminal, murdering one of the public officers, escaped with his concubine to the church of St. Mary le Bow, where he defended himself by force of arms. He was at last forced from his retreat, condemned, and executed, amidst the regrets of the populace, who were so devoted to his memory, that they stole his gibbet, paid the same veneration to it as to the cross, and were equally zealous in propagating and attesting reports of the miracles wrought by it. But though the sectaries of this superstition were punished by the justiciary, it received so little encouragement from the established clergy, whose property was endangered by such seditious practices, that it suddenly sunk and vanished.

The realm of England enjoyed the most profound tranquillity under the wise government of Hubert, the primate; who, uniting the dignity of the legate with that of chief justiciary, had great influence in all affairs, both civil and ecclesiastical; but the national happiness was interrupted in 1198 by a famine, occasioned by a succession of unfavourable seasons. This dreadful affliction was also accompanied by a pestilence, which raged with such incredible violence for the space of six months, that scarcely a sufficient number escaped to do the last duties to the dead, who were thrown in heaps into deep holes, dug for the purpose. William of Newberry, a contemporary writer, observes, that the monasteries were the only places in the kingdom which were exempt from the ravages of this plague. Though this was, agreeable to the superstition of the times, attributed to the superior sanctity of the inhabitants, the only proof that it can be allowed to afford, in the present age, is, that the monks were better accommodated, in point of provision and comfort, than their fellow citizens,

It was during the crusades, that the custom of using coats of arms was introduced into Europe. The knights, cased up in armour, had no way to make themselves be known and distinguished in battle, but by devices on their shields; and these were gradually adopted by their posterity and families, who were proud of the pious and military enterprizes of their ancestors.

King Richard was a passionate lover of poetry; there even remain some poetical works of his composition: and he bears a rank among the Provençal poets or Trobadores, who were the first of the modern Europeans that distinguished themselves by attempts of that nature.

The celebrated Robin Hood, and his companion Little John, the heroes of so many ancient ballads, lived about this time. They are said to have been men of good families; who, by a life of continual dissipation, reduced themselves to poverty, which they attempted to remedy by committing robberies on the highway. Their depredations were chiefly confined to the forests of Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire, and appear to have been conducted on a kind of philosophic principle; as they never were guilty of any species of cruelty, always suffered the poor to pass free from molestation, and not unfrequently supplied their wants from the spoils of the rich. A proclamation having been issued for the apprehension of Robin Hood, he repaired to the monastery of Berkeley, where he fell sick; and desiring to be blooded, was betrayed by the surgeon, and bled to death.

CHAP. III.

JOHN.

A REGULAR mode had not been perfectly established for the succession of the crown of England at this period of our history; and the deviations from it had been so frequent, that the appointment of John to succeed his brother in the government of the realm excited but little opposition or disturbance; though Arthur, his nephew, who was duke of Bretagne, was thereby defeated of his claim, as by right of representation he stood in the place of his father Geoffrey, John's eldest brother. It is, however, ever, worthy remark, that John claimed the throne, as appears from his charters, by hereditary right—"Regni Angliæ, quod nobis jure competit hæreditario:" that is, as next of kin to the deceased monarch, being his surviving brother; whereas Arthur, being his brother's son, was supposed to be removed one degree farther. But the doctrine of hereditary succession appears to have made more progress on the continent than in this country. All the prelates and barons of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, supported the claim of Arthur, who was now only in his thirteenth year, acknowledged him as their liege-lord; and, in an act of their assembly, established him the possession of the government. The young prince was placed, by his mother Constantia, under the protection of Philip king of France, to whom he did homage for all the transmarine dominions of his deceased uncle; and Philip, whose enmity to the English was uniformly inveterate, by whatever monarch they were governed, willingly embraced his cause, in the hope of embarrassing John, and dismembering his dominions.

In the mean while, John, who was in Normandy at the time of his brother's decease, had hastened to Chinon, where the royal treasures were deposited, under the care of Robert de Turnham, who immediately delivered them into his hands, together with all the fortresses in his custody. Having secured this important object, he dispatched Hubert archbishop of Canterbury, and William Mareschal, earl of Strigul, to England, to concert measures for establishing his succession in that kingdom with Geoffrey Fitz-Piers, the chief justiciary, who had espoused his cause. The influence of these nobles was so great, that they prevailed on the clergy and barons to swear fealty to John, who repaired to Roüen, and was invested with the duchy of Normandy from the archbishop of that city. He next came over to England, where he arrived on the 25th of May, 1199, and the ceremony of his coronation was performed at Westminster on the 27th, by the archbishop of Canterbury.

Having taken precautions for the preservation of tranquillity during his absence, the king returned to Normandy on the 18th of June, in order to conduct the war against Philip, and to recover the revolted provinces from his nephew Arthur. Soon after his arrival, he concluded a truce with Philip, which lasted till the 16th of August, when an interview took place between the two monarchs, at which the demeanor of the French king was so insolent, and his demands were so exorbitant, that John rejected them with disdain. The alliances which Richard had formed with the earl of Flanders, and other potent French princes, though they had not been very effectual, still subsisted, and enabled John to defend himself against all the efforts of his enemy. In an action between the French and Flemings, the elect bishop of Cambray was taken prisoner by the former; and when the cardinal of Capua claimed his liberty, Philip, instead of complying, reproached him with the weak efforts which he had employed in favour of the bishop of Beauvais, who was in a like condition. The legate, to shew his impartiality, laid at the same time the kingdom of France and duchy of Normandy under an interdict; and the two kings found themselves obliged to make an exchange of these military prelates.

The selfish intriguing character of Philip, who acted in the provinces that had declared for Arthur, without any regard to the interests of that prince, enabled John to bring this war to a happy issue, so much as Constantia, seized with a jealousy that he intended to usurp the entire dominion of them, carried off her son secretly from Paris: she put him into the hands of his uncle; restored the provinces which had adhered to the young prince; and made him do homage for the duchy of Bretagne, which was regarded as a rere-fief of Normandy. From this incident, Philip saw but little prospect of making any progress against John; and being threatened with an interdict on account of his irregular divorce from Ingelburga, the Danish princess whom he had espoused, he became desirous of concluding a peace with England. After some fruitless conferences, the terms were at length adjusted: and the two monarchs seemed in this treaty to have an intention of preventing all future causes of discord, and of obviating every controversy which could hereafter arise between them. They adjusted the limits of their respective territories; mutually secured the interests of their vassals; and, to render the union more durable, John gave his niece, Blanche of Castile, in marriage to prince Lewis, Philip's eldest son, and with her the baronies of Issoudon, Chateauroux, Graçai, and other fiefs in Berri. Nine barons of the king of England, and as many of the king of France, were guarantees of this treaty; and all of them swore, that, if their sovereign violated any article of it, they would declare themselves against him, and embrace the cause of the injured monarch.

John, now secure, as he imagined, on the side of France, became enamoured of Isabella, the daughter and heir of Aymar Tailleffer, count of Angoulême. His queen, heiress of the family of Gloucester, with whom he received the earldom of Gloucester and other extensive possessions, was still alive; Isabella was married to Hugh le Brun, count de la Marche, and was already consigned to the care of that nobleman; though, by reason of her tender years, the marriage had not been consummated. The passion of John made him overlook all these obstacles; he persuaded the count of Angoulême to carry off his daughter from her husband; and having, on some pretence or other, procured a divorce from his own wife, he espoused Isabella; to whom he was married by the archbishop of Bourdeaux, regardless both of the menaces of the pope, who exclaimed against these irregular proceedings, and of the resentment of the injured count, who soon found means of punishing his powerful and insolent rival. John conducted his young queen to England; and they were both solemnly crowned at Westminster, by the archbishop of Canterbury, on the 8th of October, 1200.

But John had not the heart of attaching his barons either by affection or by fear. The count de la Marche, and his brother the count d'Eu, taking advantage of the general discontent against him, excited commotions in Poictou and Normandy; and obliged the king to have recourse to arms, in order to suppress the insurrection of his vassals. He summoned the barons of England, and required them to meet him at Portsmouth on Whitsunday, 1201, that they might pass the sea under his standard, and quell the rebels; but he found that he possessed as little authority in that kingdom as in his transmarine provinces. The English barons unanimously replied, that they would not attend him on this expedition, unless he would promise to restore and preserve their privileges. This was the first symptom of a regular association and plan of liberty among those noblemen. But affairs were not fully ripe for the revolution projected. John, by menacing the barons, broke the concert; and both engaged many of them to follow him into Normandy, and obliged the rest, who staid behind, to pay him a scutage of two marks on each knight's fee, as the price of their exemption from the service.

The force which John carried abroad with him, and that which joined him in Normandy, rendered him much superior to his malcontent barons: and so much the more as Philip did not publicly give them any countenance, and seemed as yet determined to persevere steadily in the alliance which he had contracted with England. But the king, elated with his superiority, advanced claims which gave an universal alarm to his vassals, and diffused still wider the general discontent. As the jurisprudence of those times required, that the causes in the lord's court should chiefly be decided by duel, he carried along with him certain bravos, whom he retained as champions, and whom he destined to fight with his barons, in order to determine any controversy which he might raise against them. The count de la Marche, and other noblemen, regarded this proceeding as an affront, as well as an injury: and declared, that they would never draw their sword against men of such inferior quality. The king menaced them with vengeance; but he had not vigour to employ against them the force in his hands, or to prosecute the injustice, by crushing entirely the nobles who opposed it.

This government, equally feeble and violent, gave the injured barons courage as well as inclination to carry farther opposition. In 1202 they appealed to the king of France; complained of the denial of justice in John's court; demanded redress of him as their superior lord; and entreated him to employ his authority, and prevent their final ruin and oppression. Philip perceived his advantage, opened his mind to great projects, interposed in behalf of the French barons, and began to talk in a menacing style to the king of England. John, who could not disavow Philip's authority, replied, that it belonged to himself first to grant them a trial by their peers in his own court; it was not till he failed in this duty, that he was answerable to his peers in the supreme court of the French king; and he promised, by a fair and equitable judicature, to give satisfaction to his barons. When the nobles, in consequence of this engagement, demanded a safe-conduct, that they might attend his court, he at first refused it; upon the renewal of Philip's menaces, he promised to grant their demand; he violated this promise; fresh menaces extorted from him a promise to surrender to Philip the fortresses of Tillieres and Boutavant, as a security for the performance; he again violated this engagement; his enemies, sensible both of his weakness and want of faith, combined still closer in the resolution of pushing him to extremities; and a new and powerful ally soon appeared to encourage them in their invasion of this odious and despicable government.

Constantia, duchess of Bretagne, having died at Nantes in the course of the year, her son Arthur repaired to Rennes, took possession of the duchy, and received the homage of the nobility. The young prince was now (1203) rising to man's estate, sensible of the dangerous character of his uncle, determined to seek both his security and elevation by an union with Philip and the malcontent barons. He joined the French army, which had begun hostilities against the king of England: he was received with great marks of distinction by Philip; was knighted by him; espoused his daughter Mary; and was invested not only in the duchy of Bretagne, but in the counties of Anjou and Maine, which he had formerly resigned to his uncle. Every attempt succeeded with the allies. Tillieres and Boutavant were taken by Philip, after a feeble resistance: Mortimar and Lyons fell into his hands. That prince next invested Gournai; and opening the sluices of a lake which lay in the neighbourhood, poured such a torrent of water into the place, that the garrison deserted it, and the French monarch took possession of that important fortress. The progress of the French arms was rapid, and promised considerable success. In answer to every advance which John made towards peace, Philip still insisted, that he should resign all his transmarine dominions to his nephew, and rest contented with the kingdom of England; when an event happened, which seemed to turn the scales in favour of John, and to give him a decisive superiority over his enemies.

Young Arthur, fond of military renown, had entered into Poictou at the head of a small army; and passing near Mirebeau, he heard that his grandmother, queen Eleanor, who had always opposed his interests, was lodged in that place, and was protected by a weak garrison and ruinous fortifications. He immediately determined to lay siege to the fortress, and make himself master of her person: but John, roused from his indolence by so pressing an occasion, collected an army of English and Brabançons, and advanced from Normandy with hasty marches to the relief of the queen-mother. He fell on Arthur's camp before that prince was aware of the danger; dispersed his army; took him prisoner, together with the count de la Marche, Geoffrey de Lusignan, and the most considerable of the revolted barons; and returned in triumph to Normandy. Philip, who was lying before Arques in that duchy, raised the siege on the first of August, 1203, and retired, upon his approach. The greater part of the prisoners were sent over to England; but Arthur was shut up in the castle of Falaise.

The perfidious king had here a conference with his nephew; represented to him the folly of his pretensions; and required him to renounce his alliance with France, which had encouraged him to live in a state of enmity with all his family, and to forego a claim that could be productive only of mischief: but the brave, though imprudent, youth, whose spirit was rendered more haughty from misfortunes, maintained the justice of his cause; asserted his claim, not only to the French provinces, but to the crown of England; and, in his turn, required the king to restore the son of his elder brother to the possession of his inheritance. John, sensible, from these symptoms of spirit, that the young prince, though now a prisoner, might hereafter prove a dangerous enemy, determined to prevent all future peril by depriving his nephew of life; and Arthur was never more heard of. The circumstances which attended this deed of darkness were, no doubt, carefully concealed by the actors, and are therefore variously related by historians; but the account which appears most consistent with probability is the following: the king, it is said, first proposed to William de la Bray, one of his servants, to dispatch Arthur; but William replied, that he was a gentleman, not a hangman; and positively refused compliance. Another instrument of murder was found, and was dispatched with proper orders to Falaise; but Hubert de Burgh, chamberlain to the king, and governor of that castle, feigning that he himself would execute the king's mandate, sent back the assassin, spread the report that the young prince was dead, and publicly performed all the ceremonies of his interment; but finding, that the Bretons vowed revenge for the murder, and that all the revolted barons persevered more obstinately in their rebellion, he thought it prudent to reveal the secret, and to inform the world that the duke of Bretagne was still alive, and in his custody. A prince endued with common sense and common policy, would have learned, from the universal resentment excited by this report, to dread the danger of sacrificing a life so deservedly dear to the public; but this discovery proved fatal to the young prince: John first ordered Arthur to be removed to the castle of Roüen, and when he was at that place, John made application to others, who rejected the office with similar disdain and contempt; so that he formed the resolution of becoming executioner himself. He accordingly went in a boat, during the night-time, to that place, and commanded Arthur to be brought forth to him. The young prince, aware of his danger, and now more subdued by the continuance of his misfortunes, and by the approach of death, threw himself on his knees before his uncle, and begged for mercy; but the barbarous tyrant making no reply, thrust his sword several times through his body; and fastening a heavy stone to the corpse, threw it into the Seine, from whence it was afterwards dragged ashore in a fisherman's net, and secretly interred in the priory of Notre Dame du Pré (w).

All men were struck with horror at this inhuman deed; and from that moment the king, detested by his subjects, retained a very precarious authority over both the people and the barons in his dominions. The Bretons, enraged at this disappointment in their fond hopes, waged implacable war against him; and fixing the succession of their government, put themselves in a posture to revenge the murder of their sovereign. John had got into his power his niece, Eleanor, sister to Arthur, commonly called the Maid of Bretagne; and carrying her over to England, detained her ever after in prison: but the Bretons, in despair of recovering this princess, chose Alice for their sovereign; a younger daughter of Constantia, by her second marriage with Guy de Thouars; and they entrusted the government of that duchy to that nobleman. The states of Bretagne, meanwhile, carried their complaints before Philip, as their liege lord, and demanded justice for the violence committed by John on the person of Arthur, so near a relation, who, notwithstanding the homage which he did to Normandy, was always regarded as one of the chief vassals of the crown. Philip received their application with pleasure; summoned John to appear, and answer to the charge; and, on his non-appearance, passed a sentence, with the unanimous concurrence of the peers, couched in the following terms: "Whereas John, duke of Normandy, forgetting his oath to king Philip, his lord, has murdered the son of his elder brother, who was an homager of the crown of France, and the king's kinsman; and perpetrated the crime within the seignory of France; he is found guilty of felony and treason, and adjudged to forfeit all the territories which he holds by homage."

The king of France, whose ambitious and active spirit had been hitherto confined, either by the sound policy of Henry, or the martial genius of Richard, seeing now the opportunity favourable against this base and odious prince, embraced the project of expelling the English, or rather the English king, from France, and of annexing to the crown so many considerable fiefs, which, during several ages, had been dismembered from it. Many of the other great vassals, whose jealousy might have interposed, and have obstructed the execution of this project, were not at present in a situation to oppose it; and the rest either looked on with indifference, or gave their assistance to this dangerous aggrandizement of their superior lord. The earls of Flanders and Blois were engaged in the holy war: the count of Champagne was an infant, and under the guardianship of Philip: the duchy of Bretagne, enraged at the murder of their prince, vigorously promoted his measures; and the general defection of John's vassals made every enterprize easy and successful against him. Philip, after reducing several castles and fortresses beyond the Loire, which he either garrisoned or dismantled, received the submissions of the count of Alençon, who deserted John, and delivered up all the places under his command to the French; upon which Philip broke up his camp, in order to give the troops some repose after the fatigues of the campaign. John, suddenly collecting some forces, laid siege to Alençon; and Philip, whose dispersed army could not be brought together in time to succour it, saw himself exposed to the disgrace of suffering the oppression of his friend and confederate. But his active and fertile genius found an expedient against this evil. There was held at that very time a tournament at Moret in the Gatinois; whither all the chief nobility of France and the neighbouring countries had resorted, in order to signalize their prowess and address. Philip presented himself before them; craved their assistance in his distress; and pointed out the plains of Alençon, as the most honourable field in which they could display their generosity and martial spirit. Those valorous knights vowed, that they would take vengeance on the base parricide, the stain of arms and of chivalry; and putting themselves, with all their retinue, under the command of Philip, instantly marched to raise the siege of Alençon. John, hearing of their approach, fled from before the place; and in the hurry abandoned all his tents, machines, and baggage, to the enemy.

(w) Whatever may be the truth of this account, it is certain that Arthur suddenly disappeared; and that his uncle was anxiously sedulous in propagating a report that he had perished in the Seine, in attempting to make his escape. That John was the contriver, if not the actual perpetrator, of the murder, obtained universal belief; and, as soon as it was performed, he hastened to England, and was again crowned at Canterbury; as if he thought the pageantry of a coronation, like a papal indulgence, would make him a new man, and purify him from those sins he was conscious of having committed.

Philip next turned his arms against Normandy; and, after reducing several castles, he at length, about the middle of August, invested Chateau-Guillard, an important fortress on the banks of the Seine, built by Richard, and deemed impregnable. Though John's army was equal in numbers to the French, that pusillanimous monarch was afraid to risk an action, but had the meanness to intreat the interposition of a foreign power. He applied to pope Innocent III. requesting his mediation; and that pontiff, pleased with an opportunity of evincing his superiority, sent Philip orders to stop the progress of his arms, and make peace with the king of England. This interference, however, being treated with the contempt it deserved, John found it necessary to exert himself; and at length determined, if possible, to throw supplies into Chateau-Guillard. This fortress was defended by Roger de Lacy, constable of Chester, a determined officer, who had a numerous garrison under his command; and Philip, despairing to take it by force, had converted the siege into a bockade; and that he might effectually cut off the communication of the garrison with the neighbouring country, had thrown a bridge of boats across the Seine.

In order to succour the besieged, John detached the earl of Pembroke, an officer of approved courage and capacity, with an army of four thousand infantry and three thousand cavalry; while a fleet of seventy flat-bottomed vessels, loaded with provisions and ammunition, and manned with three thousand Flemings, were ordered to sail up the river, and destroy the bridge at the same moment that the earl of Pembroke should attack the camp. The scheme was projected with wisdom; but the vessels, having both wind and tide against them, moved so slowly, that the earl arrived at the scene of action long before they reached the bridge; and, attacking the enemy's camp in the night, filled it with disorder and consternation. His Brabançons, however, were more intent upon plunder than desirous of improving the advantage they had obtained; and the French perceiving them dispersed, and busily employed in pillaging the camp, rallied, and charged them with such vigour, that they were speedily routed and put to flight. The fleet did not appear till daylight; when the whole force of the French being prepared to oppose its efforts, the commander found it impracticable either to demolish the bridge or throw supplies into the place, and was obliged to fall down the river with all possible expedition.

This feeble effort was the last exploit of that slothful and cowardly prince for the defence of his dominions. While Philip continued to blockade Chateau-Guillard, he took Andely, and even reduced Radepont, an important place in the neighbourhood of Roüen, the king of England remained in total inactivity at that city, passing all his time with his young wife, in pastimes and amusements, as if his state had been in the most profound tranquillity, or his affairs in the most prosperous condition. If he ever mentioned war, it was only to give himself vaunting airs, which, in the eyes of all men, rendered him still more despicable and ridiculous. "Let the French go on," said he, "I will retake in a day what it has cost them years to acquire." His stupidity and indolence at this alarming crisis appeared so extraordinary, that the people endeavoured to account for the infatuation by sorcery, and believed that he was thrown into this lethargy by some magic or witchcraft. The English barons, finding that their time was wasted to no purpose, and that they must suffer the disgrace of seeing, without resistance, the progress of the French arms, withdrew from their colours, and secretly returned to their own country. No one thought of defending a man, who seemed to have deserted himself; and his subjects regarded his fate with the same indifference, to which they saw him totally abandoned. John now despairing of success in the defence of Normandy, basely resolved to abandon it to the enemy; and, in order to expose the country to their incursions, he dismantled Pont à l'Arche, Moulineux, and Montfort l'Amauri; and then, having privately ordered vessels to be prepared for his departure, he embarked and set sail for England, where he arrived on the 6th of December, 1203.

Chateau-Guillard was situated partly on an island in the river Seine, partly on a rock opposite to it; and was secured by every advantage, which either art or nature could bestow upon it. The late king, having cast his eye on this favourable situation, had spared no labour or expence in fortifying it. Roger de Lacy defended himself for a twelvemonth with great obstinacy; and having bravely repelled every attack, and patiently borne all the hardships of famine, he was at last overpowered by a sudden assault in the night-time, and made prisoner of war, with his garrison. Philip, who knew how to respect valour, even in an enemy, treated him with civility, and gave him the whole city of Paris for the place of his confinement. When the bulwark of Normandy was once subdued, all the province lay open to the inroads of Philip.

Not daring to repose confidence in any of his barons, whom he believed to be universally engaged in a conspiracy against him, John entrusted the government of the province to Archas Martin and Lupicaire, two mercenary Brabançons, whom he had retained in his service. Philip, now secure of his prey, pushed his conquests with vigour and success against the dismayed Normans. Falaise was first besieged; and Lupicaire, who commanded in this important fortress, after surrendering the place, inlisted himself with his troops in the service of Philip, and carried on hostilities against his former master. Caen, Coutance, Seez, Evreux, Baieux, soon fell into the hands of the French monarch, and all the lower Normandy was reduced under his dominion. To forward his enterprizes on the other division of the province, Guy de Thouars, at the head of the Bretons, broke into the territory, and took Mount St. Michael, Avranches, and all the other fortresses in that neighbourhood. The Normans, who abhorred the French yoke, and who would have defended themselves to the last extremity if their prince had appeared to conduct them, found no resource but in submission; and every city opened its gates as soon as Philip appeared before it. Roüen alone, Arques, and Verneüil, determined to maintain their liberties; and formed a confederacy for mutual defence. Philip began with the siege of Roüen, in 1205: the inhabitants were so inflamed with hatred to France, that, on the appearance of his army, they fell on all the natives of that country whom they found within their walls, and put them to death. But after the French king had begun his operations with success, and had taken some of their outworks, the citizens, seeing no resource, offered to capitulate; and demanded only thirty days to advertise their prince of their danger, and to require succours against the enemy. Upon the expiration of the term, which was the first of June, as no supply had arrived, they opened their gates to Philip; and the whole province soon imitated the example, and submitted to the victor. Thus was this important territory re-united to the crown of France, about three centuries after the cession of it by Charles

Charles the Simple to Rollo, the first duke: and the Normans, sensible that this conquest was probably final, demanded the privilege of being governed by French laws; which Philip, making a few alterations on the ancient Norman customs, readily granted them. But the French monarch had too much ambition and genius to stop in his present career of success. He carried his victorious army into the western provinces; soon reduced Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and part of Poictou: and in this manner the French crown, during the reign of one able and active prince, received such an accession of power and grandeur, as, in the ordinary course of things, it would have required several ages to attain.

When John arrived in England, that he might cover the disgrace of his own conduct, exclaimed loudly against his barons, who, he pretended, had deserted his standard in Normandy; and he arbitrarily extorted from them a seventh of all their movables, as a punishment for the offence. Soon after he forced them to grant him a scutage of two marks and a half on each knight's fee for an expedition into Normandy; but he did not attempt to execute the service for which he pretended to exact it. Next year, he summoned all the barons of his realm to attend him on this foreign expedition, and collected ships from all the sea-ports; but meeting with opposition from some of his ministers, and abandoning his design, he dismissed both fleet and army, and then renewed his exclamations against the barons for deserting him. He next put to sea with a small army, and his subjects believed, that he was resolved to expose himself to the utmost hazard for the defence and recovery of his dominions: but they were surprized, after a few days, to see him return again into the harbour, without attempting any thing. In the subsequent season, 1206, he had the courage to carry his hostile measures a step farther. Guy de Thouars, who governed Bretagne, jealous of the rapid progress made by his ally, the French king, promised to join the king of England with all his forces; and John ventured abroad with a considerable army. He embarked at Portsmouth on the 25th of June, and landed at Rochelle on the 9th of July. He marched to Angers; which he took and reduced to ashes. But the approach of Philip with an army threw him into a panic; and he immediately made proposals for peace, and fixed a place of interview with his enemy: but instead of keeping this engagement, he stole off with his army, embarked at Rochelle, and returned, loaded with new shame and disgrace into England. The mediation of the pope procured him at last a truce for two years with the French monarch; almost all the transmarine provinces were ravished from him; and the English barons, though harassed with arbitrary taxes and fruitless expeditions, saw themselves and their country baffled and affronted in every enterprize.

In an age when personal valour was regarded as the chief accomplishment, such conduct as that of John, always disgraceful, must be exposed to peculiar contempt; and he must thenceforth expect to rule his turbulent vassals with a very doubtful authority. But the government exercised by the Norman princes had wound up the royal power to so high a pitch, and so much beyond the usual tenour of the feudal constitutions, that it still behoved him to be debased by new affronts and disgraces, ere his barons could entertain the view of conspiring against him, in order to retrench his prerogatives. The church, which, at that time, declined not a contest with the most powerful and most vigorous monarchs, took first advantage of John's imbecility; and, with the most aggravating circumstances of insolence and scorn, fixed her yoke upon him.

The papal chair was filled by Innocent III. who, having attained that dignity at the age of thirty-seven years, and being endowed with a lofty and enterprizing genius, gave full scope to his ambition, and attempted, perhaps more openly than any of his predecessors, to convert that superiority, which was yielded him by all the European princes, into a real dominion over them. The hierarchy, protected by the Roman pontiff, had already carried to an enormous height its usurpations upon the civil power; but in order to extend them farther, and render them useful to the court of Rome, it was necessary to reduce the ecclesiastics themselves under an absolute monarchy, and to make them entirely dependent on their spiritual leader. For this purpose, Innocent first attempted to impose taxes at pleasure upon the clergy; and in the first year of this century, taking advantage of the popular frenzy for crusades, he sent collectors over all Europe, who levied, by his authority, the fortieth of all ecclesiastical revenues for the relief of the Holy Land, and received the voluntary contributions of the laity to a like amount. The same year Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, attempted another innovation, favourable to ecclesiastical and papal power: in the king's absence, he summoned, by his legatine authority, a synod of all the English clergy, contrary to the inhibition of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the chief justiciary; and no proper censure was ever passed on this encroachment, the first of the kind, upon the royal power. But a favourable incident soon after happened, which enabled so aspiring a pontiff as Innocent to extend still farther his usurpations on so contemptible a prince as John.

Hubert, the primate, died on the 18th of July, 1205; and as the monks or canons of Christ Church, Canterbury, possessed a right of voting in the election of their archbishop, some of the juniors of the order, who lay in wait for that event, met clandestinely the very night of Hubert's death; and without any congé d'élire from the king, chose Reginald, their sub-prior, for the successor; installed him in the archiepiscopal see before midnight; and having enjoined him the strictest secrecy, sent him immediately to Rome, in order to solicit the confirmation of his election. The vanity of Reginald prevailed over his prudence; and he no sooner arrived in Flanders, than he revealed to every one the purpose of his journey, which was immediately known in England. The king was enraged at the novelty and temerity of the attempt, in filling so important an office without his knowledge or consent: the suffragan bishops of Canterbury, who were accustomed to concur in the choice of their primate, were no less displeased at the exclusion given them in this election: the senior monks of Christ Church were injured by the irregular proceedings of their juniors: the juniors themselves, ashamed of their conduct, and disgusted with the levity of Reginald, who had broken his engagements with them, were willing to set aside his election; and all men concurred in the design of remedying the false measures which had been taken. But as John knew that this affair would be canvassed before a superior tribunal, where the interposition of royal authority in bestowing ecclesiastical benefices was very invidious; where even the cause of suffragan bishops was not so favourable as that of monks; he determined to make the new election entirely unexceptionable: he submitted the affair wholly to the canons of Christ Church; and departing from the right claimed by his predecessors, ventured to inform them privately, that they would do him an acceptable service if they chose John de Gray, bishop of Norwich, for their primate. The election of that prelate was accordingly made without a contradictory vote; and the king, to obviate all contests, endeavoured to persuade the suffragan bishops not to insist on their claim of concurring in the election: but those prelates, persevering in their pretensions, sent an agent to maintain their cause before Innocent; while the king, and the convent of Christ Church, dispatched twelve monks of that order to support, before the same tribunal, the election of the bishop of Norwich.

Thus there lay three different claims before the pope, whom all parties allowed to be the supreme arbiter in the contest. The claim of the suffragans, being so opposite to the usual maxims of the papal court, was soon set aside: the election of Reginald was so obviously fraudulent and irregular, that there was no possibility of defending it: but Innocent maintained, that though this election was null and invalid, it ought previously to have been declared such by the sovereign pontiff, before the monks could proceed to a new election; and that the choice of the bishop of Norwich was of course as uncanonical as that of his competitor. Advantage was therefore taken of this subtlety for introducing a precedent, by which the see of Canterbury, the most important dignity in the church, after the papal throne, should ever after be at the disposal of the court of Rome.

While the pope maintained so many fierce contests, in order to wrest from princes the right of granting investitures, and to exclude laymen from all authority in conferring ecclesiastical benefices, he was supported by the united influence of the clergy, who fought, with all the ardour of ambition, and all the zeal of superstition, under his sacred banners. But no sooner was this point, after a great effusion of blood, and the convulsions of many states, established in some tolerable degree, than the victorious leader, as is usual, turned his arms against his his own community, and aspired to centre all power in his person. By the invention of reserves, provisions, commendams, and other devices, the pope gradually assumed the right of filling vacant benefices; and the plenitude of his apostolic power, which was not subject to any limitations, supplied all defects of title in the person on whom he bestowed preferment. The canons which regulated elections were purposely rendered intricate and involved: frequent disputes arose among candidates: appeals were every day carried to Rome: the apostolic see, besides reaping pecuniary advantages from these contests, often exercised the power of setting aside both the litigants, and, on pretence of appeasing faction, nominated a third person, who might be more acceptable to the contending parties.

The present controversy about the election to the see of Canterbury, afforded Innocent an opportunity of claiming this right; and he failed not to perceive and avail himself of the advantage. He sent for the twelve monks deputed by the convent to maintain the cause of the bishop of Norwich; and commanded them, under the penalty of excommunication, to choose for their primate, cardinal Stephen Langton, an Englishman by birth, but educated in France, and connected, by his interest and attachments, with the see of Rome. In vain did the monks represent, that they had received from their convent no authority for this purpose; that an election, without a previous writ from the king, would be deemed highly irregular; and that they were merely agents for another person, whose right they had no power to abandon. None of them had the courage to persevere in this opposition, except one, Elias de Brantefield: all the rest, overcome by the menaces and authority of the pope, complied with his orders, and made the election required. Thus, by the election of a few solitary monks, in a foreign country, or rather by the simple fiat of the pope; was Stephen Langton raised to the dignity of primate of England. He was consecrated by the pope at Viterbo, in Italy, on the 27th of June, 1207.

Innocent, sensible that this usurpation would be resented by the court of England, wrote John a mollifying letter; sent him four golden rings set with precious stones; and endeavoured to enhance the value of the present, by informing him of the many mysteries implied in it. He begged him to consider seriously the form of the rings, their number, their matter, and their colour. Their form, he said, being round, shadowed out Eternity, which had neither beginning nor end; and he ought thence to learn his duty of aspiring from earthly objects to heavenly, from things temporal to things eternal. The number four, being a square, denoted steadiness of mind, not to be subverted either by adversity or prosperity, fixed for ever on the firm basis of the four cardinal virtues. Gold, which is the matter, being the most precious of metals, signified Wisdom, which is the most valuable of all accomplishments, and justly preferred by Solomon to riches, power, and all exterior attainments. The blue colour of the sapphire represented Faith; the verdure of the emerald, Hope; the redness of the ruby, Charity; and the splendour of the topaz, Good Works. By these conceits, Innocent endeavoured to repay John for one of the most important prerogatives of his crown, which he had ravished from him; conceits probably admired by Innocent himself: for it is easily possible for a man, especially in a barbarous age, to unite strong talents for business with an absurd taste for literature and the arts.

John, as might naturally be expected, was inflamed with the utmost rage when he heard of this attempt of the court of Rome; and he immediately vented his passion on the monks of Christ Church, whom he found inclined to support the election made by their fellows at Rome. He sent Fulke de Cantelupe, and Henry de Cornhulle, two knights of his retinue, men of violent tempers and rude manners, to expel them the convent, and take possession of their revenues. These knights entered the monastery with drawn swords, commanded the prior and the monks to depart the kingdom, and menaced them, that, in case of disobedience, they would instantly burn them with the convent. Innocent prognosticating, from the violence and imprudence of these measures, that John would finally sink in the contest, persevered the more rigorously in his pretensions, and exhorted the king not to oppose God and the church any longer, nor to prosecute that cause for which the holy martyr St. Thomas had sacrificed his life, and which had exalted him equal to the highest saints in heaven. This was a hint to John to profit by the example of his father, and to remember the prejudices and established principles of his subjects, who bore a profound veneration to that martyr, and regarded his merits as the subject of their chief glory and exultation.

Innocent, finding that John was not sufficiently tamed to submission, sent three prelates, the bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester, to intimate, that if he persevered in his obstinacy and disobedience, the sovereign pontiff would be obliged to lay the kingdom under an interdict. All the other prelates threw themselves on their knees before him, and entreated him, with tears in their eyes, to prevent the scandal of this sentence, by making a speedy submission to his spiritual father, by receiving from his hands the new-elected primate, and by restoring the monks of Christ Church to their rights and possessions. He burst out into the most indecent invectives against the prelates; swore by God's teeth, (his usual oath), that if the pope presumed to lay his kingdom under an interdict, he would send to him all the bishops and clergy in England, and would confiscate all their estates; and threatened, that if thenceforth he caught any Romans in his dominions, he would put out their eyes, and cut off their noses, in order to set a mark upon them which might distinguish them from all other nations. Amidst all this idle violence, John stood on such bad terms with his nobility, that he never dared to assemble the states of the kingdom, who, in so just a cause, would probably have adhered to any other monarch, and have defended with vigour the liberties of the nation against these palpable usurpations of the court of Rome. Innocent, therefore, perceiving the king's weakness, fulminated at last the sentence of interdict, which he had for some time held suspended over him. This interdict was accordingly published in England, at the command of the pontiff, on the 23d of March, 1208, by the bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester; who, having thus sown the seeds of discord and disorder, retired precipitately from the kingdom, to avoid the just indignation of their sovereign.

This sentence was at that time the great instrument of vengeance and policy employed by the court of Rome; was denounced against sovereigns for the lightest offences; and made the guilt of one person involve the ruin of millions, even in their spiritual and eternal welfare. The execution of it was calculated to strike the senses in the highest degree, and to operate with irresistible force on the superstitious minds of the people. The nation was of a sudden deprived of all exterior exercise of its religion: the altars were despoiled of their ornaments: the crosses, the reliques, the images, the statues of the saints, were laid on the ground; and, as if the air itself were profaned, and might pollute them by its contact, the priests carefully covered them up, even from their own approach and veneration. The use of bells entirely ceased in all the churches: the bells themselves were removed from the steeples, and laid on the ground with the other sacred utensils. Mass was celebrated with shut doors, and none but the priests were admitted to that holy institution. The laity partook of no religious rite, except baptism to new-born infants, and the communion to the dying: the dead were not interred in consecrated ground: they were thrown into ditches, or buried in common fields; and their obsequies were not attended with prayers, or any hallowed ceremony. Marriage was celebrated in the church-yards; and that every action in life might bear the marks of this dreadful situation, the people were prohibited the use of meat, as in Lent, or times of the highest penance; were debarred from all pleasures and entertainments: and were forbidden even to salute each other, or so much as to shave their beards, and give any decent attention to their person and apparel. Every circumstance carried symptoms of the deepest distress, and of the most immediate apprehension of divine vengeance and indignation.

The king, that he might oppose his temporal to their spiritual terrors, immediately, from his own authority, confiscated the estates of all the clergy who obeyed the interdict; banished the prelates, confined the monks in their convents, and gave them only such a small allowance from their own estates as would suffice to provide them with food and raiment. He treated with the utmost rigour all Langton's adherents, and every one that showed any disposition to obey the commands of Rome. And in order to distress the clergy in the tenderest point, and at the same time expose them to reproach and ridicule, he threw into prison all their concubines, and required high fines as the price of their liberty.

After

After the canons which established the celibacy of the clergy were, by the zeal of archbishop Anselm, more rigorously executed in England, the ecclesiastics gave, almost universally and avowedly, into the use of concubinage; and the court of Rome, which had no interest in prohibiting this practice, made slight opposition to it. The custom was become so prevalent, that, in some cantons of Switzerland, before the reformation, the laws not only permitted, but, to avoid scandal, enjoined the use of concubines to the younger clergy; and it was usual every where for priests to apply to the ordinary, and obtain from him a formal liberty for this indulgence. The bishop commonly took care to prevent the practice from degenerating into licentiousness: he confined the priest to the use of one woman, required him to be constant to her bed, obliged him to provide for her subsistence and that of her children; and though the offspring was, in the eye of the law, deemed illegitimate, this commerce was really a kind of inferior marriage, such as is still practised in Germany among the nobles; and may be regarded by the candid as an appeal from the tyranny of civil and ecclesiastical institutions, to the more virtuous and more unerring laws of nature.

The quarrel between the king and the see of Rome continued for some years; and though many of the clergy, from the fear of punishment, obeyed the orders of John, and celebrated divine service, they complied with the utmost reluctance, and were regarded, both by themselves and the people, as men who betrayed their principles, and sacrificed their conscience to temporal regards and interests. During this violent commotion, the king, to give a lustre to his government, attempted military expeditions against Scotland, Ireland, the Welsh; and commonly prevailed, more from the weakness of his enemies, than from his own vigour or abilities. Meanwhile, the danger to which his government stood continually exposed from the discontents of the ecclesiastics, increased his natural propensity to tyranny; and he seems to have even wantonly disgusted all orders of men, especially his nobles, from whom alone he could reasonably expect support and assistance. He dishonoured their families by his licentious amours; he published edicts, prohibiting them from hunting feathered game, and thereby restrained them from their favourite occupation and amusement; he ordered all the hedges and fences near his forests to be levelled, that his deer might have more ready access into the fields for pasture; and he continually loaded the nation with arbitrary impositions. Conscious of the general hatred which he had incurred, he required his nobility to give him hostages for security of their allegiance; and they were obliged to put into his hands their sons, nephews, or near relations. When his messengers came with like orders to the castle of William de Braouse, a baron of great note, the lady of that nobleman replied, That she would never entrust her son into the hands of one who had murdered his own nephew while in his custody. Her husband reproved her for the severity of this speech; but, sensible of his danger, he immediately fled with his wife and son into Ireland, where he endeavoured to conceal himself. The king discovered the unhappy family in their retreat; seized the wife and son, whom he starved to death in prison; and the baron himself narrowly escaped, by flying into France.

The court of Rome had artfully contrived a gradation of sentences; by which she kept offenders in awe; still afforded them an opportunity of preventing the next anathema by submission; and, in case of their obstinacy, was able to refresh the horror of the people against them, by new denunciations of the wrath and vengeance of Heaven. As the sentence of interdict had not produced the desired effect on John, and as his people, though extremely discontented, had hitherto been restrained from rising in open rebellion against him, he was soon to look for the sentence of excommunication: and he had reason to apprehend, that notwithstanding all his precautions, the most dangerous consequences might ensue from it. He was witness of the other scenes which at that very time were acting in Europe, and which displayed the unbounded and uncontrolled power of the papacy. Innocent, far from being dismayed at his contests with the king of England, had excommunicated the emperor Otho, John's nephew; and soon brought that powerful and haughty prince to submit to his authority. He published a crusade against the Albigenses, a species of enthusiasts in the south of France, whom he denominated heretics; because, like other enthusiasts, they neglected the rites of the church, and opposed the power and influence of the clergy: the people from all parts of Europe, moved by their superstition and their passion for wars and adventures, flocked to his standard: Simon de Montfort, the general of the crusade, acquired to himself a sovereignty in these provinces: the count of Toulouse, who protected, or perhaps only tolerated the Albigenses, was stripped of his dominions: and these sectaries themselves, though the most innocent and inoffensive of mankind, were exterminated, with all the circumstances of extreme violence and barbarity. Here were therefore both an army and a general, dangerous from their zeal and valour, who might be directed to act against John; and Innocent, after keeping the thunder long suspended, gave at last, in 1209, authority to the bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester, to fulminate the sentence of excommunication against him. These prelates obeyed the pope's orders, and sent over the sentence to be published in the different churches; but their brethren were deterred from publishing the dreadful sentence.

No sooner was the excommunication known, than the effects of it appeared. Geoffrey, archdeacon of Norwich, who was entrusted with a considerable office in the court of exchequer, being informed of it while sitting on the bench, observed to his colleagues the danger of serving under an excommunicated sovereign; he immediately left his chair, and departed the court. John gave orders to seize him, to throw him into prison, to cover his head with a great leaden cope; and by this and other severe usage he soon put an end to his life: nor was there any thing wanting to Geoffrey, except the dignity and rank of Becket, to exalt him to an equal station in heaven with that great and celebrated martyr. Hugh de Wells, the chancellor, being elected, by the king's appointment, bishop of Lincoln, upon a vacancy in that see, desired leave to go abroad, in order to receive consecration from the archbishop of Rouen; but he no sooner reached France than he hastened to Pontigny, where Langton then resided, and paid submissions to him as primate. The bishops, finding themselves exposed either to the jealousy of the king or hatred of the people, gradually stole out of the kingdom; and at last there remained only three prelates to perform the functions of the episcopal office. Many of the nobility, terrified by John's tyranny, and hateful to him on different accounts, imitated the example of the bishops; and most of the others who remained were, with reason, suspected of having secretly entered into a confederacy against him. John was alarmed at his dangerous situation; a situation which prudence, vigour, and popularity might formerly have prevented, but which no virtues or abilities were now sufficient to retrieve. He desired a conference with Langton at Dover; offered to acknowledge him as primate, to submit to the pope, to restore the exiled clergy, even to pay them a limited sum as a compensation for the rents of their confiscated estates. But Langton, perceiving his advantage, was not satisfied with these concessions: he demanded that full restitution and reparation should be made to all the clergy; a condition so exorbitant that the king, who probably had not the power of fulfilling it, and who foresaw that this estimation of damages might amount to an immense sum, finally broke off the conference.

The next gradation of papal sentences was to absolve John's subjects from their oaths of fidelity and allegiance, and to declare every one excommunicated who had any commerce with him in public or in private; at his table, in his council, or even in private conversation: and this sentence was accordingly, with all imaginable solemnity, pronounced against him, in 1212. But as John still persevered in his contumacy, there remained nothing but the sentence of deposition; which, though intimately connected with the former had been distinguished from it by the artifice of the court of Rome; and Innocent determined to dart this last thunderbolt against the refractory monarch. But as a sentence of this kind required an armed force to execute it, the pontiff fixed on Philip, king of France, as the person into whose powerful hand he could most properly entrust that weapon, the ultimate resource of his ghostly authority. And he offered the monarch, besides the remission of all his sins, and a great variety of spiritual benefits, the property and possession of the kingdom of England, as the reward of his labour.

It was the common concern of all princes to oppose these exorbitant pretensions of the Roman pontiff, by which they themselves were rendered vassals, and vassals totally dependent on the papal crown: yet even Philip, the most able able monarch of the age, was seduced by the flattering idea of present interest, and by the prospect of so tempting a prize, to accept this offer of the pontiff, and thereby to ratify that authority which, if he ever opposed its boundless usurpations, might next day hurl him from his throne. He levied a large army in the beginning of 1213; summoned all the vassals of the crown to attend him at Roüen; collected a fleet of seventeen hundred vessels in the seaports of Normandy and Picardy; and prepared a force, which seemed equal to the greatness of his enterprize. The king, on the other hand, issued out writs, requiring the attendance of all his military tenants at Dover, and even of all able-bodied men, to defend the kingdom in this dangerous extremity. A great number appeared; and he selected an army of sixty thousand men; a power invincible, had they been united in affection to their prince, and animated with a becoming zeal for the defence of their native country. But the people were swayed by superstition, and regarded their king with horror, since he was anathematized by papal censures: the barons, besides lying under the same prejudices, were disgusted by his tyranny, and many of them were suspected of holding a secret correspondence with the enemy; and the incapacity and cowardice of the king himself, made men prognosticate the most fatal effects from the invasion of the French.

Pandolf, whom the pope had chosen for his legate, and appointed to head this important expedition, had, before he left Rome, applied for a secret conference with his master, and had asked him, whether if the king of England were willing to submit to the apostolic see, the church should, without the consent of Philip, grant him any terms of accommodation? Innocent, expecting from his agreement with a prince so abject both in character and fortune, more advantages than from his alliance with a great and victorious monarch, who, after such mighty acquisitions, might become too haughty to be bound by spiritual chains, explained to Pandolf the conditions on which he was willing to be reconciled to John. The legate, therefore, as soon as he arrived in the north of France, sent over two knights templars to desire an interview with John at Dover, which was readily granted: he there represented to him his lost condition, the disaffection of his subjects, the secret combination of his vassals against him, the mighty armament of France, so that John yielded at discretion, and subscribed to all the conditions which Pandolf was pleased to impose upon him, on the 13th of May, 1213. He promised, among other articles, that he would submit himself entirely to the judgement of the pope; that he would acknowledge Langton for primate; that he would restore all the exiled clergy and laity who had been banished on account of the contest; that he would make them full restitution of their goods, and compensation for all damages, and instantly consign eight thousand pounds in part of payment; and that every one outlawed or imprisoned for his adherence to the pope, should immediately be received into grace and favour. Four barons swore, along with the king, to the observance of this ignominious treaty.

But the ignominy of the king was not yet carried to its full height. Pandolf required him, as the first trial of obedience, to resign his kingdom to the church; and he persuaded him, that he could nowise so effectually disappoint the French invasion, as by thus putting himself under the immediate protection of the apostolic see. With this daring request, unparalleled even in the annals of papistical insolence, John was base enough to comply. He passed a charter, in which he declared, that, not constrained by fear, but of his own free will, and by the common advice and consent of his barons, he had, for remission of his own sins, and those of his family, resigned England and Ireland to God, to St. Peter and St. Paul, and to pope Innocent and his successors in the apostolic chair: he agreed to hold those dominions as feudatory of the church of Rome, by the annual payment of a thousand marks; seven hundred for England, three hundred for Ireland; and he stipulated, that if he or his successors should ever presume to revoke or infringe this charter, they should instantly, except upon admonition they repented of their offence, forfeit all right to their sovereignty.

In consequence of this agreement, John did homage to Pandolf as the pope's legate, with all the submissive rites which the feudal law required of vassals before their liege-lord and superior, on the 15th of May. He came disarmed into the legate's presence, who was seated on a throne; flung himself on his knees before him; lifted up his joined hands, and put them within those of Pandolf; swore fealty to the pope; and paid part of the tribute which he owed for his kingdom as the patrimony of St. Peter. The legate, elated by this supreme triumph of sacerdotal power, could not forbear discovering extravagant symptoms of joy and exultation: he trampled on the money, which was laid at his feet, as an earnest of the subjection of the kingdom: an insolence of which, however offensive to all the English, no one present, except the archbishop of Dublin, dared to take any notice. But though Pandolf had brought the king to submit to these base conditions, he still refused to free him from the excommunication and interdict, till an estimation should be taken of the losses of the ecclesiastics, and full compensation and restitution should be made to them all.

John, reduced to this abject situation under a foreign power, still shewed the same disposition to tyrannize over his subjects, which had been the chief cause of all his misfortunes. One Peter of Pomfret, a hermit, had foretold that the king, this very year, should lose his crown; and for that rash prophecy he had been thrown into prison in Corfe Castle. John now determined to bring him to punishment as an impostor; and though the man pleaded, that his prophecy was fulfilled, and that the king had lost the royal and independent crown which he formerly wore, the defence was supposed to aggravate his guilt: he was dragged at horses' tails, to the town of Warham, and there hanged on a gibbet with his son.

When Pandolf, after receiving the homage of John, returned to France, he congratulated Philip on the success of his pious enterprize; and informed him that John had now come to a just sense of his guilt; had returned to obedience under the apostolic see; and even consented to do homage to the pope for his dominions; and having thus made his kingdom a part of St. Peter's patrimony, had rendered it impossible for any Christian prince, without the most manifest and flagrant impiety, to attack him. Philip was enraged on receiving this intelligence: he exclaimed, that having, at the pope's instigation, undertaken an expedition, which had cost him above sixty thousand pounds sterling, he was frustrated of his purpose, at the time when its success was become infallible: he complained that all the expence had fallen upon him; all the advantages had accrued to Innocent: he threatened to be no longer the dupe of these hypocritical pretences: and assembling his vassals, he laid before them the ill treatment he had received, exposed the interested and fraudulent conduct of the pope, and required their assistance to execute his enterprize against England, in which he told them, that, notwithstanding the inhibitions and menaces of the legate, he was determined to persevere. The French barons were, in that age, little less ignorant and superstitious than the English: yet, so much does the influence of those religious principles depend on the present dispositions of men! they all vowed to follow their prince on his intended expedition, and were determined not to be disappointed of that glory and those riches which they had long expected from this undertaking. The earl of Flanders alone, who had previously formed a secret treaty with John, declaring against the injustice and impiety of the measure, retired with his forces; and Philip, that he might not leave so dangerous an enemy behind him, first turned his arms against the dominions of that prince. Meanwhile, the English fleet was assembled under the earl of Salisbury, the king's natural brother; and, though inferior in number, received orders to attack the French in their harbours. Salisbury performed this service with so much success, that he took three hundred ships; destroyed a hundred more; and Philip, finding it impossible to prevent the rest from falling into the hands of the enemy, set fire to them himself, and thereby rendered it impossible for him to proceed any farther in his projected expedition.

John, exulting in his present security, insensible to his past disgrace, was so elated with his success, that he thought of invading France in his turn, and recovering all those provinces which the arms of Philip had formerly ravished from him. He proposed this expedition to the barons, who were already assembled for the defence of the kingdom. But the English nobles both hated and despised their prince: they prognosticated no success to any enterprize conducted by such a leader; and pretending that their time of service was elapsed, and their provisions exhausted, they refused to second his undertaking. The king, however, resolute in his purpose, embarked with a few followers, and sailed from Portsmouth to Jersey, in the expectation that the barons would be ashamed not to follow him.

But finding himself disappointed, he returned to England; and raising some troops, threatened to take vengeance on his nobles for their desertion and disobedience. The archbishop of Canterbury, who was in a confederacy with the barons, here interposed; strictly inhibited the king from thinking of such an attempt; and threatened him with a renewal of the sentence of excommunication, if he pretended to levy war upon any of his subjects, before the kingdom were freed from the interdict.

The several anathemas pronounced against John, were recalled by the same gradual progress with which they had been first issued. By receiving his homage, and admitting him to the rank of a vassal, his deposition had been virtually annulled, and his subjects were again bound by their oaths of allegiance. The exiled prelates had then returned in great triumph, with Langton at their head; and the king, hearing of their approach, went forth to meet them, and throwing himself on the ground before them, he entreated them, with tears, to have compassion on him and the kingdom of England. The primate, seeing these marks of sincere penitence, led him to the chapter-house of Winchester, and there administered an oath to him, on the 20th of July, by which he again swore fealty and obedience to Innocent and his successors; promised to love, maintain, and defend holy church and the clergy; engaged that he would re-establish the good laws of his predecessors, particularly those of St. Edward, and would abolish the wicked ones; and expressed his resolution of maintaining justice and right in all his dominions. The primate next gave him absolution in the requisite forms, and admitted him to dine with him, to the great joy of all the people. The sentence of interdict, however, was still upheld against the kingdom. A new legate, Nicolas, bishop of Tusculum, came into England in the room of Pandolf; and he declared it to be the pope's intentions never to loosen that sentence till full restitution was made to the clergy of every thing taken from them, and ample reparation for all damages which they had sustained. He only permitted mass to be said with a low voice in the churches, till those losses and damages could be estimated to the satisfaction of the parties. Certain barons were appointed to take an account of the claims; and John was astonished at the greatness of the sums to which the clergy made their losses to amount. No less than twenty thousand marks were demanded by the monks of Canterbury alone; twenty-three thousand for the see of Lincoln; and the king, finding these pretensions to be exorbitant and endless, offered the clergy the sum of a hundred thousand marks for a final acquittal. The clergy rejected the offer with disdain; but the pope, willing to favour his new vassal, whom he found zealous in his declarations of fealty, and regular in paying the stipulated tribute to Rome, directed his legate to accept of forty thousand. The issue of the whole was, that the bishops and considerable abbots got reparation beyond what they had any title to demand: the inferior clergy were obliged to sit down contented with their losses; and the king, after the interdict was taken off, renewed, in the most solemn manner, and by a new charter, sealed with gold, his professions of homage and obedience to the see of Rome.

This vexatious affair being at last concluded, the king, as if he had nothing farther to attend to but triumphs and victories, went over to Poictou, which still acknowledged his authority (x). He embarked at Portsmouth on the 2nd of February, 1214, and landed at Rochelle on the 15th; and now carried war into Philip's dominions. He besieged a castle near Angiers; but the approach of prince Louis, Philip's son, obliged him to raise the siege with such precipitation, that he left his tents, machines, and baggage behind him; and he returned to England with disgrace; where he arrived on the 19th of October, after having concluded a truce with Philip for five years. About the same time, he heard of the great and decisive victory gained by the king of France, at Bovines, over the emperor Otho, who had entered France according to agreement, at the head af one hundred and fifty thousand Germans; a victory which established for ever the glory of Philip, and gave full security to all his dominions. John could, therefore, think henceforth of nothing farther, than of ruling peaceably his own kingdom; and his close connections with the pope, which he was determined at any price to maintain, ensured him, as he imagined, the certain attainment of that object. But the last and most grievous scene of this prince's misfortunes still awaited him; and he was destined to pass through a series of more humiliating circumstances than had ever yet fallen to the lot of any other sovereign.

The introduction of the feudal law into England by William the Conqueror had much infringed the liberties, however imperfect, enjoyed by the Anglo-Saxons under their ancient government, and had reduced the whole people to a state of vassalage, and even the greater part of them to a state of real slavery. The necessity also of entrusting great power in the hands of a prince, who was to maintain military dominion over a vanquished nation, had engaged the Norman barons to submit to a more severe and absolute prerogative, than that to which men of their rank, in other feudal governments, were commonly subjected. The power of the crown, once raised to a high pitch, was not easily reduced; and the nation, during the course of a hundred and fifty years, was governed by an authority unknown, in the same degree, to all the kingdoms founded by the northern conquerors. Henry I. that he might ingratiate himself with the people, and exclude his elder brother Robert from the crown, had granted them a charter, favourable in many particulars to their liberties; Stephen had renewed the grant; Henry II. had confirmed it: but the concessions of all these princes had still remained without effect; and the same unlimited, at least irregular authority, continued to be exercised both by them and their successors. The only happiness was, that arms were never yet taken from the hands of the barons and people: the nation, by a great confederacy, might still vindicate its liberties; and nothing was more likely, than the character, conduct, and fortunes of the reigning prince, to produce such a general combination against him. Equally odious and contemptible, both in public and private life, he affronted the barons by his insolence, dishonoured their families by the seduction of their wives and daughters, enraged them by his tyranny, and gave discontent to all ranks of men by his endless exactions and impositions. The effect of these lawless practices had already appeared in the general demand made by the barons of a restoration of their privileges; and after he had reconciled himself to the pope, by abandoning the independence of the kingdom, he appeared to all his subjects in so despicable a light, that they universally thought they might with safety and honour insist upon their pretensions.

But nothing forwarded this confederacy so much as the concurrence of Langton, archbishop of Canterbury; a man whose memory, though he was obtruded on the nation by a palpable encroachment of the see of Rome, ought always to be respected by the English. This prelate, whether he was moved by the generosity of his nature, and his affection to the public good; or had entertained an animosity against John, on account of the long opposition made by that prince to his election; or thought that an acquisition of liberty to the people would serve to increase and secure the privileges of the church; had formed the plan of reforming the government, and had prepared the way for that great innovation, by inserting those singular clauses above mentioned in the oath which he administered to the king, before he would absolve him from the sentence of excommunication. Soon after, in a private meeting of some principal barons at London, he showed them a copy of Henry the First's charter, which, he said, he had happily found in a monastery; and he exhorted them to insist on the renewal and observance of it: the barons swore, that they would sooner lose their lives than depart from so reasonable a demand. The confederacy began to spread wider, and to comprehend almost all the barons in England; and a new and more numerous meeting was summoned by Langton, in November, at St. Edmondsbury, under colour of devotion. He again produced to the assembly the old charter of Henry; renewed his exhortations of unanimity and vigour in the prosecution of their purpose; and represented in the strongest colours the tyranny to which they had so long been subjected, and from which it now behoved them to free themselves and their posterity. The barons, inflamed by his eloquence, incited by the sense of their own wrongs, and encouraged by the appearance of their power and numbers, solemnly took an oath, before the high altar, to adhere to each other, to insist on their demands, and to make endless war on the king, till he should submit to grant them. They agreed, that, after the festival of Christmas, they would prefer in a body their common petition; and, in the mean time they separated, after mutually engaging, that they would put themselves in a posture of defence, would would inlist men and purchase arms, and would supply their castles with the provisions necessary for carrying on war against the king, in case he refused their request.

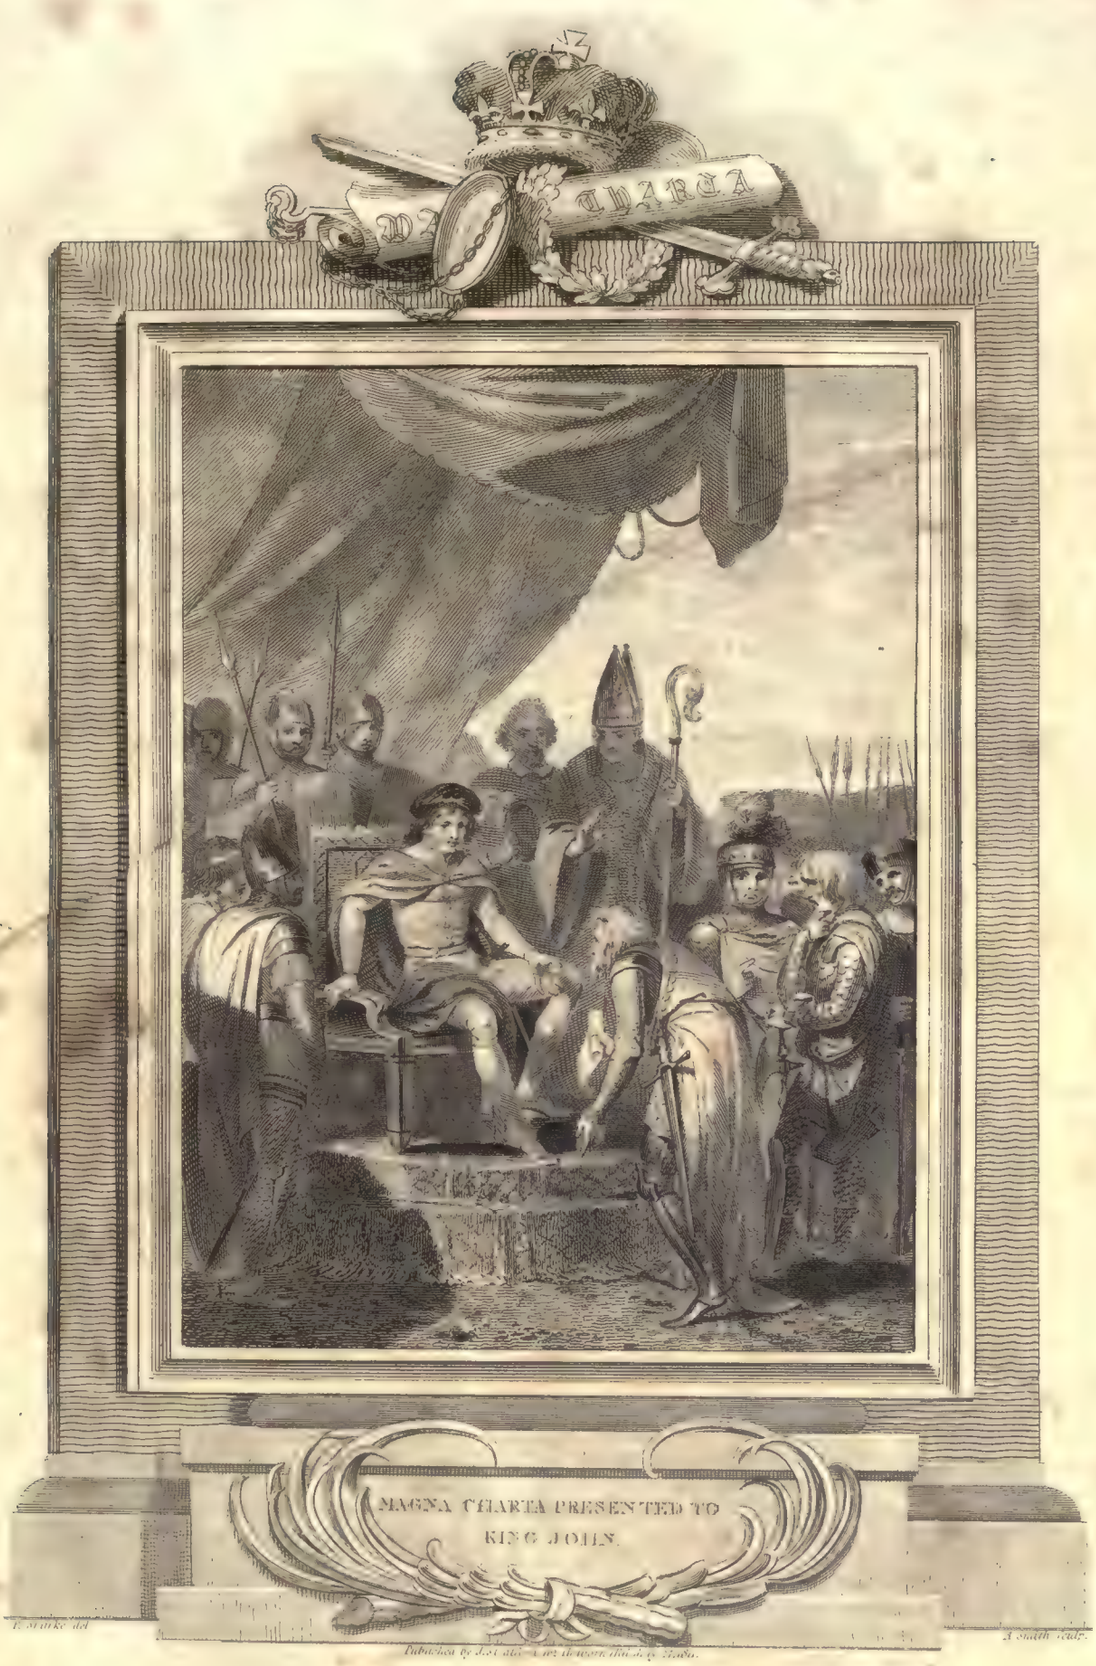
The barons appeared in London on the day appointed, January 6, 1215; and demanded of the king, that, in consequence of his own oath before the primate, as well as in deference to their just rights, he should grant them a renewal of Henry's charter, and a confirmation of the laws of Edward the Confessor. The king, alarmed with their zeal and unanimity, as well as with their power, required a delay; promised that, at the festival of Easter, he would give them a positive answer to their petition; and offered them the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of Ely, and the earl of Pembroke, the mareschal, as sureties for his fulfilling his engagement. The barons accepted of the terms, and peaceably returned to their castles.

During this interval, John, in order to break or subdue the league of his barons, endeavoured to avail himself of the ecclesiastical power, of whose influence he had, from his own recent misfortunes, had such fatal experience. He granted to the clergy a charter, on the 15th of January, relinquishing for ever that important prerogative for which his father and all his ancestors had zealously contended; yielding to them the free election of all vacancies; reserving only the power to issue a congé d'elire, and to subjoin a confirmation of the election; and declaring that, if either of these were withheld, the choice should nevertheless be deemed just and valid. He made a vow to lead an army into Palestine against the infidels, and he took on him the cross; in hopes that he should receive from the church that protection which he tendered to every one that had entered into this sacred and meritorious engagement. And he sent to Rome his agent, William de Mauclerc, to complain to the pope against the violence of his barons, and procure him a favourable sentence from that powerful tribunal. The barons also were not negligent on their part in endeavouring to engage the pope in their interests: they dispatched Eustace de Vesci to Rome; laid their case before Innocent as their feudal lord; and petitioned him to interpose his authority with the king, and oblige him to restore and confirm all their just and undoubted privileges.



Innocent beheld with regret the disturbances which had arisen in England, and was much inclined to favour John in his pretensions. He had no hopes of retaining and extending his newly acquired superiority over that kingdom, but by supporting so base and degenerate a prince, who was willing to sacrifice every consideration to his present safety: and he foresaw, that, if the administration should fall into the hands of the barons, they would vindicate the honour, liberty, and independence of the nation, with the same ardour which they now exerted in defence of their own. He wrote letters therefore to the prelates, to the nobility, and to the king himself. He exhorted the first to employ their good offices in conciliating peace between the contending parties, and put an end to civil discord: to the second, he expressed his disapprobation of their conduct in employing force to extort concessions from their reluctant sovereign: the last, he advised to treat his nobles with grace and indulgence, and to grant them such of their demands as should appear just and reasonable.

From the tenor of these letters, the barons easily saw that they must reckon on having the pope, as well as the king, for their adversary; but they had advanced too far to recede from their pretensions, and their passions were so deeply engaged, that it exceeded even the power of superstition itself any longer to control them. They also foresaw, that the thunders of Rome, when not seconded by the efforts of the English ecclesiastics, would be of small avail against them: and they perceived, that the most considerable of the prelates, as well as all the inferior clergy, professed the highest approbation of their cause. Besides that these men were seized with the national passion for laws and liberty; blessings, of which they themselves expected to partake; there concurred very powerful causes to loosen their devoted attachment to the apostolic see. It appeared, from the late usurpations of the Roman pontiff, that he pretended to reap alone all the advantages accruing from that victory, which, under his banners, though at their own peril, they had every where obtained over the civil magistrate. The pope assumed a despotic power over all the churches: their particular customs, privileges, and immunities, were treated with disdain: even the canons of general councils were set aside by his dispensing power: the whole administration of the church was centured in the court of Rome: all preferments ran of course in the same channel; and the provincial clergy saw, at least felt, that there was a necessity for limiting these pretensions. The legate, Nicolas, in filling those numerous vacancies which had fallen in England during an interdict of six years, had proceeded in the most arbitrary manner; and had paid no regard in conferring dignities to personal merit, to rank, to the inclination of the electors, or to the customs of the country. The English church was universally disgusted; and Langton himself, though he owed his elevation to an incroachment of the Romish see, was no sooner established in his high office, than he became jealous of the privileges annexed to it, and formed attachments with the country subjected to his jurisdiction. These causes, though they opened slowly the eyes of men, failed not to produce their effect: they set bounds to the usurpations of the papacy: the tide first stopped, and then turned against the sovereign pontiff: and it is otherwise inconceivable, how that age, so prone to superstition, and so sunk in ignorance, or rather so devoted to a spurious erudition, could have escaped falling into an absolute and total slavery under the court of Rome.

About the time that the pope's letters arrived in England, the malcontent barons, on the approach of Easter, when they were to expect the king's answer to their petition, met by agreement at Stamford; and they assembled a force, consisting of above two thousand knights, besides their retainers and inferior persons without number. Elated with their power, they advanced, on the 27th of April, in a body to Brackley, within fifteen miles of Oxford, the place where the court then resided; and they there received a message from the king, by the archbishop of Canterbury, and the earl of Pembroke, desiring to know what those liberties were which they so zealously challenged from their sovereign. They delivered to these messengers a schedule, containing the chief articles of their demands; which was no sooner shewn to the king, than he burst into a furious passion, and asked, why the barons did not also demand of him his kingdom? swearing that he would never grant them such liberties as must reduce himself to slavery.

No sooner were the confederated nobles informed of John's reply, than they chose Robert Fitz-Walter their general, whom they called "the mareschal of the army of God and of holy church;" and they proceeded without farther ceremony to levy war upon the king. They besieged the castle of Northampton during fifteen days, though without success: the gates of Bedford castle were willingly opened to them by William Beauchamp, its owner: they advanced to Ware in their way to London, where they held a correspondence with the principal citizens: they were received without opposition into that capital on the 24th of May; and finding now the great superiority of their force, they issued proclamations, requiring the other barons to join them; and menacing them, in case of refusal or delay, with committing devastation on their houses and estates. In order to shew what might be expected from their prosperous arms, they made incursions from London, and laid waste the king's parks and palaces; and all the barons, who had hitherto carried the semblance of supporting the royal party, were glad of this pretence for openly joining a cause they always had secretly favoured. The king, who had retired from Oxford to Odiham, in Hampshire, with a poor retinue of only seven knights; and after trying several expedients to elude the blow, after offering to refer all differences to the pope alone, or to eight barons, four to be chosen by himself, and four by the confederates, he found himself at last obliged to submit at discretion. He therefore sent the earl of Pembroke to London, to propose a conference with the barons; which accordingly took place in a large meadow, by the side of the Thames, between Windsor and Staines, called Runnemede, on the 15th of June.

The two parties encamped apart, like open enemies; and after a debate of a few days, the king, with a facility somewhat suspicious, signed and sealed the charter which was required of him, on the 19th of June, 1215. This famous deed, commonly called MAGNA CHARTA, or THE GREAT CHARTER, either granted or secured very important liberties and privileges to every order of men in the kingdom; to the clergy, to the barons, and to the people. Although many of these articles appear at the present day trifling and unimportant; yet, as it is justly deemed the grand palladium of English liberty—the sacred basis of those legal and political blessings which render the country try the envy and wonder of the world—and which every Briton ought to possess a copy of—we think it essentially necessary to insert it at full length, rather than to attempt an analysis, which might not give satisfaction to a lover of his country and the asserter of his own rights and privileges (y).

KING JOHN.

The generous spirit of the barons who extorted the Great Charter from their sovereign has been highly extolled by the generality of historians: but, while we hail with reverential awe the sacred fabric itself, we dare not sacrifice Truth at the shrine of Prejudice, by evincing our insensibility to the demerits of those who raised it, in employing the courtly language of panegyric where impartiality demands censure. That the conduct of the barons at this memorable crisis was influenced rather by selfish motives, that never find a residence in the bosom of true patriotism, than by a generous concern for the liberty of the subject, and the general good of the country, appear to us evident from the following circumstances:

Henry the First, in order to sanction the exclusion of his elder brother Robert, had, as we have mentioned before, granted a charter of liberties to his subjects, which was renewed and confirmed by the succeeding monarchs; and, after enumerating those rights and privileges which it tended to secure, expressly enjoined that they should be extended from the barons to their vassals, and so on to the lowest class of freemen or freeholders. Had the barons therefore been anxious to propagate that freedom they were so eager to enjoy, they would naturally have been willing to enforce, as far as lay in their power, an observance of the charter of Henry, by complying with the article in favour to their vassals. It could be but a feeble excuse to assert that, as the charter had not been observed with respect to themselves, they were not bound to extend its advantages to others. Such a plea might, indeed, be offered with propriety by a strenuous supporter of despotism; but could certainly never be seriously urged by a patriotic champion of liberty. This consideration impels us to believe that, had the king's tyranny only affected the people, the barons would have suffered him to exercise it with impunity: and, indeed, whoever considers with attention the uniform disposition of the feudal nobles, as well in England, as in other parts of Europe, will be compelled to acknowledge that, even under monarchs the most arbitrary, the weight of their oppression was more severely felt by the people in general than the rigours inflicted by the despot who filled the throne. But John, whose conduct was as weak as it was vicious, extended his severities indiscriminately to every class of his subjects: his rigorous enforcement of the feudal laws gave great displeasure to the barons; but their indignation was more powerfully excited by his regulations relative to the royal forests, by which they were deprived of their favourite diversions—to them, probably, more interesting than the welfare of their vassals. These were injuries that were felt but slightly, if at all, by the grand body of the people; yet were they sufficient to impel the barons to those successful exertions, which the potent consideration of rescuing their country from a state of the most abject slavery had proved inadequate to urge them to.

The truth of these observations must appear manifest from their inactivity during the daring attempts of the pope on the independence of the kingdom; and their still more degrading appeal to that aspiring pontiff, at the commencement of their contest with the king; in which, by the acknowledgement of Innocent as their feudal lord, they became accessary to the disgrace of their sovereign, and voluntarily resigned that liberty which they pretended to assert. Had their bosom glowed with the generous flame of pure patriotism, they would, for a time at least, have sacrificed their private resentment to the public good; and have endeavoured, even though their endeavours had been thwarted by the king himself, to oppose the unjust efforts of a foreign foe, whom they suffered to reduce their country to an ignominious dependence before they attempted to redress the injuries themselves had sustained. Farther, had the public welfare been the principal object of their concern, in sixty-three articles which this celebrated charter contains, they would surely have inserted more than one petty clause in favour of the most numerous body of men in the kingdom; that is, the villans, or all such as were not freeholders, whose exemption from losing, by fine, their carts, ploughs, and implements of husbandry was the sole advantage they derived from a deed that should have equally extended its beneficent effects to all ranks, from the proudest nobleman to the meanest peasant.

It must, however, be confessed, that the former articles of the Great Charter contain such mitigations and explanations of the feudal law as are reasonable and equitable; and that the latter involve all the chief outlines of a legal government, and provide for the equal distribution of justice and free enjoyment of property; the great objects for which political society was at first founded by men, which the people have a perpetual and unalienable right to recal, and which no time, nor precedent, nor statute, nor positive institution, ought to deter them from keeping ever uppermost in their thoughts and attention. Though the provisions made by this charter might, conformably to the genius of the age, be esteemed too concise, and too bare of circumstances, to maintain the execution of its articles, in opposition to the chicanery of lawyers, supported by the violence of power; time gradually ascertained the sense of all the ambiguous expressions; and those barons, who first extorted this concession, still held their swords in their hands, and could turn them against those who dared on any pretence to depart from the original spirit and meaning of the grant. We may now, from the tenor of this charter, conjecture what those laws were of king Edward which the English nation, during so many generations, still desired, with such an obstinate perseverance, to have recalled and established. They were chiefly the latter articles of Magna Charta; and the barons who, at the beginning of these commotions demanded the revival of the Saxon laws, undoubtedly thought that they had sufficiently satisfied the people, by procuring them this concession, which comprehended the principal objects to which they had so long aspired. But what we are most to admire is, the prudence and moderation of those haughty nobles themselves, who were enraged by injuries, inflamed by opposition, and elated by a total victory over their sovereign. They were content, even in this plenitude of power, to depart, from some articles of Henry I's charter, which they made the foundation of their demands, particularly from the abolition of wardships, a matter of the greatest importance; and they seem to have been sufficiently careful not to diminish too far the power and revenue of the crown. If they appear, therefore, to have carried other demands to too great a height, it can be aseribed only to the faithless and tyrannical character of the king himself, of which they had long had experience, and which, they foresaw, would, if they provided no farther security, lead him soon to infringe their new liberties, and revoke his own concessions. This alone gave birth to those other articles, seemingly exorbitant, which were added as a rampart for the safe-guard of the Great Charter.

The barons to secure the possession of the privileges granted by this charter, obliged the king to agree that London should remain in their hands, and the Tower be consigned to the custody of the primate, till the 15th of August ensuing, or till the execution of the several articles of the Great Charter. The better to ensure the same end, John allowed them to chuse five-and-twenty members from their own body, as conservators of the public liberties; and no bounds were set to the authority of these men either in extent or duration. If any complaint were made of a violation of the charter, whether attempted by the king, justiciaries, sheriffs, or foresters, any four of these barons might admonish the king to redress the grievance; if satisfaction were not obtained, they could assemble the whole council of twenty-five; who, in conjunction with the great council, were empowered to compel him to observe the charter; and in any case of resistance, might levy war against him, attack his castles, and employ every kind of violence, except against his royal person, and that of his queen and children. All men throughout the kingdom were bound, under the penalty of confiscation, to swear obedience to the twenty-five barons; and the freeholders of each county were to chuse twelve knights, who were to make report of such evil customs as required redress, conformably to the tenor of the Great Charter (z)

(y) A translation of this justly celebrated charter will be found at the close of this reign, page 139.

(z) This seems a very strong proof that the house of commons was not then in being: otherwise the knights and burgesses from the several counties could have given in to the lords a list of grievances, without so unusual an election. Hume.

The names of those conservators were, the earls of Clare, Albemarle, Gloucester, Winchester, Hereford, Roger Bigod earl of Norfolk, Robert de Vere earl of Oxford, William Mareschal the younger, Robert Fitz-Walter, Gilbert de Clare, Eustace de Vescey, Gilbert Delaval, William de Moubray, Geoffrey de Say, Roger de Mombezon, William de Huntingfield, Robert de Ros, the constable of Chester, William de Aubenie, Richard de Perci, William Maler, John Fitz-Robert, William de Lanvalay, Hugh de Bigod, and Roger de Montfichet. These noblemen were, by this convention, really invested with the sovereignty of the kingdom: they were rendered co-ordinate with the king, or rather superior to him, in the exercise of the executive power; and as there was no circumstance of government which, either directly or indirectly, might not bear a relation to the security or observance of the Great Charter, there could scarcely occur any incident in which they might not lawfully interpose their authority.

In consequence of these concessions, a number of the nobility now applied to John for the restitution of lands, and the government of castles, which they claimed by hereditary right; and he accordingly appointed an inquisition to investigate the validity of their pretensions; but in the interim, he ceded the castle of Rochester to archbishop Langton, as a government which anciently belonged to the see of Canterbury. He next issued writs directed to the different sheriffs, ordering them to constrain every one to swear obedience to the twenty-five conservators: he dismissed all his foreign mercenaries, and took every necessary step to promote the observance of the charter. He also remitted all crimes and transgressions committed from the foregoing Easter to the conclusion of the treaty; while the barons, on their part, renewed their homage to him, which they had publicly renounced at the commencement of the revolt.

John seemed to submit passively to all these regulations, however injurious to majesty: besides the above concessions, he pretended that his government was thenceforth to run in a new tenor, and be more indulgent to the liberty and independence of his people. But he only dissembled till he should find a favourable opportunity for annulling all his declarations. The injuries and indignities which he had formerly suffered from the pope and the king of France, as they came from equals or superiors, seemed to make but small impressions on him: but the sense of this perpetual and total subjection under his own rebellious vassals, sunk deep in his mind, and he was determined, at all hazards, to throw off so ignominious a slavery. He grew sullen, silent, and reserved: he shunned the society of his courtiers and nobles: he retired into the Isle of Wight, as if desirous of hiding his shame and confusion; but in his retreat he meditated the most fatal vengeance against all his enemies. He secretly sent abroad his emissaries to inlist foreign soldiers, and to invite the rapacious Barbançons into his service, by the prospect of sharing the spoils of England, and reaping the forfeitures of so many opulent barons, who had incurred the guilt of rebellion by rising in arms against him: and he dispatched a messenger to Rome, in order to lay before the pope the Great Charter, which he had been compelled to sign, and to complain, before that tribunal, of the violence which had been imposed upon him.

When the charter was read before the sovereign pontiff, Innocent, who considered himself as feudal lord of the kingdom, was incensed at the temerity of the barons, who, though they pretended to appeal to his authority, had dared, without waiting for his consent, to impose such terms on a prince, who, by resigning to the Roman pontiff his crown and independence, had placed himself immediately under the papal protection. He issued, therefore, a bull, dated the 24th of August, in which, from the plenitude of his apostolic power, and from the authority which God had committed to him, to build and destroy kingdoms, to plant and overthrow, he annulled and abrogated the whole charter, as unjust in itself, as obtained by compulsion, and as derogatory to the dignity of the apostolic see. He prohibited the barons from exacting the observance of it: he even prohibited the king himself from paying any regard to it: he absolved him and his subjects from all oaths which they had been constrained to take to that purpose; and he pronounced a general sentence of excommunication against every one who should persevere in maintaining such treasonable and iniquitous pretensions.

The king, as his foreign forces arrived along with this bull, now ventured to take off the mask; and, under sanction of the pope's decree, recalled all the liberties which he had granted to his subjects, and which he had solemnly sworn to observe. But the spiritual weapon was found, upon trial, to carry less force with it than he had reason from his own experience to apprehend. The primate, to whom the bulls were addressed, refused to obey the pope in publishing the sentence of excommunication against the barons; and though he was cited to Rome, that he might attend a general council there assembled, and was suspended on account of his disobedience to the pope, and his secret correspondence with the king's enemies; though a new and particular sentence of excommunication was pronounced by name against the principal barons, John still found that his nobility and people, and even his clergy, adhered to the defence of their liberties, and to their combination against him: the sword of his foreign mercenaries was all he had to trust to for restoring the authority he had lost.

After obtaining the Great Charter, the barons seem to have been lulled into a fatal security, and to have taken no rational measures, in case of the introduction of a foreign force, for re-assembling their armies. The king was, from the first master of the field; and immediately laid siege to the castle of Rochester, which was obstinately defended by William de Albiney, at the head of a hundred and forty knights with their retainers, but was at last reduced by famine, on the 30th of November. John, irritated with the resistance, intended to have hanged the governor and all the garrison; but, on the representation of William de Mouleon, who suggested to him the danger of reprisals, he was content to sacrifice, in this barbarous manner, the inferior prisoners only. The captivity of William de Albiney, the best officer among the confederated barons, was an irreparable loss to their cause: and no regular opposition was thenceforth made to the progress of the royal arms. The ravenous and barbarous mercenaries, incited by a cruel and enraged prince, were let loose against the estates, tenants, manors, houses, parks, of the barons, and spread devastation over the face of the kingdom. Nothing was to be seen but the flames of villages and castles reduced to ashes, the consternation and misery of the inhabitants, tortures exercised by the soldiery to make them reveal their concealed treasures, and reprisals no less barbarous committed by the barons and their partizans on the royal demesnes, and on the estates of such as still adhered to the crown. The king, marching through the whole extent of England, from Dover to the borders of Scotland, laid the provinces waste on each side of him; and considered every state, which was not his immediate property, as entirely hostile, and the object of military execution. The nobility of the north, in particular, who had shewn the greatest violence in the recovery of their liberties, and who, acting in a separate body, had expressed their discontent even at the concessions made by the Great Charter, as they could expect no mercy, fled before him with their wives and families, and purchased the friendship of Alexander, the young king of Scots, by doing homage to him.

The barons, reduced to this desperate extremity, and menaced with the total loss of their liberties, their properties, and their lives, employed a remedy no less desperate; and making applications to the court of France, they offered to acknowledge Louis, the eldest son of Philip, for their sovereign, on condition that he would afford them protection from the violence of their enraged prince. Though the sense of the common rights of mankind, the only rights that are entirely indefeasible, might have justified them in the deposition of their king, they declined insisting before Philip on a pretension which is commonly so disagreeable to sovereigns, and which sounds harshly in their royal ears. They affirmed that John was incapable of succeeding to the crown, by reason of the attainder passed upon him during his brother's reign; though that attainder had been reversed, and Richard had even, by his last will, declared him his successor. They pretended that he was already legally deposed by sentence of the peers of France, on account of the murder of his nephew: though that sentence could not possibly regard any thing but his transmarine dominions, which alone he held in vassalage to that crown. On more plausible grounds they affirmed, that he had already deposed himself by doing homage to the pope, changing the nature of his sovereignty, and resigning an independent crown for a fee under a foreign power. And as Blanche of Castile, the wife of Louis, was descended by her mother from Henry II. they maintained, though may other princes stood before her in the order of succession, that they had not shaken off the royal family in chusing her husband for their sovereign.

Philip was strongly tempted to lay hold on the rich prize which was offered him. The legate menaced him with interdicts and excommunications if he invaded the patrimony of St. Peter, or attacked a prince who was under the immediate protection of the holy see: but as Philip was assured of the obedience of his own vassals, his principles were changed with the times, and he now undervalued as much all papal censures, as he formerly pretended to pay respect to them. His chief scruple was with regard to the fidelity which he might expect from the English barons in their new engagements, and the danger of entrusting his son and heir into the hands of men who might, on any caprice or necessity, make peace with their native sovereign, by sacrificing a pledge of so much value. He therefore exacted from the barons twenty-five hostages of the most noble birth in the kingdom; and having obtained this security, he sent over first a small army to the relief of the confederates; then more numerous forces, which arrived with Louis himself at their head.

The first effect of the young prince's appearance in England, who landed at Sandwich in Kent on the 23rd of May, 1216, was the desertion of John's foreign troops, who, being mostly levied in Flanders, and other provinces of France, refused to serve against the heir of their monarchy. The Gascons and Poictevins alone, who were still John's subjects, adhered to his cause; but they were too weak to maintain that superiority in the field which they had hitherto supported against the confederated barons. Many considerable noblemen deserted John's party, the earls of Salisbury, Arundel, Warrenne, Oxford, Albemarle, and William Mareschal the younger: his castles fell daily into the hands of the enemy; Dover was the only place which, from the valour and fidelity of Hubert de Burgh the governor, made resistance to the progress of Louis: and the barons had the melancholy prospect of finally succeeding in their purpose, and of escaping the tyranny of their own king, by imposing on themselves and the nation a foreign yoke. But this union was of short duration between the French and English nobles; and the imprudence of Louis, who on every occasion shewed too visible a preference to the former, increased that jealousy which it was so natural for the latter to entertain in their present situation. The viscount of Melun too, it is said, one of his courtiers, fell sick at London, and finding the approaches of death, he sent for some of his friends, among the English barons, and warning them of their danger, revealed Louis's secret intentions of exterminating them and their families as traitors to their prince, and of bestowing their estates and dignities on his native subjects, in whose fidelity he could more reasonably place confidence: this story, whether true or false, was universally reported and believed; and concurring with other circumstances which rendered it credible, did great prejudice to the cause of Louis. The earl of Salisbury, and other noblemen deserted again to John's party; and as men easily changed sides in a civil war, especially where their power is founded on an hereditary and independent authority, and is not derived from the opinion and favour of the people, the French prince had reason to dread a sudden reverse of fortune. The king was assembling a considerable army, with a view of fighting one great battle for his crown; but marching from Lynne to Lincolnshire, his road lay along the sea-shore, which was overflowed at high water; and not chusing the proper time for his journey, he lost in the inundation all his carriages, treasures, baggages, and regalia. The affliction for this disaster, and vexation from the distracted state of his affairs, increased the sickness under which he then laboured. Being entertained at the abbey of Swineshead, it has been asserted that he injured his constitution by a surfeit, and though he reached the castle of Newark, he was obliged to halt there, and his distemper soon put an end to his life (a), on the 19th of October, 1216, in the forty-ninth year of his age, and eighteenth of his reign; and freed the nation from the dangers to which it was equally exposed, by his success or by his misfortunes.

The character of this prince is nothing but a complication of vices, equally mean and odious; ruinous to himself, and destructive to his people. Cowardice, inactivity, folly, levity, licentiousness, ingratitude, treachery, tyranny, and cruelty; all these qualities appear too evidently in the several incidents of his life, to give us room to suspect that the disagreable picture has been anywise overcharged by the prejudices of the ancient historians. It is hard to say whether his conduct to his father, his brother, his nephew, or his subjects, was most culpable; or whether his crimes, in these respects, were not even exceeded by the baseness which appeared in his transactions with the king of France, the pope, and the barons. His European dominions, when they devolved to him by the death of his brother, were more extensive than have ever, since his time, been ruled by any English monarch: but he first lost, by his misconduct, the flourishing provinces in France, the ancient patrimony of his family: he subjected his kingdom to a shameful vassalage under the see of Rome: he saw the prerogatives of his crown diminished by law, and still more reduced by faction: and he died at last, when in danger of being totally expelled by a foreign power, and of either ending his life miserably in a prison, or seeking shelter as a fugitive from the pursuit of his enemies.

The prejudices against this prince were so violent, that he was believed to have sent an embassy to the Miramoulin or emperor of Morocco, and to have offered to change his religion and become Mohammedan, in order to purchase the protection of that monarch. But though this story is told us, on plausible authority, by Matthew Paris, it is in itself utterly improbable; except that there is nothing so incredible but may be believed to proceed from the folly and wickedness of John.

The monks throw great reproaches on this prince for his impiety and even infidelity; and as an instance of it, they tell us, that having one day caught a very fat stag, he exclaimed, "How plump and well fed is this animal! and yet I dare swear he never heard mass." This sally of wit, upon the usual corpulency of the priests, more than all his enormous crimes and iniquities, made him pass with them for an atheist

John left two legitimate sons behind him, Henry, born on the first of October, 1207, and now nine years of age; and Richard, born on the 6th of January, 1209; and three daughters, Jane, afterwards married to Alexander king of Scots; Eleanor, married first to William Mareschal the younger, earl of Pembroke, and afterwards to Simon Montford, earl of Leicester; and Isabella, married to the emperor Frederic II. All these children were born to him by Isabella of Angoulême his second wife. His illegitimate children were numerous; but none of them were anywise distinguished.

It was this king who, in the ninth year of his reign, first gave by charter to the city of London, the right of electing annually a mayor out of its own body, an office which was till now held for life. He gave the city also power to elect and remove its sheriffs at pleasure, and its common-council-men annually. John likewise accorded to the Cinque Ports those peculiar privileges of which they still remain possessed. London Bridge, composed of stone, was finished in this reign: the former bridge was of wood. Maud the empress was the first that built a stone bridge in England.

MAGNA CHARTA, OR THE GREAT CHARTER.

The very important instrument which we have here presented to the reader is translated from an authentic copy, deposited in the library of the British Museum. It differs in several passages from the copy which appears in Matthew Paris's History, but the variations are of little moment.

JOHN, (by the grace of God) king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou to all his archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justiciaries, foresters, sheriffs, governors, officers, and to all his bailiffs and faithful subjects, wisheth health. Know ye, that we, from our regard to God, and for the salvation of our own soul, and for the souls of our ancestors, and of our heirs, to the honour of God, the exaltation of our holy church, and the amendment of our kingdom, by the advice of our venerable fathers, Stephen archbishop of Canterbury primate of all England, and cardinal of the holy Roman church, Henry archbishop of Dublin, William of London, Peter of Winchester, Joceline of Bath and Glastonbury, Hugh of Lincoln, Walter of Worcester, William of Coventry, Benedict of Rochester, bishops; of master Pandulph, dulph, the pope's subdeacon and familiar, brother Eymeric master of the knights-templars in England, and of the following noble persons, William Mareschal, earl of Pembroke, William earl of Salisbury, William earl of Warrenne, William earl of Arundel, Alan of Galloway constable of Scotland, Warin Fitz-Gerald, Peter Fitz-Herbert, Hubert de Burgh seneschal of Poictou, Hugh de Nevil, Matthew Fitz-Herbert, Thomas Basset, Alan Basset, Philip d'Albiney, Robert de Roppel, John Mareschal, John Fitz-Hugh, and of others of our liegemen; have granted to God, and by this our present charter have confirmed, for us, and our heirs for ever.

(a) Some old authors pretend, that he was poisoned by a monk.

1st. That the English church shall be free, and shall have her whole rights, and her liberties inviolate; and we will have this observed in such a manner, that it may appear thence, that the freedom of election, which was reputed most necessary to the English church, which we granted, and by our charter confirmed, and of which we obtained the confirmation from pope Innocent III. before the rupture between us and our barons, was granted of our own free will. Which charter we shall observe; and we order it to be observed, with good faith, by our heirs for ever.—We have also granted to all the freemen of our kingdom, for us and our heirs for ever, all the under-written liberties, to be enjoyed and holden by them and their heirs, of us and our heirs.

2. If any of our earls or barons, or others who hold of us in chief by military service, shall die, and at his death his heir shall be of full age, and owe a relief, he shall have his inheritance by the ancient relief, viz the heirs or heir of an earl, for a whole earl's barony, by one hundred pounds; the heir or heirs of a baron, for a whole barony, by one hundred pounds (b); the heir or heirs of a knight, for a whole knight's fee, by one hundred shillings at most; and he who owes less shall give less, according to the ancient custom of fees.

3. But if the heir of any such person be a minor, and in wardship, when he comes of age he shall have his inheritance without relief and without fine.

4. The warden of an heir who is under age, shall not take of the lands of the heir any but reasonable issues, reasonable customs, and reasonable services, and that without destruction and waste of the tenants or effects; and if we commit the custody of any such lands to a sheriff, or to any other person who is bound to answer to us for the issue of them, and he shall make destruction or waste upon the ward-lands, we will recover damages of him, and the lands shall be committed to two legal and discreet men of that fee, who shall answer for the issues to us, or to him to whom we have assigned them; and if we grant or sell to any one the custody of any such lands, and he shall make destruction or waste, he shall lose the custody which shall be committed to two legal and discreet men of that fee, who shall answer to us as was said before.

5. The warden, as long as he shall have the custody of the lands, shall keep in order the houses, parks, warrens, ponds, mills, and other things belonging to them, out of their issues; and he shall deliver to the heir, when of age, his whole estate provided with ploughs and other implements of agriculture, according to what the season requires, and the profits of the lands can reasonably afford.

6. Heirs shall be married without disparagement, and before the marriage is contracted it shall be notified to the relations of the heir by consanguinity.

7. A widow, after the death of her husband, shall immediately, and without difficulty, have her marriage-goods, and her inheritance; nor shall she give any thing for her dower, or her marriage-goods, or her inheritance, which her husband and she held on the day of his death. And she may remain in her husband's house forty days after his death, within which time her dower shall be assigned to her.

8. No widow shall be compelled to marry, while she thinks proper to live without a husband; but she shall give security that she will not marry without our consent, if she hold of us, or without the consent of the lord of whom she holds, if she holds of another.

9. Neither we nor our bailiffs shall sieze any land or rents for any debt, while the chattels of the debtor are sufficient for the payment of it; nor shall the sureties of the debtor be distrained, while the principal debtor is able to pay the debt: and if the principal debtor fail in payment of the debt, not having the means for discharging it, the sureties shall answer for the debt; and, if they please, they shall have the lands and rents of the debtor, till satisfaction be made to them for the debt which they had before paid for him, unless the principal debtor can shew that he is discharged from it by the said sureties.

10. If any one shall have borrowed from the Jews, more or less, and die before that debt is paid, the debt shall be liable to no interest as long as the heir shall be under age, of whomsoever he holds; and if that debt shall fall into our hands, we will not take any thing except the chattels contained in the bond.

11. And if any one shall die indebted to the Jews, his wife shall have her dower, and pay nothing of that debt; and if children of the defunct remain who are under age, necessaries shall be provided for them, according to the tenement which belonged to the defunct; and out of the surplus the debt shall be paid saving the rights of the lords. The same rules shall be observed with respect to debts due to others than Jews.

12. No scutage or aid shall be imposed, in our kingdom, except by the common council of our kingdom, but for redeeming our person, for making our eldest son a knight, and for once marrying our eldest daughter; and for these a reasonable aid shall be demanded. This extends to the aids of the city of London.

13. And the city of London shall have all her ancient liberties, and her free customs, as well by land as by water. Besides, we grant, that all other cities, burghs, towns, and sea-ports, shall have all their liberties and free customs.

14. And to have a common council of the kingdom, to assess an aid otherwise than in the three cases above-mentioned, or to assess a scutage, we will cause to be summoned the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and greater barons, singly by our letters; and besides, we will cause to be summoned in general, by our sheriffs and bailiffs, all those who hold of us in chief, to a certain day, at the distance of forty days at least, and to a certain place; and in all the letters of summons, we will express the cause of the summons; and the summons being thus made, the business shall go on at the day appointed, according to the advice of those who shall be present, though all who had been summoned may not have come.

15. We will not give leave to any one, for the future to take an aid of his free tenants, except for redeeming his own person, making his eldest son a knight, and marrying once his eldest daughter; and then only a reasonable aid.

16. Let none be distrained to perform more service for a knight's fee, or any other free tenement, than what is due.

17. Common pleas shall not follow our court, but shall be holden in some certain place.

18. Assises on the writs of Novel Disseisin, Mort d'Ancestre (death of the ancestor), and Darrein presentment (last presentation,) shall not be taken but in their proper counties, and in this manner.—We, our chief justiciary when we are out of the kingdom, shall send two justiciaries into each county, four times a year, who, with four knights of each county, chosen by the county, shall take the said assises, at a stated time and place, within the county.

19. And if the said assises cannot be taken on the day of the county-court, let as many knights and freeholders of those who were present at the county-court, remain behind, as may be sufficient to take the said assises, according to the greater or less importance of the business.

20. A freeman shall not be amerced for a small offence, but according to the degree of the offence; and for a great delinquency, according to the magnitude of the delinquency, saving his contenement (c): a merchant shall be amerced in the same manner, saving his merchandize; and a villan, saving his implements of husbandry. If they fall into our mercy, none of the said amerciaments shall be assessed, but by the oath of honest men of the vicinage.

21. Earls and barons shall not be amerced but by their peers, and then only according to the degree of their delinquency.

22. No clerk shall be amerced for his lay-tenement, but according to the manner of others aforesaid, and not according to the quantity of his eclesiastical benefice.

23. Neither a town nor a tenant shall be distrained to build bridges, or make embankments, except those who anciently, and of right are bound to do it.

24. No sheriff, constable, coroner, or bailiff of ours, shall hold pleas of our crown.

25. All counties, hundreds, wapentakes and tithings, shall be at the ancient rents, without any increase, except our demesne-manors.

26. If any one holding of us a lay-fee dies, and the sheriff or our bailiff shall shew our letters-patent of our summons for a debt which the defunct owed to us, it shall be lawful for the sheriff or our bailiff to attach and register the chattels of the defunct found on that fee, to the amount of that debt, at the view of lawful men, so that nothing shall be removed thence till our debt is paid to us. The clear overplus shall be left to the executors, to fulfil the testament of the defunct; and if nothing is due to us from him, all the chattels shall devolve to the defunct; saving to his wife and children their reasonable shares.

27. If any freeman shall die intestate, his chattels shall be distributed by his nearest relations and friends, at the view of the church, saving to every one the debts which the defunct owed to him.

28. No constable or bailiff of ours shall take the corn or other goods of any one, without instantly paying money for them, unless he can obtain respite by consent of the seller.

29. No constable (governor of a castle) shall distrain any knight

(b) This is marks in Matthew Paris; a reading which seems preferable. M. Paris, edit Tigur. p. 246.

(c) A contenement is a reservation of those possessions without which a person could not pursue his former occupation.

knight to give money for castle-guard, if he is willing to perform it by his own person, or by another proper man, if he cannot perform it himself, for a reasonable cause. And if we shall have led or sent him into the army, he shall be excused from castle-guard, according to the space of time he shall have been in the army at our command.

30. No sheriff, or bailiff of ours, or any other person, shall take the horses or carts of any freeman, for carriage, without the consent of the said freeman.

31. Neither we, nor our bailiffs, shall, take another man's wood, for our castles or other uses, without the consent of him to whom the wood belongs.

32. We will not retain the lands of those who have been convicted of felony, above one year and one day, and then they shall be given up to the lord of the fee.

33. All kydels (wears) for the future shall be quite removed out of the Thames, the Medway, and throughout all England, except on the sea-coast.

34. The writ which is called Præcipe for the future shall not be granted to any one concerning any tenement by which a freeman may lose his court.

35. There shall be only one measure of wine through all our kingdom, and one measure of ale, and one measure of corn, viz. the quarter of London; and one breadth of dyed cloth and of russets, and of halberjects, viz. two ells within the lists. It shall be the same with weights as with measures.

36. Nothing shall be given or taken in future for the writ of inquisition of life or limb; but it shall be given gratis and not denied.

37. If any one holds of us by fee-farm, or soccage, or burgage, and holds an estate of another by military service, we will not have the custody of the heir, or of his land, which is of the fee of another, on account of that fee-farm, or soccage, or burgage, nor will we have the care of that fee-farm itself, or soccage, or burgage, unless the fee-farm owes military service. We shall not have the custody of the heir, or of the land of any one, which he holds of another by military service, on account of any petty sergeantry which he holds of us, by giving us knives, arrows, or the like.

38. No bailiff, for the future, shall put any man to his law, upon his own simple affirmation, without credible witnesses produced to that purpose.

39. No freeman shall be seized or imprisoned, or disseised, or outlawed, or any way destroyed, nor will we try him, or pass sentence on him, except by the legal judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

40. To none will we sell, to none will we deny, to none will we delay right or justice.

41. All merchants shall be safe and secure in coming into England, in going out of England, and staying and travelling through England, as well by land as by water, to buy and sell, without any unjust exactions, according to ancient and right customs, except in time of war, and if they be of a nation at war against us. And if such are found in our dominions at the beginning of a war, they shall be apprehended without injury of their bodies and goods, till it be known to us, or to our chief justiciary, how the merchants of our country are treated by the nation at war against us; and if ours are safe there, the others shall be safe in our country.

42. It shall be lawful for any person in future, to go out of our kingdom, and to return safely and securely, by land and by water, saving his allegiance, except in time of war, for some short space, for the common good of the kingdom, except prisoners, outlaws according to the law of the land, and people of the nation at war against us, and merchants, who shall be treated as is said above.

43. If any one holds of any escheat, as of the honour of Wallingford, Nottingham, Boulogne, Lancaster, or of other escheats which are now in our hands and are baronies, and shall die, his heir shall not give any other relief, or do any other service to us, than he would have done to the baron, if that barony had been in the hands of the baron; and we will hold it in the same manner that the baron held it.

44. Men who dwell without the forest, shall not come, for the future, before our justiciaries of the forest, on a common summons, unless they be parties in a plea, or sureties for some person or persons who are attached for the forest.

45. We will not make men justiciaries, constables, sheriffs, or bailiffs, unless they understand the law of the land, and are well disposed to observe it.

46. All barons who have founded abbeys, of which they have charters of the kings of England, or ancient tenure, shall have the custody of them when they become vacant, as they ought to have.

47. All forests which have been made in our time, shall be immediately disforested; and the same shall be done with water-banks which have been fenced in our time.

48. All evil customs of forests and warrens, and of foresters and warreners, sheriffs and their officers, water-banks and their keepers, shall immediately be inquired into by the twelve knights of the same county, upon oath, who shall be chosen by the good men of the same county; and within forty days after the inquisition is made, they shall be quite destroyed by them, never to be restored; provided this be previously notified to us, or to our justiciary, if we are not in England.

49. We will immediately restore all hostages and charters which have been delivered to us by the English, in security of the peace, and of their faithful service.

50. We will remove from their offices the relations of Gerard de Athyes, that for the future they shall have no office in England; Engelard de Cygony, Andrew, Peter, and Gyone de Chancell, Gyone de Cygony, Geoffrey de Martin, and his brothers; Philip Mark, and his brothers; and Geoffrey, his nephew; and all their followers.

51. And immediately after the conclusion of the peace, we will remove out of our kingdom all foreign knights, cross-bow-men, servants, and stipendiary soldiers, who have come with horses and arms to the molestation of the kingdom.

52. If any have been disseised or dispossessed by us, without a legal verdict of the peers, of their lands, castles, liberties, or rights, we will immediately make restitution; and if a question shall arise on this head, it shall be determined by the verdict of the twenty-five barons, mentioned below, for the security of the peace. But as to all those things of which any one hath been disseised or dispossessed, without a legal verdict of his peers, by king Henry our father, or king Richard our brother, which we have in our hand, or others hold with our warrants, we shall have respite till the common term of the crusards, except those concerning which a plea had been moved, or an inquisition taken by our precept, before our taking the cross. But as soon as we shall return from our expedition, or if, by chance, we shall not go upon our expedition, we shall immediately do complete justice therein.

53. We shall have the same respite, and in the same manner, concerning the justice to be done about disforesting or continuing the forests which Henry our father, or Richard our brother, had made, and about the wardship of lands which are of the fee of some other person, but the wardship of which we have hitherto had, on account of a fee which some one held of us by military service; and about abbeys which had been founded in fee of another, and not in ours, in which abbeys the lord of the fee hath claimed a right. And when we shall have returned, or if we shall desist from our expedition, we shall immediately do complete justice in all these pleas.

54. No man shall be apprehended or imprisoned on the appeal of a woman, for the death of any other man than her husband.

55. All fines that have been made with us unjustly, or contrary to the law of the land, and all amerciaments that have been imposed unjustly, or contrary to the law of the land, shall be remitted or disposed of by the verdict of the twenty-five barons, mentioned below, for the security of the peace, or by the verdict of the major part of them, together with Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, if he can be present, and others whom he may think proper to bring with him; and if he cannot be present, the business shall proceed without him: but if one or more of the twenty-five barons have a similar plea, let them be removed from that particular trial, and others elected and sworn by the residue of the same twenty-five, be substituted in their room, only for that trial.

56. If we have disseised or dispossessed any Welshmen of their lands, liberties, or other rights without a legal verdict of their peers, in England or in Wales, they shall be immediately restored to them; and if a question shall arise, let it be determined in the marches by the verdict of their peers, if the tenement be in England, according to the law of England; if the tenement be in Wales, according to the law of Wales; and if the tenement be in the marches, according to the law of the marches. The Welsh shall do the same to us and our subjects.

57. But concerning those things of which any Welshman hath been disseised or dispossessed without a legal verdict of his peers, by king Henry our father, or king Richard our brother, which we have in our hand, or others hold with our warrantry, we shall have respite, until the common term of the crusards, except those concerning which a plea had been moved, or an inquisition taken, by our precept, before we took the cross. But as soon as we shall return from our expedition; or if, by chance, we shall not go upon our expedition, we shall immediately do complete justice therein, according to the laws of Wales, and the parts aforesaid.

58. We will immediately deliver up the son of Lewellyn, and all the hostages of Wales, and the charters which have been given to us for security of the peace.

59. We shall do to Alexander, king of Scotland, concerning the restoration of his sisters and hostages, and his liberties and rights, according to the form in which we act to our other barons of England, unless it ought to be otherwise by charters which we have from his father William, late king of Scotland; and that by the verdict of his peers in our court.

60. But all these above-mentioned customs and liberties which we have granted in our kingdom, to be enjoyed by our tenants, as far as concerns us, all our clergy and laity shall observe towards their tenants, as far as concerns them.

61. But since we have granted all these things for the honour of God, and the amendment of our kingdom, and for the better extinction of the discord arising between us and our barons, being desirous that these things should possess entire and unshaken stability for ever, we give and grant to them the security under written, viz. That the barons may elect twenty-five barons of the kingdom, whom they please, who shall, with their whole power, observe and keep, and cause to be observed, the peace and liberties which we have granted to them, and have confirmed by this our present charter, in this manner. That if we, or our justiciary, or our bailiffs, or any of our officers, shall have injured any one in any thing, or shall have violated any article of the peace or security, and the injury shall have been notified to four of the twenty-five barons, these four barons shall come to us, or to our justiciary if we are out of the kingdom, and making known to us the excess committed, require that we cause that excess to be redressed without delay; and if we shall not have redressed the excess, or if we have been out of the kingdom, our justiciary, shall not have redressed it, within the term of forty days, computing from the time in which it shall have been made known to us, or to our justiciary if we have been out of the kingdom, the said four barons shall lay that cause before the residue of the twenty-five barons; and these twenty-five barons, with the community of the whole land, shall distress and harass us by all the ways in which they can, that is, by the taking of our castles, lands, and possessions, and by other means in their power, till the excess shall have been redressed, according to their verdict; saving our person, and the persons of our queen and children; and when it has been redressed, they shall behave to us as they had done before: and any person of our land may swear, that he will obey the commands of the twenty-five barons, in accomplishing all the things aforesaid, and that with them he will harass us to the utmost of his power: and we publicly and freely give leave to every one to swear, who is willing to swear; and we will never forbid any man to swear. But all those of our land, who, of themselves, and their own accord, are unwilling to swear to the twenty-five barons, to distress and harass us together with them, shall be compelled by our command, to swear as aforesaid. And if any one of the twenty-five barons shall die, or remove out of the land, or in any other way shall be prevented from executing the things above stated, those who remain of the twenty-five barons shall elect another in his place, according to their pleasure, who shall be sworn in the same manner as the rest. But in all those things which are appointed to be done by these twenty-five barons, if it happen that all the twenty-five have been present and have differed in their opinions about any thing, or if some of them who had been summoned, would not, or could not be present, that which the major part of those who were present shall have provided and decreed, shall be deemed as firm and valid as if all the twenty-five had agreed in it. And the aforesaid twenty-five shall swear, that they will faithfully observe, and, to the utmost of their power, cause to be observed, all the things mentioned above. And we will obtain nothing from any one, by ourselves, or by another, by which any of these concessions or liberties may be revoked or diminished. And if any such thing be obtained, let it be void and null; and we will never use it, either by ourselves or by another.

62. And we have fully remitted and pardoned to all men, all the ill-will, virulence, and resentments which have arisen between us and our subjects, both clergy and laity, from the commencement of the discord. Besides, we have fully remitted to all the clergy and laity, and, as far as belongs to us, we have fully pardoned all transgressions committed on occasion of the said discord, from Easter, in the sixteenth year of our reign, to the conclusion of the peace. And we have also granted them testimonial letters-patent of Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, Henry, archbishop of Doublin, and of the bishops above-mentioned, and of Pandulf, concerning the security, and the aforesaid concessions.

63. Wherefore, our will is, and we firmly command, that the church of England be free, and that the men in our kingdom have and hold all the aforesaid liberties, rights, and concessions, well and in peace, freely and quietly, fully and entirely, to them and their heirs, of us and our heirs, in all things and places for ever, as aforesaid. An oath hath been taken, as well on our part, as on the part of the barons, that all these things above enumerated shall be observed in good faith, and without any evil intention, before the above-named witnesses, and many others.

Given under our hand, in the meadow, which is called Runingmede, between Windsor and Staines, this fifteenth day of June, in the seventeenth year of our reign.

CHAP. IV.

HENRY III.

AT the time of John's decease the earl of Pembroke was mareschal of England, was by his office at the head of the armies, and consequently, during a state of civil wars and convulsions, at the head of the government. This nobleman, who had maintained his loyalty unshaken to John during the lowest fortune of that monarch, determined to support the authority of the infant prince; nor was he dismayed at the number and violence of his enemies. Sensible that Henry, agreeably to the prejudices of the times, would not be deemed a sovereign, till crowned and anointed by a churchman, he carried the young prince to Gloucester, where the ceremony of coronation was performed, on the 28th of October, 1216, in the presence of Gualo the legate, and a few noblemen, by the bishops of Winchester and Bath. Young Henry was obliged to swear fealty to the pope, and renew that homage to which his father had subjected the kingdom: and in order to enlarge the authority of Pembroke, and to give him a more regular and legal title to it, a general council of the barons was soon after summoned at Bristol, on the 11th of November, where that nobleman was chosen protector of the realm.

Pembroke, that he might reconcile all men to the government of his pupil, made him grant a new charter of liberties, which, though mostly copied from the former concessions extorted from John, contains some alterations, which may be deemed remarkable. The full privilege of elections in the clergy, granted by the late king, was not confirmed, nor the liberty of going out of the kingdom without the royal consent: whence it appears, that Pembroke and the barons were both desirous of renewing the king's claim to issue a congé d'elire to the monks and chapters, and thought it requisite to put some check to the frequent appeals to Rome. The obligation, however, to which John had subjected himself, of obtaining the consent of the great council before he levied any aids or scutages upon the nation, was omitted; and this article was even declared hard and severe, and was left to future deliberation. We accordingly find that Henry, in the course of his reign, while he gave frequent occasions for complaint, with regard to his violations of the Great Charter, never attempted by his mere will, to levy any aids or scutages; though he was often reduced to great necessities, and was refused supply by his people. The charter was again confirmed by the king in 1217, with the addition of some articles to prevent oppressions by sheriffs: and also with an additional charter of forests, by which all the forests, which had been inclosed since the reign of Henry II. were disaforested; and new perambulations were appointed for that purpose: offences in the forests were declared to be no longer capital; but punishable by fine, imprisonment, and more gentle penalties; and all the proprietors of land recovered the power of cutting and using their own wood.

These famous charters were thus brought nearly to the shape in which they have since stood; and were, during many generations, the peculiar favourites of the English nation, and esteemed the rampart to national liberty and independence. As they secured the rights of all orders of men, they were anxiously defended by all, and became the basis, in a manner, of the English monarchy, and a kind of original contract, which both limited the authority of the king, and ensured the conditional allegiance of his subjects. Though often violated, they were still claimed by the nobility and people; and as no precedents were supposed valid that infringed them, they rather acquired than lost authority, from the frequent attempts made against them in several ages, by the arbitrary power of the monarchs.

While Pembroke, by renewing and confirming the Great Charter, gave so much satisfaction and security to the nation in general, he also applied himself successfully to individuals: he wrote letters, in the king's name, to all the malcontent barons; in which he represented to them, that, whatever jealousy and animosity they might have entertained against the late king, a young prince, the lineal heir of their ancient monarchs, had now succeeded to the throne, without succeeding either to the resentments or principles of his predecessor: that the desperate expedient, which they had employed, of calling in a foreign potentate, had, happily for them, as well as for the nation, failed failed of success; and it was still in their power, by a speedy return to their duty, to restore the independence of the kingdom, and to secure that liberty, for which they so zealously contended: that, as all past offences of the barons were now buried in oblivion, they ought, on their part, to forget their complaints against their late sovereign, who had left to his son the salutary warning, to avoid the paths which had led to such fatal extremities: and that having now obtained a charter for their liberties, it was their interest to shew, by their conduct, that this acquisition was not incompatible with their allegiance, and that the rights of king and people, so far from being hostile and opposite, might mutually support and sustain each other.

These considerations had a mighty influence on the barons; and most of them began to negociate with him, and many of them returned to their duty. The diffidence which Louis discovered of their fidelity, forwarded this general propension towards the king; and when the French prince refused the government of the castle of Hertford to Robert Fitz-Walter, who had been so active against the late king, and who claimed that fortress as his property, they perceived that the English were excluded from every trust, and that foreigners had engrossed the confidence and affection of their new sovereign. The excommunication too, denounced by the legate against all the adherents of Louis, failed not to produce a mighty effect upon them; and they were easily persuaded to consider a cause as impious, for which they had already entertained an unsurmountable aversion. Though Louis made a journey to France, and brought over succours from that kingdom, he found, on his return, that his party was still more weakened by the desertion of his English confederates, and that the death of John had, contrary to his expectations, given an incurable wound to his cause. The earls of Salisbury, Arundel, and Warrenne, together with William Mareschal, eldest son of the protector, had embraced Henry's party; and every English nobleman was looking for an opportunity of returning to his allegiance. Pembroke was so much strengthened by these accessions, that he ventured to invest Mountsorel; though upon the approach of the count of Perche with the French army, he desisted from his enterprize, and raised the siege. The count, elated with this success, marched to Lincoln; and being admitted into the town, began to attack the castle, which he reduced to extremity. The protector summoned all his forces from every quarter, to relieve a place of such importance; and appeared so much superior to the French, that they shut themselves up within the city, and resolved to act upon the defensive. But the garrison of the castle, having received a strong reinforcement, made a vigorous sally upon the besiegers; while the English army, by concert, assaulted them in the same instant from without, mounted the walls by scalade, and bearing down all resistance, entered the city sword in hand. Lincoln was delivered over to be pillaged; the French army was totally routed; the count of Perche, with only two persons more, was killed; but many of the chief commanders, and about four hundred knights, were made prisoners by the English.

Prince Louis was informed of this fatal event while employed in the siege of Dover, which was still valiantly defended by Hubert de Burgh. He immediately retreated to London, the centre of his party; and there received intelligence of a new disaster, which put an end to all his hopes. A French fleet, bringing over a strong reinforcement, had appeared on the coast of Kent, where they were attacked by the English, under the command of Philip d'Albiney, and were routed with considerable loss (c).

After this misfortune of the French, the English barons hastened to make peace with the protector, and, to prevent those attainders to which they were exposed on account of their rebellion. Louis, whose cause was now desperate, became anxious for the safety of his person, and was glad to make his escape from a country where every thing was become hostile to him. He concluded a peace with Pembroke, promised to evacuate the kingdom, and only stipulated, in return, an indemnity to his adherents, and a restitution of their honours and fortunes, together with the free and equal enjoyment of those liberties which had been granted to the rest of the nation. Thus was happily ended a civil war, which seemed to be founded on the most incurable hatred and jealousy, and had threatened the kingdom with the most fatal consequences (d).

The prudence and equity of the protector's conduct after the French were expelled, contributed to cure those wounds which intestine discord had occasioned. He received the rebellious barons into favour; observed strictly the terms of peace; restored them to their possessions; and endeavoured to bury all past animosities in oblivion. The clergy alone, who had adhered to Louis, were sufferers in this revolution. As they had rebelled against their spiritual sovereign, by disregarding the interdict and excommunication, it was not in Pembroke's power to make any stipulations in their favour; and Gualo the legate prepared to take vengeance on them for their disobedience. Many of them were deposed; many suspended; some banished, and all who escaped punishment made atonement for their offence by large pecuniary sacrifices to the legate, who amassed an immense treasure by this expedient.

The earl of Pembroke did not long survive the pacification, which had been chiefly owing to his wisdom and valour; he died in May, 1219, and he was succeeded in the government by Peter des Roches, bishop of Winchester, and Hubert de Burgh, the justiciary. The councils of the latter were chiefly followed; and had he possessed equal authority in the kingdom with Pembroke, he seemed to be every way worthy of filling the place of that virtuous nobleman. But the barons, who had once broken the reins of subjection to their prince, and had obtained by violence an enlargement of their liberties and independence, could ill be restrained by laws under a minority; and the people, no less than the king, suffered from their outrages and disorders. They retained by force the royal castles, which they had seized during the past convulsions, or which had been committed to their custody by the protector. They usurped the king's demesnes: they oppressed their vassals: they infested their weaker neighbours: they invited disorderly people to enter in their retinue, and to live upon their lands: and they gave them protection in all their robberies and extortions. No one was more infamous for these practices than the earl of Albemarle; who, though he had early returned to his duty, and had been serviceable in expelling the French, augmented the general disorder, and committed outrages in all the counties of the North. In order to reduce him to obedience, Hubert seized an opportunity of getting possession of Rockingham castle, which Albemarle had garrisoned with his licentious retinue; but this nobleman, instead of submitting, entered into a secret conference with Fawkes de Breauté, Peter de Mauleon, and other barons, and both fortified the castle of Biham for his defence, and made himself master, by surprize, of that of Fotheringay. Pandulf, who was restored to his legateship, was active in suppressing this rebellion; and with the concurrence of eleven bishops, he pronounced the sentence of excommunication against Albemarle and his adherents: an army was levied: a scutage of ten shillings, a knight's fee, was imposed on all the military tenants; Albemarle's associates gradually deserted him: and he himself was obliged at last to sue for mercy. He rereived a pardon, and was restored to his estate. This lenity encouraged Fawkes de Breauté, a man whom king John had raised from a low origin, to persevere in the course of violence to which he had owed his fortune, and to set at nought all law and justice. When thirty-five verdicts were at one time found against him, on account of his violently expelling so many freeholders from their possessions; he came to the court of justice with an armed force, seized the judge who had pronounced the verdicts, and imprisoned him in Bedford castle. He then levied open war against (c) D'Albiney employed a stratagem against them, which is said to have contributed to the victory: having gained the wind of the French, he came down upon them with violence; and throwing in their faces a great quantity of quick lime, which he purposely carried on board, he so blinded them, that they were disabled from defending themselves.

(d) The precautions which the king of France used in the conduct of this whole affair are remarkable. He pretended that his son had accepted of the offer from the English barons without his advice, and contrary to his inclination: the armies sent to England were levied in Louis's name: when that prince came over to France for aid, his father publicly refused to grant him any assistance, and would not so much as admit him to his presence: even after Henry's party acquired the ascendant, and Louis was in danger of falling into the hands of his enemies, it was Blanche of Castile his wife, not the king his father, who raised armies and equipped fleets for his succour. All these artifices were employed, not to satisfy the pope; for he had too much penetration to be so easily imposed on: nor yet to deceive the people; for they were too gross even for that purpose: they only served for a colouring to Philip's cause; and in public affairs, men are often better pleased that the truth, though known to every body, should be wrapped up under a decent cover, than if it were exposed in open daylight to the eyes of all the world.

against the king; but being subdued and taken prisoner, his life was granted him; but his estate was confiscated, and he was banished from the realm.

In 1222, a frivolous emulation in a wrestling-match, between the Londoners on the one hand, and the inhabitants of Westminster and those of the neighbouring villages on the other, occasioned a commotion. The former rose in a body, and pulled down some houses belonging to the abbot of Westminster; but this riot which, considering the tumultuous disposition of that capital, would have been little regarded, seemed to become more serious by the symptoms which then appeared, of the attachment of the citizens to the French interest. The populace made use of the cry of war commonly employed by the French troops; "Mountjoy, Mountjoy, God help us and our lord Louis. The justiciary made enquiry into the disorder; and finding one Constantine Fitz-Arnulf to have been the ringleader, an insolent man, who justified his crime in Hubert's presence, he proceeded against him by martial law, and ordered him immediately to be hanged, without trial or form of process. He also cut off the feet of some of Constantine's accomplices. This act of power was complained of as an infringement of the Great Charter: yet the justiciary, in a parliament summoned at Oxford, made no scruple to grant in the king's name a renewal and confirmation of that charter. When the assembly made application to the crown for this favour, as a law in those times seemed to lose its validity if not frequently renewed, William de Briewere, one of the council of regency, openly declared that those liberties were extorted by force, and ought not to be observed: but he was reprimanded by the archbishop of Canterbury, and was not countenanced by the king or his chief ministers. A new confirmation was demanded and granted two years after; and an aid, amounting to a fifteenth of all movables, was given by the parliament, in return for this indulgence. The king issued writs anew to the sheriffs, enjoining the observance of the charter; but he inserted a remarkable clause in the writs; that those who payed not the fifteenth should not for the future be entitled to the benefit of those liberties.

The reduced state into which the crown was fallen made it requisite for a good minister to be attentive to the preservation of the royal prerogatives, as well as to the security of public liberty. Hubert applied to the pope, now considered as superior lord of the kingdom, and desired him to issue a bull, declaring the king to be of full age, and entitled to exercise in person all the acts of royalty. In consequence of this declaration, the justiciary resigned into Henry's hands the two important fortresses of the Tower and Dover castle, which had been entrusted to his custody; and he required the other barons to imitate his example; but they refused to comply with his request: the earls of Chester and Albemarle, John, Constable of Chester, John de Lacy, Brian de l'Isle, and William de Cantel, with some others, even formed a conspiracy to surprize London, and met in arms at Waltham with that intention; but finding the king prepared for defence, they desisted from their enterprize. When summoned to court, to answer for their conduct, they appeared and confessed the design: they told the king, that they had no bad intentions against his person, but only against Hubert de Burgh, whom they were determined to remove from his office. They appeared too formidable to be chastized; the failure of their first enterprize did not discourage them, and they again met in arms at Leicester, in order to seize the king, who then resided at Northampton: but Henry, informed of their purpose, was so well armed and attended, that the barons desisted from making the attempt; and they sat down and kept Christmas in his neighbourhood.

From the present appearance of affairs, the archbishop and the prelates, perceiving every thing tend towards a civil war, interposed with their authority, and threatened the barons with excommunication, if they persisted in detaining the king's castles. This well-timed menace at last prevailed: most of the fortresses were surrendered; though the barons complained, that Hubert's castles were soon after restored to him by the king, while he still kept theirs in his own custody. There are said to have been one thousand one hundred and fifteen castles at that time in England.

It must be acknowledged, that the influence of the prelates and the clergy was often of great service to the public. Though the religion of that age can merit no better name than that of superstition, it served to unite together a body of men who had great sway over the people, and who kept the community from falling to pieces, by the factions and independent power of the nobles. And what was of great importance, it threw a mighty authority into the hands of men, who, by their profession, were averse to arms and violence; who tempered by their mediation the general disposition towards military enterprizes; and who still maintained, even amidst the shock of arms, those secret links, without which it is impossible for human society to subsist.

Notwithstanding these intestine commotions in England, and the precarious authority of the crown, Henry was obliged to carry on war in France; and he employed to that purpose the fifteenth which had been granted him by parliament. Louis VIII. surnamed the Lion, who had succeeded to his father Philip, instead of complying with Henry's claim, who demanded the restitution of Normandy, and the other provinces wrested from England by Philip, made an irruption into Poictou, took the towns of Niort and St. Jean d'Andely; and continuing his march to Guienne, reduced all the places that lay in his way, and received the homage of the inhabitants. He next directed his course to Rochelle, which he took after a long siege, and seemed determined to expel the English from the few provinces which still remained to them. On receiving intelligence of these losses, Henry sent over his uncle, the earl of Salisbury, together with his brother prince Richard, to whom he had granted the earldom of Cornwall, which had escheated to the crown, with a considerable army. Salisbury stopped the progress of Louis's arms, and retained the Poictevin and Gascon vassals in their allegiance; but no military action of any moment was performed on either side. The earl of Cornwall, after two years' stay in Guienne, returned to England, having concluded a truce with the king of France in 1227; by which means the nation was restored to a state of tranquillity both at home and abroad.

Prince Richard was no wise turbulent or factious in his disposition: his ruling passion was to amass money, in which he succeeded so well as to become the richest subject in Christendom: yet his attention to gain threw him sometimes into acts of violence, and gave disturbance even to the government. There was a manor, which had formerly belonged to the earldom of Cornwall, but had been granted to Waleran de Ties, before Richard had been invested with that dignity, and while the earldom remained in the possession of the crown. Richard claimed this manor, and expelled the proprietor by force: Waleran complained to the king, who immediately ordered his brother to do justice to the man, and restore him to his rights; but the earl said that he would not submit to these orders, till the cause should be decided against him by the judgement of his peers: Henry replied, that it was first necessary to reinstate Waleran in possession, before the cause could be tried; and he reiterated his orders to the earl. We may judge of the state of the government, when this affair had nearly produced a civil war. The earl of Cornwall, finding Henry peremptory in his commands, associated himself with the young earl of Pembroke, who had married his sister, and who had conceived a disgust against the king on account of his requiring him to deliver up some royal castles which were in his custody. These two malcontents took into the confederacy the earls of Chester, Warrenne, Gloucester, Hereford, Warwick, and Ferrars, who were all displeased on a like account. They assembled a numerous army, which the king had not the power or courage to resist; and he was obliged to give his brother satisfaction, by grants of much greater importance than the manor, which had been the first ground of dispute.

The character of the king, as he grew to man's estate, became every day better known; and he was found in every respect unqualified for maintaining a proper sway among those turbulent barons, whom the feudal constitution subjected to his authority. Gentle, humane, and merciful, he seems to have been steady in no other circumstance of his character; but to have received every impression from those who surroundsd him, and whom he loved for the time, with the most unreserved affection. Without activity or vigour, he was unfit to conduct war; without policy or art, he was ill fitted to maintain peace: his resentments, though hasty and violent, were not dreaded, while he was found to drop them with such facility; his friendships were little valued, because they were neither derived from choice, nor maintained with constancy. A proper pageant of state in a regular monarchy, where his ministers could have conducted all affairs in his name and by his authority; but too feeble in those disorderly times to sway a sceptre, whose weight depended entirely on the firmness and dexterity of the hand which held it.

Louis VIII. king of France, had died in 1226, after a short reign of three years and four months; and the regency having been entrusted to the care of Blanche of Castile during the infancy of his son and successor, Saint Louis, that kingdom had become a scene of confusion, and presented to the English monarch the fairest prospect of recovering those continental dominions which had been wrested from his father. Henry even received a pressing invitation from the Normans; who promised, if he would land in their province with an army sufficient to effect their liberation from the French yoke, that they would assist him to the utmost of their power. He suffered, however, this favourable opportunity to escape: though when the political hemisphere of France had recovered its serenity, and the authority of Blanche was established on a solid foundation, he imprudently resolved on the adoption of those vigorous measures from whence he could not hope to derive the smallest advantage. In consequence of this resolution, the king summoned all his military tenants, both of England and Ireland, to meet him at Portsmouth on Michaelmas-day, 1229, in order to attend him to the continent: but when, in obedience to his summons, a numerous and gallant army appeared at the appointed time ready for embarkation, it was found that the number of ships prepared to receive them were greatly inadequate to the purpose.

The expedition being thus postponed, Henry made a progress into the North; and passed the festival of Christmas at York, where he received a visit from Alexander, king of Scotland. He then assembled the parliament, and obtained a scutage for defraying the expences of another armament. The general rendezvous was appointed at Reading, for the beginning of April 1230; from whence he marched to Portsmouth, and on the last day of the month embarked for France, and arrived safe at St. Malo; where he was received by the duke of Bretagne, who surrendered several places of strength into his hands; and a great number of the nobility did homage to him as their sovereign.

The young king of France had already taken Angiers, in the vicinity of which his army was posted to observe the motions of the English, and oppose their irruptions into Poictou; but seeing that Henry remained at Nantes in a state of inactivity, he advanced towards Amiens, which he invested and took, together with several places in the neighbourhood of Henry's quarters, without having experienced the smallest interruption from that prince; who devoted his whole time to festivity and pleasure.

Notwithstanding the prudent and wise administration of the queen-regent, the discontented nobles of France, in the hope of being sustained by Henry, embraced the opportunity afforded them by the absence of their monarch, to excite fresh commotions, which compelled Louis to retire from Anjou, in order to reduce them to obedience; and had Henry possessed skill and spirit sufficient to avail himself of this favourable juncture, there is little doubt that he would have been able to recover the dominions he was anxious to possess. The French forces were all employed in another quarter; and the Normans continued their solicitations to him to take possession of their country; but, instead of complying with their request, he marched into Poictou, and made himself master of Mirebeau; then repaired to Guienne to receive the homage of the Gascon barons; and, lastly, returned to Bretagne, where he relapsed into his former indolence, and suffered Louis to complete the pacification of his kingdom. So impolitic and absurd was the conduct of Henry on this occasion, that the French barons unanimously consented to accept the terms offered them by their sovereign. The French king shortly after marched to oppose the king of England, and Henry departed for his native dominions, where he arrived about the end of October, loaded with disgrace. But the earls of Chester, Albemarle, and Pembroke, who commanded the troops that were left behind, made incursions into Anjou, took and dismantled several fortresses, and ravaged the frontiers of Normandy.

The ablest and most virtuous minister that Henry ever possessed, was Hubert de Burgh; a man who had been steady to the crown in the most difficult and dangerous times, and who yet shewed no disposition, in the height of his power, to enslave or oppress the people. The only exceptionable part of his conduct is that which is mentioned by Matthew Paris; if the fact be really true, and proceeded from Hubert's advice, namely, the recalling publicly and the annulling of the charter of forests, a concession so reasonable in itself, and so passionately claimed both by the nobility and people: but it must be confessed that this measure is so unlikely, both from the circumstances of the times and character of the minister, that there is reason to doubt of its reality, especially as it is mentioned by no other historian. Hubert, while he enjoyed his authority, had an entire ascendant over Henry, and was loaded with honours and favours beyond any other subject. Besides acquiring the property of many castles and manors, he married the eldest sister of the king of Scots, was created earl of Kent, and, by an unusual concession, was made chief justiciary of England for life: yet Henry, in a sudden caprice, in June, 1232, threw off this faithful minister, and exposed him to the violent persecutions of his enemies. Among other frivolous crimes objected to him, he was accused of gaining the king's affections by enchantment, and of purloining from the royal treasury a gem, which had the virtue to render the wearer invulnerable, and of sending this valuable curiosity to the prince of Wales. The nobility, who hated Hubert on account of his zeal in resuming the rights and possessions of the crown, no sooner saw the opportunity favourable, than they inflamed the king's animosity against him, and pushed him to seek the total ruin of his minister. Hubert took sanctuary in a church: the king ordered him to be dragged from his asylum: he recalled those orders: he afterwards renewed them: he was obliged by the clergy to restore him to the sanctuary: he constrained him soon after to surrender himself prisoner, and he confined him in the castle of the Devizes. Hubert made his escape, was expelled the kingdom, was again received into favour, recovered a great share of the king's confidence, but never showed any inclination to reinstate himself in power and authority.

This virtuous minister was succeeded in the government of the king and kingdom, by Peter, bishop of Winchester, a Poictevin by birth, who had been raised by the late king, and who was no less distinguished by his arbitrary principles and violent conduct, than by his courage and abilities. This prelate had been left by king John justiciary and regent of the kingdom during an expedition which that prince made into France; and his illegal administration was the principal cause of that combination among the barons, which finally extorted from the crown the charter of liberties, and laid the foundations of the English constitution. Henry had imbibed the same arbitrary principles as his father, though he was incapable, from his character, of pursuing the same violent maxims; and in pursuance of Peter's advice, he invited a great number of Poictevins, and other foreigners, to this country, apprehending they could be more safely trusted than the English, and who seemed useful to counterbalance the great and independent power of the nobility. Every office and command was bestowed on these strangers; they exhausted the revenues of the crown, which were already too much impoverished; they invaded the rights of the people; and their insolence, still more provoking than their power, drew on them the hatred and disgust of all orders of men.

The earl of Pembroke was the first who ventured openly to declare his sentiments on this unjust and impolitic attachment to strangers. He told the king that his partiality to foreigners alienated the affections of his native subjects, and produced such discontent as would certainly be attended with fatal consequences. To this remonstrance, the bishop of Winchester, who was present, replied, that the earl's insolence deserved chastisement, for pretending to deprive his sovereign of the liberty to employ those whom he judged most proper for his service; and that, if the foreigners already in the kingdom were insufficient to reduce his rebellious subjects to obedience, a greater number should be brought over for that purpose. A declaration so replete with arrogance could not fail to irritate the English nobles; who forthwith retired from court, and began to form associations for their mutual defence. A parliament being summoned by the king to meet at Oxford, on the 24th of June, 1233, the barons unanimously refused to attend, on pretence of the danger to which they were exposed from the machinations of the Poictevins. A second citation to meet at Westminster, on the 11th of July, was treated with equal neglect; nay, so deeply rooted was their resentment, that they sent a deputation to the king, to desire that he would immediately dismiss the bishop of Winchester and his foreigners, otherwise they should be reduced to the necessity of deposing him, and filling the vacant throne with some prince more worthy to enjoy it. This bold and daring language greatly terrified Henry, and made no small impression on the minister, who now perceived that his only hopes of safety must proceed from the probability of sowing the seeds of dissension among the barons. This politic scheme he accordingly adopted, and it was attended with such success, that he speedily detached from the confederacy the earls of Cornwall, Chester, and Lincoln; and their example was followed by so many of their adherents, that the earl of Pembroke was nearly deserted by his whole party, and left to sustain the undivided weight of the royal indignation. After defending himself for some time with great bravery, sensible of the impossibility of supporting so unequal a contest, that gallant nobleman at length withdrew to Ireland, where he was treacherously murdered by the contrivance of the bishop of Winchester. Many other barons were punished by the confiscation of their estates, without legal sentence or trial by their peers, in direct violation of one of the principal articles of Magna Charta. Peter bestowed the possessions so forfeited on his Poictevin countrymen; and his insolence had acquired such force from success, that he publicly declared, that the barons of England had no pretensions to enjoy the same liberties as the nobles of France; the monarchs of the former country being endued with a more absolute power than the latter.

We are told by Matthew Paris, that when at any time the king was checked in his illegal practices, and reminded of the stipulations of the Great Charter, he was wont to reply, "Why should I observe this charter, which is neglected by all my grandees, both prelates and nobility?" It was reasonably said to him: "It is your duty, Sir, to set them the example (e)."

The violent ministry of the bishop of Winchester was not of long duration; and its fall proceeded from the influence of the church, not from the efforts of the nobles. Edmund, archbishop of Canterbury, came to court, attended by many other prelates, and represented to the king the pernicious measures embraced by Peter des Roches, the discontents of his people, the ruin of his affairs; and after requiring the dismission of the minister and his associates, threatened him with excommunication in case of his refusal. Henry, who knew that an excommunication, so agreeable to the sense of the people, would produce the most dangerous effects, was obliged to submit: foreigners were banished: the natives were restored to their place in council: the primate, who was a man of prudence, and who took care to execute the laws, and observe the charter of liberties, bore the chief sway in the government.

The English now flattered themselves that they should be long free from the dominion of foreigners; but their hopes were fallacious. The king, having married Eleanor, daughter of Raymond Berenger, count of Provence, on the 24th of January, 1236, was surrounded by a great number of strangers from that country, whom he greatly caressed, and enriched by an imprudent generosity. William, bishop of Valence, a prelate of the house of Savoy, and maternal uncle to the queen, was appointed prime minister, and employed every art to amass wealth for himself and his relations. Peter of Savoy, a brother of the same family, was created earl of Richmond, and received the rich wardship of earl Warrenne: Boniface of Savoy was promoted to the see of Canterbury: many young ladies were invited over from Provence, and married to the chief noblemen in England, who were the king's wards: and as the source of Henry's bounty began to fail, his Savoyard ministry applied to the sovereign pontiff, and obtained a bull; permitting him to resume all past grants; absolving him from the oath he had taken to maintain them; even enjoining him to make such a resumption, and representing those grants as invalid, on account of their being prejudicial to the interests of the pope, in whom the superiority of the kingdom was vested. The opposition however, made to the intended resumption prevented it from taking place; but the nation saw the indignities to which the king was willing to submit, in order to gratify the avidity of his foreign favourites. About the same time, he published in England the sentence of excommunication pronounced against the emperor Frederic, his brother-in-law; and alleged, as an excuse, that, being the pope's vassal, he was obliged by his oath of allegiance to obey all the commands of his holiness. Thus was this weak monarch induced to trifle with religious obligations, and taught to consider an oath as sacred only when the observance of it accorded with his own private interest.

The resentment of the English barons rose high, at the preference given to foreigners; but no remonstrance could prevail on the king to abandon, or even to moderate his attachment towards them. After the Provençals and Savoyards might have been supposed pretty well satiated with the dignities and riches which they had acquired, a new set of hungry foreigners were invited over, in 1247, and shared among them those favours, which the king ought in policy to have conferred on the English nobility, by whom his government could have been supported and defended. His mother, Isabella, who had been unjustly taken by the late king from the count de la Marche, to whom she was betrothed, was no sooner mistress of herself by the death of her husband, than she married that nobleman; and she had borne him four sons, Guy, William, Geoffrey, and Aymer, whom she sent over to England, in order to pay a visit to their brother. Henry was moved at the sight of such near relations; and he considered neither his own circumstances, nor the inclinations of his people, in the honours and riches which he conferred upon them. Complaints rose as high against the credit of the Gascon, as ever they had done against that of the Poictevin and of the Savoyard favourites. Violations of the Great Charter were frequently mentioned; and it is indeed more than probable, that foreigners, ignorant of the laws, and relying on the affections of a weak prince, would, in an age when a regular administration was not any where known, pay more attention to their present interest than to the liberties of the people. It is reported, that the Poictevins and other strangers, when the laws were at any time appealed to, in opposition to their oppressions, scrupled not to reply, "What did the English laws signify to them? They minded them not." This open contempt of the English tended to aggravate the general discontent, and made every act of violence committed by the foreigners appear not only an injury, but an affront.

We reckon not among the violations of the Great Charter some arbitrary exertions of prerogative to which Henry's necessities urged him, and which, without producing any discontent, were uniformly continued by all his successors, till the last century. As the parliament often refused him supplies, and that in a manner somewhat rude and indecent, he obliged his opulent subjects, particularly the citizens of London, to grant him loans of money: and it is natural to imagine, that the same want of œconomy which reduced him to the necessity of borrowing, would prevent him from being punctual in the repayment. He demanded benevolences, or pretended voluntary contributions, from his nobility and prelates. He was the first king of England since the conquest, that could fairly be said to lie under the restraint of law; and he was also the first that practised the dispensing power, and employed the clause of non obstante in his grants and patents. When objections were made to this innovation, he replied, that the pope exercised that authority; and why might not he imitate the example? But the abuse which the pope made of his dispensing power, in violating the canons of general councils, in invading the privileges and customs of all particular churches, and in usurping on the rights of patrons, was more likely to excite the jealousy of the people, than to reconcile them to a similar practice in their civil government. Roger de Thurkesby, one of the king's justices, was so sensible of the pernicious tendency of such a precedent, that he exclaimed, "Alas! what times are we fallen into? Behold, the civil court is corrupted in imitation of the ecclesiastical, and the river is poisoned from that fountain.

The partiality and profuse bounty of the king to his foreign relations, and their friends and favourites, would have appeared more tolerable to the English, had any thing been done for the honour of the nation; or had Henry's enterprizes in foreign countries been attended with any success or glory to himself or to the public: at least, such military talents in the king would have served to keep his barons in awe, and have given weight and authority to his government. But though he declared war against Louis IX. in 1242, and made an expedition into Guienne, upon the invitation of his father-in-law, the count de la Marche, who promised to join him with all his forces: he was unsuccessful in his attempts against that great monarch, was worsted at Taillebourg, was deserted by his allies, lost what (e) This anecdote sufficiently demonstrates, that the barons in their eagerness to obtain Magna Charta, were not actuated by the most laudable motives, since the whole tenour of their conduct evinced a determination to render it subservient to their own interested views and ambitious projects.

remained to him of Poictou, and was obliged to return, with loss of honour, into England. The Gascon nobility were attached to the English government; because the distance of their sovereign allowed them to remain in a state of almost total independence: and they claimed, in 1253, Henry's protection against an invasion which the king of Castile made upon that territory. Henry returned to Guienne, and was more successful in this expedition; but he thereby involved himself and his nobility in an enormous debt, which both increased their discontents, and exposed him to greater danger from the enterprizes of his factious barons.

Henry's debts, before this expedition, had become so troublesome, that he sold all his plate and jewels, in order to discharge a part of them. When this idea was first suggested to him, he asked where he should find purchasers? It was replied, the citizens of London. "On my word," said he, "if the treasury of Augustus were brought to sale, the citizens are able to be the purchasers: These clowns, who assume to themselves the name of barons, abound in every thing, while we are reduced to necessities." And he was thenceforth observed to be more rigorous and greedy in his exactions upon the citizens.

But the grievances which the English during this reign had reason to complain of in the civil government, seem to have been trifling in comparison with those which they suffered from the usurpations and exactions of the court of Rome. On the death of Langton, in July, 1228, the monks of Christ Church, Canterbury, elected Walter de Hemesham, one of their own body, for his successor: but as Henry refused to confirm the election, the pope, at his desire, annulled it (f); and immediately appointed Richard Le Grand, chancellor of Lincoln, for archbishop, without waiting for a new election. On the death of Richard, in August, 1231, the monks elected Ralph de Neville, bishop of Chichester; and though Henry was much pleased with the election, the pope, who thought that prelate too much attached to the crown, assumed the power of annulling his election. He rejected two clergymen more, whom the monks had successively chosen; and told them, that, if they would elect Edmund Rich, treasurer of the church of Salisbury, he would confirm their choice; and his nomination was complied with. The pope had the prudence to appoint both times very worthy primates; but men could not forbear observing his intention of thus drawing gradually to himself the right of appointing to the first ecclesiastical dignity in the kingdom.

But the avarice, more than the ambition, of the see of Rome, seems to have been in this age the ground of general complaint. The papal ministers, finding a vast stock of power amassed by their predecessors, were desirous of turning it to immediate profit, which they enjoyed at home, rather than of enlarging their authority in distant countries. Every thing was become venal in the Romish tribunals; simony was openly practised; neither favour nor justice could be obtained without a bribe; the highest bidder was sure to be the purchaser, without regard either to the merits of the person or of the cause; and besides the usual perversions of right in the decision of controversies, the pope assumed an absolute authority of setting aside, by the plenitude of his apostolic power, all particular rules, and all privileges of patrons, churches, and convents. On pretence of remedying these abuses, pope Honorius, in 1226, complaining of the poverty of his see as the source of all grievances, demanded from every cathedral two of the best prebends, and from every convent two monks portions, to be set apart as a perpetual and settled revenue of the papal crown: but all men being sensible that the revenue would continue for ever, his demand was rejected. About three years after, the pope demanded and obtained the tenth of all ecclesiastical revenues, which he levied in a very oppressive manner; requiring payment before the clergy had drawn their rent or tithes, and sending about Italian usurers, who advanced them the money at exorbitant interest. In 1240, cardinal Otho, the legate, having in vain attempted the clergy in a body, obtained separately, by intrigues and menaces, large sums from the prelates and convents, and on his departure is said to have carried more money out of the kingdom than he left in it. This experiment was renewed four years after with success by Martin the nuncio, who brought from Rome powers of suspending and excommunicating all clergymen that refused to comply with his exorbitant demands. The king, who relied on the pope for the support of his tottering authority, never failed to countenance the exactions of the papal court.

All the chief benefices of the kingdom were in the mean time conferred on Italians; great numbers of that nation being sent over to be provided for; non-residence and pluralities were carried to an enormous height; Mansel, the king's chaplain, is computed to have held at once seven hundred ecclesiastical livings; and the abuses became so evident as to be palpable even to the blindness of superstition itself. The people, entering into associations, rose against the Italian clergy; pillaged their barns; wasted their lands; insulted the persons of such of them as they found in the kingdom; and when the justices made inquiry into the authors of this disorder, the guilt was found to involve so many, and those of such high rank, that it passed unpunished. At last, when Innocent IV. in 1245, called a general council at Lyons, to excommunicate the emperor Frederic, the king and nobility sent over agents to complain before the council of the rapacity of the Romish church. They represented, among many other grievances, that the benefices of the Italian clergy in England had been estimated, and were found to amount to sixty thousand marks (g) a year, a sum which exceeded the annual revenue of the crown itself (h). They obtained only an evasive answer from the pope; but as mention had been made before the council, of the feudal subjection of England to the see of Rome, the English agents, at whose head was Roger Bigod, earl of Norfolk, protested against the pretension, and insisted, that king John had no right, without the consent of his barons, to subject the kingdom to so ignominious a servitude. The popes indeed, afraid of carrying matters too far against England, seem thenceforth to have little insisted on that pretension.

But this check, received at the council of Lyons, was not able to stop the court of Rome in its rapacity: Innocent exacted the revenues of all vacant benefices, the twentieth of all ecclesiastical revenues without exception; the third of such as exceeded a hundred marks a year, and the half of such as were possessed by non-residents. He claimed the goods of all intestate clergymen; he pretended a title to inherit all money gotten by usury; he levied benevolences upon the people; and when the king, contrary to his usual practice, prohibited these exactions, he threatened to pronounce against him the same censures which he had emitted against the emperor Frederic.

The most oppressive expedient, however, employed by the pope, was the embarking of Henry, in 1255, in a project for the conquest of Naples, or Sicily on this side the Faro di Messina, as it was called; an enterprize which threw much dishonour on the king, and involved him in great trouble and expence for several years. The Romish church, taking advantage of favourable incidents, had reduced the kingdom of Sicily to the same state of feudal vassalage which she pretended to extend over England, and which, by reason of the distance, as well as high spirit of this latter kingdom, she was not able to maintain. After the death of the emperor Frederic II. the succession of Sicily devolved on Conradine, grandson of that monarch; and Mainfroy, his natural son, under pretence of governing the kingdom during the minority of the prince, had formed a scheme of establishing his own authority. Pope Innocent, who had carried on war against Frederic, and had endeavoured to dispossess him of his Italian dominions, still continued hostilities against his grandson; but being disappointed in his schemes by the activity of Mainfroy, he found that his own force alone was not sufficient to bring to a happy issue so great an enterprize. He pretended to dispose of the Sicilian crown, but as superior lord of that kingdom, and as vicar of Christ, to whom all the kingdoms of the earth were subjected; and he made a tender of it to Richard, earl of Cornwall, whose immense riches, he flattered himself, would be able to support the military operations against Mainfroy. As Richard had the prudence to refuse the present, he ap-

(f) It is said that the pope's compliance with Henry's request was in consequence of the liberal pecuniary offer which that monarch made to his holiness, viz. the tenth of all the movables, as well of the clergy as the laity in England.

(g) Innocent's bull in Rymer, vol. i. p. 471. says only fifty thousand marks a year.

(h) The customs were part of Henry's revenue, and amounted to six thousand pounds a-year. They were at first small sums paid by the merchants for the use of the king's warehouses, measures, weights, &c. See Gilbert's History of the Exchequer, p. 214.

plied

plied to the king, whose levity and thoughtless disposition gave Innocent more hopes of success; and he offered him the crown of Sicily for his second son Edmund. Henry, allured by so magnificent a present, without reflecting on the consequences, without consulting either with his brother or the parliament, accepted of the insidious proposal; and gave the pope unlimited credit to expend whatever sums he thought necessary for completing the conquest of Sicily. Innocent, who was engaged by his own interests to wage war with Mainfroy, was glad to carry on his enterprizes at the expence of his ally: Alexander IV. who succeeded him in the papal throne, continued the same policy; and Henry was surprized to find himself on a sudden involved in an immense debt, which he had never been consulted in contracting. The sum already amounted to one hundred and thirty-five thousand five hundred and forty-one marks, beside interest; and he had the prospect, if he answered this demand, of being soon loaded with more exorbitant expences; if he refused it, of both incurring the pope's displeasure, and losing the crown of Sicily, which he hoped soon to have the glory of fixing on the head of his son.

In this dilemma he applied to the parliament for supplies: and that he might not meet with opposition, he sent no writs to the more refractory barons: but even those who were summoned, sensible of the ridiculous cheat imposed by the pope, determined not to lavish their money on such chimerical projects; and making a pretext of the absence of their brethren, refused to take the king's demand into consideration. The king then had recourse to the clergy; and as both their temporal and spiritual sovereign concurred in loading them, they were ill able to defend themselves against this united authority. The pope published a crusade for the conquest of Sicily; and commanded every one who had taken the cross against the infidels, or had vowed to advance money for that service, to support the war against Mainfroy, a more terrible enemy, as he asserted, to the Christian faith than any Saracen. He levied a tenth on all ecclesiastical benefices in England for three years; and gave orders to excommunicate all bishops who made not punctual payment. He granted to the king the goods of intestate clergymen; the revenues of vacant benefices; the revenues of non-residents.

But these taxations, being levied by some rule, were deemed less grievous than another imposition, which arose from the suggestion of the bishop of Hereford, and which might have opened the door to endless and intolerable abuses. This prelate, who resided at the court of Rome by a deputation from the English church, drew bills of different values, but amounting on the whole to one hundred and fifty thousand five hundred and forty marks, on all the bishops and abbots of the kingdom; and granted these bills to Italian merchants, who it was pretended had advanced money for the service of the war against Mainfroy. As there was no likelihood of the English prelates submitting, without compulsion, to such a demand, Rustand, the legate, was charged to employ authority to collect it; and he summoned an assembly of the bishops and abbots, whom he acquainted with the pleasure of the pope and of the king. When the clergy were assembled, the bishop of Worcester exclaimed, that he would lose his life rather than comply: the bishop of London said, that the pope and king were more powerful than he; but if his mitre were taken off his head, he would put on a helmet in its place. The legate was no less violent on the other hand; and told the assembly, that all ecclesiastical benefices were the property of the pope, and he might dispose of them, either in whole or in part, as he thought fit. In the end, the bishops and abbots, being threatened with excommunication, which would have caused all their revenues to fall into the king's hands, were obliged to submit to the exaction; and the only mitigation which the legate allowed them was, that the tenths already granted should be accepted as part of the payment of the bills. But the money was still insufficient for the pope's purpose: the conquest of Sicily was as remote as ever: the demands which came from Rome were endless: pope Alexander became so urgent, that he sent over a legate to England; threatening the kingdom with an interdict, and the king with an excommunication, if the arrears which he pretended to be due to him were not instantly remitted: and at last Henry, sensible of the cheat, began to think of breaking off the agreement, and of resigning into the pope's hands that crown which Alexander never intended that he or his family should ever enjoy.

Although the earl of Cornwall had refused the fraudulent bargain with Rome, he engaged in an enterprize no less extensive and vexatious than that of his brother, and not attended with much greater probability of success. The immense opulence of Richard having made the German princes cast their eye on him as a candidate for the empire, he was tempted to expend vast sums of money on his election; and he succeeded so far as to be chosen king of the Romans, which seemed to render his succession infallible to the imperial throne. He went over to Germany, and carried out of the kingdom the sum of seven hundred thousand marks, if we may credit the account given by Matthew Paris; but it is probably much exaggerated. His money, while it lasted, procured him friends and partizans; but it was soon drained from him by the avidity of the German princes; and having no personal or family connexions in that country, and no solid foundation of power, he found that he had lavished away the frugality of a whole life, in order to procure a splendid title; and that his absence from England, joined to the weakness of his brother Henry's government, gave reins to the factious English barons, and involved his own country and family in great troubles.

The successful revolt of the nobility from king John, their imposing on him and his successors, limitations of their royal power, had made them feel their own weight and importance, had set a dangerous precedent of resistance, and being followed by a long minority, had impoverished as well as weakened that crown, which they were at last induced to replace on the head of young Henry. In the king's situation great abilities and great caution were necessary to prevent the complaints of the barons; but it must be confessed, that this prince was possessed of neither of these talents. He had not prudence to chuse right measures; and was apt, in his administration, to neglect all the salutary articles of the Great Charter; which he remarked to be so little regarded by his nobles. This conduct had extremely lessened his authority in the kingdom; had multiplied complaints against him, and had exposed him to affronts, and even to dangerous attempts upon his prerogative. In 1244, when he desired a supply from parliament, the barons, complaining of the frequent breaches of the Great Charter, and of the many fruitless applications which they made for the redress of grievances, demanded in return that he should give them the nomination of the great justiciary and of the chancellor, to whose hands chiefly the administration of justice was committed: and, if we may credit the historian, they had formed the plan of other limitations, as well as of associations to maintain them, which would have reduced the king to an absolute cypher, and have held the crown in perpetual dependence. The king, to satisfy them, would agree to nothing but a renewal of the charter, and a general permission to excommunicate all the violaters of it; and he received no supply, except a scutage of twenty shillings on each knight's fee for the marriage of his eldest daughter to the king of Scotland; a burden which was expressly annexed to their feudal tenures.

Four years after, in a full parliament, when Henry demanded a new supply, he was reproached with a breach of his word, and with frequent violations of the charter. He was asked whether he was not ashamed to ask any aid from his people, whom he hated and despised, to whom on all occasions he preferred foreigners, and who groaned under the oppressions which he either permitted or exercised over them. He was told that, besides disparaging his nobility by forcing them to contract unequal and mean marriages with strangers, no rank of men was so low as to escape vexations from him or his ministers; that even the victuals consumed in his household, the clothes which himself and his servants wore, still more the wine which they used, were all taken by violence from the lawful owners, and no compensation was ever made them for the injury they sustained; that foreign merchants avoided the English harbours, as if they were possessed by pirates, and the commerce with all nations was cut off by these acts of violence; that loss was added to loss, and injury to injury, while the merchants, who had been despoiled of their goods, were also obliged to carry them at their own charge to whatever place the king was pleased to appoint; that even the poor fishermen on the coast could not escape his oppressions and those of his courtiers; and finding ing that they had not full liberty to dispose of their commodities in the English market, were constrained to carry them to foreign ports; and that his very religion was a ground of complaint to his subjects, while they observed that the waxen tapers and splendid silks, employed in so many useless possessions, were the spoils which he had forcibly ravished from the true owners. Throughout this remonstrance, there appears a strange mixture of regal tyranny in the practices which gave rise to it, and of aristocratical liberty in the expressions employed by the parliament. But a mixture of this kind is observable in all the ancient feudal governments; and both of them proved equally hurtful to the people in general.

The king, in answer to their remonstrance, gave the parliament only good words and fair promises, attended with the most humble submissions, but as they had often found them deceitful, he obtained at that time no supply; and therefore in 1253, when he found himself again under the necessity of applying to parliament, he had provided a new pretence, which he deemed infallible, and taking the vow of a crusade to Palestine, he demanded their assistance in that pious design. The parliament, however, for some time hesitated to comply; and the ecclesiastical order sent a deputation, consisting of four prelates, the primate, and the bishops of Winchester, Salisbury, and Carlisle, in order to remonstrate with him on his frequent violations of their rights and privileges; the oppressions with which he had loaded them and all his subjects, and the uncanonical and forced elections which were made to vacant dignities. "It is true," replied the king, "I have been somewhat faulty in this particular: I obtruded you, my lord of Canterbury, upon your see: I was obliged to employ both entreaties and menaces, my lord of Winchester, to have you elected: my proceedings, I confess, were very irregular, my lords of Salisbury and Carlisle, when I raised you from the lowest stations to your present dignities: I am determined henceforth to correct these abuses; and it will also become you, in order to make a thorough reformation, to resign the benefices you at present enjoy, and try to enter again in a more regular and canonical manner." The bishops, surprized at these unexpected sarcasms, told the king, that the question was not at present how to correct past errors, but to avoid them for the future. The king promised redress both of ecclesiastical and civil grievances; and the parliament in return agreed to grant him a supply, a tenth of the ecclesiastical benefices, and a scutage of three marks on each knight's fee: but as they had experienced his frequent breach of promise, they required that he should ratify the Great Charter in a manner still more authentic and more solemn than any which he had hitherto employed. All the prelates and abbots were assembled: they held burning tapers in their hands: the Great Charter was read before them: they denounced the sentence of excommunication against every one who should thenceforth violate the fundamental law: they threw their tapers on the ground and exclaimed, "May the soul of every one who incurs this sentence so stink and corrupt in hell!" The king bore a part in this ceremony, and subjoined: "So help me God, I will keep all these articles inviolate, as I am a man, as I am a christian, as I am a knight, and as I am a king crowned and anointed." Yet was the tremendous ceremony no sooner finished than his favourites, abusing his weakness, caused him to return to the same arbitrary and irregular administration; and the expectations of his people were thus perpetually frustrated.

The province of Gascony in France belonged to the crown of England; but several of the barons having entered into a confederacy to emancipate themselves from the English government, Henry had sent over Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester, with an army, to reduce them to subjection. This nobleman was a younger son of that Simon de Montfort, who had conducted with such valour and renown the crusade against the Albigenses, and who, though he tarnished his famous exploits by cruelty and ambition, had left a name very precious to all the bigots of that age, particularly to the ecclesiastics. A large inheritance in England fell by succession to his family; but as the elder brother enjoyed still more opulent possessions in France, and could not perform fealty to two masters, he transferred his right to Simon, his younger brother, who came over to England, did homage for his lands, and was raised to the dignity of earl of Leicester. In the year 1238, he espoused Eleanor, dowager of William, earl of Pembroke, and sister to the king: but the marriage of this princess with a subject and a foreigner, though contracted with Henry's consent, was greatly complained of by the earl of Cornwall, and all the barons of England; and Leicester was supported against their violence by the king's favour and authority alone. He had, however, no sooner established himself in his possessions and dignities, than he acquired, by insinuation and address, a strong interest with the nation, and gained equally the affections of all orders of men. But he lost the friendship of Henry, from the usual levity and fickleness of that prince; he was banished the court; he was recalled; he was entrusted with the command in Gascony, where he succeeded in reducing the revolted barons to obedience. But the severities which he exercised after the establishment of tranquillity, exasperated the Gascons to such a degree, that they sent over commissioners to England to accuse him of tyranny and oppression. The earl, not contented with denying the imputations cast on his government, with great heat and indecency upbraided the king for listening to such frivolous complaints against a man who had served him so faithfully, and even expended a considerable income in the exercise of an office by which other governors had enriched themselves. Henry assured him that he did not believe the accusations; and, in order to manifest his innocence, that he would send commissaries into Guienne, to investigate the conduct of the inhabitants: in the mean time, as a convincing proof of his confidence and regard, he supplied him with a sum of money, and desired he would hold himself in readiness to return and resume his administration.

The Gascons, being informed of the king's intention, deputed the archbishop of Bourdeaux to repeat their complaints, and renew their petition for another governor; and, during the prelate's residence at London, the commissioners returned from Gascony, where they had examined the disputes between the earl and the people. Their report was favourable to Leicester; but, as the archbishop assured the king that, if he were permitted to return, a general revolt would be the infallible consequence, Henry, rather than incur the danger of such a rebellion, resolved to sacrifice Leicester to their resentment; and ordered the articles of his impeachment to be laid before his peers, that he might be tried by the laws of the kingdom. The earl, knowing the caprice and inconstancy of his sovereign, had by this time engaged in his interest the earls of Cornwall and Gloucester, with several of those factious barons who were ever ready to countenance rebellion. Thus supported, he appeared in court, and vindicated his conduct to the satisfaction of his judges, who had indeed resolved, at all events, to acquit him. The archbishop of Bourdeaux was so confounded by the partiality of the court, that he could scarcely proceed with his evidence. Henry himself was irritated to such a degree by the insolence of Leicester, that he could not refrain from venting some injudicious expressions; which provoked the earl to accuse him of ingratitude, and to demand, in the most arrogant manner, the recompence he had so often promised in consideration of his manifold services. The king answered, in a transport of rage, that he did not think himself obliged to perform his promise to a traitor: an appellation that so incensed the earl, that he told his sovereign he lied: that he believed he never went to confession; and that if he did it was not attended with repentance. "I never repented any thing so much," replied the king, "as having lavished so many favours on a man, like you, so destitute of gratitude and decorum." When he had said this, it was his intention to arrest the earl upon the spot; but perceiving a number of barons prepared to afford him protection, his indignation gave way to his fear, and he was compelled to smother his resentment; he even listened to proposals of accommodation made by some of the barons, and in appearance was reconciled to Leicester; but the insolence of that haughty nobleman had made so strong an impression on his mind, that he could never afterwards behold him without horror.

Though Henry had such just grounds for complaint against Leicester, he thought it prudent to send him back to Gascony, lest the appointment of another governor should occasion fresh disturbances; and, by removing him to such a distance from the kingdom, he likewise secured himself from the effects of his intrigues and ambitious projects: but, in order to indulge the Gascons with the prospect of being one day relieved from his tyranny, he by an authentic deed, conveyed that province, together with the Isle of Oleron, to his eldest son Edward, only with a reservation of the sovereignty during his own life; and such of the natives as were in England at that time did homage to the young prince.

Leicester in the mean time repaired to his government, glowing with resentment against the Gascons; and, at his arrival, threw the whole province into confusion. He encouraged the renewal of hostilities, and attacked the nobility with implacable fury; but, blinded by his passion, he was guilty of such indiscretion and misconduct, that he at length found himself blocked up in Montauban, and was obliged to purchase a capitulation by the release of his prisoners. Chagrined at this disgrace, he resigned his government, and retired to France; though not before he had surrendered to the insurgents three of the most important fortresses, and had reduced the province to a state of universal anarchy.

Alphonso X. king of Castile, profiting by these commotions, formed a spurious kind of claim to a part of Gascony, founded on a grant of Henry the Second, and Eleanor of Guienne, to Alphonso VIII. who married their daughter. He found means to engage several of the principal noblemen to support this pretension; and the whole province renounced its allegiance to Henry, except the city of Bourdeaux, and the territories immediately adjoining, which were in the utmost danger of being lost for want of proper assistance from England. The pope, however, excommunicated all the adherents of Alphonso; and Henry resolved to go thither in person. With this view he issued writs for a general muster of such as were obliged to have arms, that they might be prepared to keep watch and ward in the different towns and cities, and maintain the peace of the nation in his absence: he then levied a fund for the defraying of the expences of the expedition, by raising an aid on his own demesnes; and summoning all who possessed fifteen pounds a year by military tenure to come and receive knighthood. He also raised money by dispensing with the execution of some ordinances made against the Jews; and as, by the feudal tenure, he was authorized to demand a scutage of each of his military tenants for the knighting of his eldest son, he assembled a parliament at Westminster, on the 5th of April, 1253, in the hope that the barons would fix it at a higher rate than he would choose to impose by his own authority.

Henry now began to make preparations for his voyage to Gascony; and, with that intention, summoned all his military tenants to meet him at Portsmouth, at which place he embarked. Having arrived at Bourdeaux on the 15th of August with a powerful army, he soon recovered all the places that had been taken by the revolted barons, and compelled the Castilian monarch to make a formal renunciation of his pretensions to Gascony. So complete indeed was the reconciliation between the courts of England and Castile, that a marriage was concluded between the English prince Edward, and Eleanor, the daughter of Alphonso. But though, in consequence of this accommodation, hostilities had entirely ceased, yet Henry, who wanted fresh sums of money to supply the rapacity of his favourites, carefully concealed this circumstance; and sent over his commands to the queen, and to his brother, the earl of Cornwall, who governed the kingdom as joint regents during his absence, to summon the parliament, and demand supplies for supporting the expences of the war. The parliament accordingly met on the 27th of January, 1254; but having heard some vague reports relative to the pacification, refused to grant any supplies till they should have verified the fact. Henry, dissatisfied with the reasons they alledged for withholding the grant, sent orders to the regents to assemble the parliament fifteen days after Easter. The earl of Leicester, however, returning from the continent in the interim, discovered the true state of affairs in Gascony; upon which the parliament persisted in their refusal to grant any farther supplies. Henry, finding his dishonourable acts detected, resolved to return to England; and, preferring a journey by land to a voyage by sea, made application to Louis, king of France, who had just arrived from his unfortunate expedition to Palestine, for permission to pass through his dominions. This being cheerfully granted him, he went to Paris, where he was sumptuously entertained by the French king; and he was so well pleased with the honours he received at the different towns through which he passed, that he was in no haste to reach England, where he did not arrive till the commencement of 1255.

Although the eyes of Henry had been opened to the impositions of the pope, that pontiff had art enough to continue or rather to renew, the delusion, and to persuade him to persist in the ridiculous design of conquering Sicily; for which purpose he summoned a parliament, and demanded the necessary supplies. This imprudent step afforded a specious pretext to the discontented barons, who were now headed by the earl of Leicester, to attempt an innovation in the government, and to wrest the crown from its legal possessor. That haughty nobleman, conscious that his sovereign must view him with an eye of suspicion, found greater advantage in cultivating his interest with the public, and in seeking to inflame the general discontents which prevailed against the administration. He filled every place with complaints against the infringement of the Great Charter, the acts of violence committed on the people, the combination between the pope and the king in their tyranny and extortions, Henry's neglect of his native subjects and barons; and though himself a foreigner, he was more vociferous than any in representing the indignity of submitting to the dominion of foreigners. By his hypocritical pretensions to devotion he gained the favour of the clergy: by his seeming concern for public good he acquired the affections of the public; and independent of the private friendships which he had cultivated with the barons, his animosity against the favourites created an union of interests between him and that powerful order of men.

A recent quarrel which broke out between Leicester and William de Valence, the queen's maternal uncle, and Henry's chief favourite, brought matters to extremity, and determined the former to give full scope to his bold and unbounded ambition, which the laws and the king's authority had hitherto with difficulty restrained. He secretly called a meeting of the most potent barons, particularly Humphrey de Bohun, high constable; Roger Bigod, earl mareschal; and the earls of Warwick and Gloucester; men who by their family and possessions stood in the first rank of the English nobility. He represented to this company the necessity of reforming the state, and of putting the execution of the laws into other hands than those which had hitherto appeared, from repeated experience, so unfit for the charge with which they were entrusted. He exaggerated the oppressions exercised against the lower orders of the state, the violations of the privileges of the barons, the continued depredations committed on the clergy; and, in order to aggravate the enormity of his conduct, he appealed to the Great Charter, which Henry had so often ratified, and which was calculated to prevent for ever the return of those intolerable grievances. He magnified the generosity of their ancestors, who had extorted that famous concession from the crown; but expressed his concern at their own degeneracy, who allowed so important an advantage, once obtained, to be wrested from them by a weak prince and by insolent strangers: and he insisted that the king's word, after so many submissions and fruitless promises on his part, could no longer be relied on; and that the only security to be procured for his observance of the national privileges, was to place him in such a situation as should render him wholly unable to infringe them.

These topics, which were founded in truth, and suited so well the sentiments of the assembly, had the desired effect; and the barons embraced a resolution of redressing the public grievances, by taking into their own hands the administration of government. Henry having summoned a parliament, in expectation of receiving supplies for his Sicilian project, the barons appeared in the hall, clad in compleat armour, with their swords by their sides. The king on his entry, struck with the unusual appearance, asked them what object they had in view, and whether they intended to make him their prisoner? Roger Bigod replied, in the name of the rest, that he was not their prisoner, but their sovereign; and they even wished to grant him ample supplies, in order to fix his son on the throne of Sicily; that they only expected an adequate return for this expence and service; and that, as he had frequently made submissions to the parliament, had acknowledged his past errors, and had still allowed himself to be carried into the same path, which gave them such just reason of complaint, he must now yield to more strict regulations, and confer authority on those who were able and willing to redress the national grievances. Henry, partly allured by the hopes of obtaining supplies, partly intimidated by the union and martial appearance of the barons, agreed to their demand, and promised to summon another another parliament at Oxford, in order to digest the new plan of government, and to elect the persons who were to be entrusted with the supreme authority.

This parliament, which the royalists, and even the nation, from experience of the confusions that attended its measures, afterwards denominated The Mad Parliament, met on the 11th of June, 1258; and, as all the barons brought along with them their military vassals, and appeared with an armed force, the king, who had taken no precautions against them, was in reality a prisoner in their hands, and was obliged to submit to all the terms which they were pleased to impose upon him. Twelve barons were selected from among the king's ministers, twelve more were chosen by parliament: to these twenty-four, unlimited authority was granted to reform the state, and to pursue such measures as they should deem most proper for the future government of the kingdom; and the king himself took an oath, that he would maintain whatever ordinances they should think proper to enact for that purpose. Leicester was at the head of this supreme council, to which the legislative power was thus in reality transferred; and all their measures were taken by his secret influence and direction.

The first step they took bore a specious appearance, and seemed well calculated to promote the public good; which they professed to be the chief object of all these innovations: they ordained that four knights should be chosen by each county, to inquire into all the grievances of which their neighbourhood had reason to complain, that they should attend the ensuing parliament, in order to give information to that assembly of the state of their particular counties; and that the expences of such knights should be borne by their respective counties. This regulation bore a much nearer resemblance to our present constitution than had been made by the barons in the reign of king John, when the knights were only appointed to meet in their several counties, and there to draw up a detail of their grievances. Meanwhile the twenty-four barons proceeded to adopt those measures which appeared necessary for the redress of such grievances as were supposed to be sufficiently notorious. They ordered that three sessions of parliament should be regularly held every year, in the months of February, June, and October; that a new sheriff should be annually elected by the votes of the freeholders in each county; that the sheriffs should have no power of fining the barons who neglected to attend their courts, or the circuits of the justiciaries; that no heirs should be committed to the wardship of foreigners, and no castles intrusted to their custody; and that no new warrens or forests should be created, nor the revenues of any counties or hundreds be let to farm (i).

But the earl of Leicester and his associates, having advanced so far to satisfy the nation, instead of continuing in this popular course, or granting the king that supply which they had promised him, immediately provided for the extension and continuance of their own authority. They renewed the popular clamour against the foreigners; and they fell with the utmost violence on the king's half-brothers, who were supposed to be the secret authors of all the national grievances, and whom Henry had no longer any power to protect. The four brothers, sensible of their danger, sought their safety in flight, with an intention of making their escape out of the kingdom; but being eagerly pursued by the barons, Aymer, one of the brothers, who had been elected to the see of Winchester, took shelter in his episcopal palace, and carried the others along with him; they were speedily surrounded in that place, and threatened to be dragged out by force, and to be punished for their crimes and misdemeanors; and it was with difficulty that the king, who pleaded the sacredness of an ecclesiastical sanctuary, could extricate them from this danger by banishing them the kingdom. In this act of violence, as well as in the former usurpations of the barons, the queen and her uncles were thought to have chiefly concurred; being jealous of the credit acquired by the brothers, which, they found, had eclipsed and annihilated their own.

But the subsequent proceedings of the twenty-four barons were sufficient to convince the nation of their sinister views, and to prove their intention of reducing, for ever, both the king and the people under the arbitrary power of a very narrow aristocracy, which must at last have terminated either in anarchy, or in a violent usurpation and tyranny. They pretended that they had not yet digested all the regulations necessary for the reformation of the state and for the redress of grievances; and they must still retain their power, till that great purpose were thoroughly effected; in other words, they must be perpetual governors, and must continue to reform, till they were pleased to abdicate their authority. They formed an association among themselves, and swore that they would stand by each other with their lives and fortunes: they displaced all the chief officers of the crown, the justiciary, the chancellor, the treasurer; and advanced either themselves or their own creatures in their places; even the offices of the king's household were disposed of at their pleasure: the government of all the castles was put into hands in whom they found reason to confide: and the whole power of the state being thus transferred to them, they ventured to impose an oath, by which all the subjects were obliged to swear, under the penalty of being declared public enemies, that they would obey and execute all the regulations, both known and unknown, of the twenty-four barons: and all this, they had the temerity to declare, was for the greater glory of God, the honour of the church, the service of the king, and the advantage of the kingdom. No one dared to withstand this tyrannical authority: prince Edward himself, the king's eldest son, a youth of eighteen, who began to give indications of that great and manly spirit which appeared throughout the whole course of his life, was, after making some opposition, constrained to submit, and to take that oath, which really deposed his father and his family from sovereign authority. Earl Warrenne was the last person in the kingdom that could be brought to give the confederated barons this mark of submission.

But the twenty-four barons, not content with the usurpation of the royal authority, introduced an innovation in the constitution of parliament, which was of the utmost importance. They ordained, that this assembly should chuse a committee of twelve persons, who should, in the intervals of the sessions, possess the authority of the whole parliament, and should attend, on receiving a summons, the person of the king, in all his motions. But to such an alarming degree of power had the barons attained, that this regulation was also submitted to; the whole government was overthrown, or fixed on new foundations; and the monarchy was totally subverted, without its being possible for the king to do any thing in defence of the constitution against the newly-elected oligarchy.

The report which prevailed in 1259, that the king of the Romans intended to pay a visit to England, gave alarm to the ruling barons, who dreaded lest the extensive influence and established authority of that prince would be employed to restore the prerogatives of his family, and overturn their plan of government. They sent over the bishop of Worcester, who met him at St. Omers; asked him, in the name of the barons, the reason of his journey, and how long he intended to stay in England; and insisted that, before he entered the kingdom, he should swear to observe the regulations established at Oxford. On Richard's refusal to take the oath required of him they prepared to resist him as a public enemy; they fitted out a fleet, assembled an army, and exciting the inveterate prejudices of the people against foreigners, from whom they had suffered so many oppressions, spread the report that Richard, attended by a number of strangers, meant to restore by force the authority of his exiled brother, and to violate all the securities provided for public liberty. The king of the Romans, unable to resist the torrent, was at last obliged to submit to the terms required by the barons.

But the barons, in proportion to their continuance in power, began gradually to lose that popularity which had

(i) Such were the first regulations which the twenty-four barons established at Oxford (generally denominated The Statutes of Oxford,) for the redress of public grievances. The names of the barons were as follow: the twelve chosen by the king's council were, the bishops of London and Winchester; Henry, son of Richard, king of the Romans; John, earl of Warrenne; Guy de Lusignan, and William de Valence, the king's half-brothers; John, earl of Warwick; John Mansel, a frier; J. de Darlington, abbot of Westminster; Henry de Wengham, dean of St. Martin's, London; the twelfth is omitted by Matthew Paris, but is supposed to have been either Peter of Savoy, or James Audeley. The other twelve chosen by the barons were, Walter de Canteloupe, bishop of Worcester; the earls of Leicester, Hereford, Gloucester, and Norfolk; Roger Mortimer; John Fitz-Geoffrey; Hugh Bigod, brother to the earl of Norfolk; Richard de Gray; William Bardolf; Peter de Montfort; and Hugh le Despenser.

assisted them in obtaining it; and men repined, that regulations, which were occasionally established for the reformation of the state, were likely to become perpetual, and to subvert entirely the ancient constitution. They were apprehensive lest the power of the nobles, always oppressive, should now exert itself without control, by removing the counterpoise of the crown; and their fears were increased by some new edicts of the barons, which were evidently calculated to procure to themselves an impunity in all their violences. They ordained that the circuits of the itinerant justices, the sole check on their arbitrary conduct, should be held only once in seven years; and men easily perceived that a remedy, which returned after such long intervals, against an oppressive power, which was perpetual, would prove totally insignificant and useless. The barons were loudly called upon to complete their intended regulations. The knights of the shires, who appear now to have been pretty regularly assembled, and sometimes in a separate house, made remonstrances against the slowness of their proceedings: they represented that, though the king had complied with all the conditions required of him by the Statutes of Oxford, the barons had hitherto done nothing for the public good, and had only been careful to promote their own private advantage, and to make inroads on royal authority; and they even appealed to prince Edward, and claimed his interposition for the interests of the nation and the reformation of the government. The prince replied, that though it was from constraint, and contrary to his private sentiments, he had sworn to maintain the Provisions of Oxford, he was determined to observe his oath; but he sent a message to the barons, requiring them to bring their undertaking to a speedy termination, and fulfil their engagements to the public: otherwise he menaced them, that at the expence of his life he would oblige them to do their duty, and would shed his blood, if necessity required it, in promoting the interests, and satisfying the just wishes of the nation.

The barons, urged by so pressing a necessity, published at last a new code of ordinances for the reformation of the state; but the expectations of the people were greatly disappointed, when they found that these consisted only of some trivial alterations in the municipal law; and still more, when the barons pretended that the task was not yet finished, and that they must farther prolong their authority, in order to bring the work of reformation to the desired conclusion. The current popularity was now much turned to the side of the crown; and the barons had little to rely on for their support, besides the private influence and power of their families, which, though exorbitant, was likely to prove inferior to the combination of king and people. Even this resource was daily weakened by the jealousies and disputes which arose among themselves: their ancient and inveterate quarrels broke out when they came to share the spoils of the crown; and the rivalship between the earls of Leicester and Gloucester, the chief leaders among them, threatened a speedy dissolution of the whole confederacy. The latter, more moderate in his pretensions, was desirous of stopping or retarding the career of the barons' usurpations; but the former, enraged at the opposition which he met with in his own party, pretended to throw up all concern in English affairs; and he retired into France.

The kingdom of France, the only state with which England had any considerable intercourse, was at this time governed by Louis IX. a prince of the most singular character that is to be met with in all records of history. This monarch united, to the mean and abject superstition of a monk, all the courage and magnanimity of the greatest hero; and, what may be deemed more extraordinary, the justice and integrity of a disinterested patriot, the mildness and humanity of an accomplished philosoper. So far was he from taking advantage of the divisions among the English, or attempting to expel those dangerous rivals from the provinces which they still possessed in France, he had entertained many scruples with regard to the sentence of attainder pronounced against the king's father, had even expressed some intention of restoring the other provinces, and was only prevented from taking that imprudent resolution by the united remonstrances of his own barons, who represented the extreme danger of such a measure, and, what had a greater influence on Louis, the justice of punishing, by a legal sentence, the barbarity and felony of John. Whenever this prince interposed in English affairs, it was always with an intention of composing the differences between the king and his nobility; he recommended to both parties every peaceable and reconciling measure; and used all his authority with the earl of Leicester, his native subject, to bend him to a compliance with Henry. He made a treaty with England, on the 20th of May, at a time when the distractions of that kingdom were at the greatest height, and when the king's authority was totally annihilated; and the terms which he granted might, even in a more prosperous state of their affairs, be deemed reasonable and advantageous to the English. He yielded up some territories which had been conquered from Poictou and Guienne; he ensured the peaceable possession of the latter province to Henry; he agreed to pay that prince a large sum of money, and he only required that the king should, in return, make a final cession of Normandy, and the other provinces, which he could never entertain any hopes of recovering by force of arms. This cession was ratified by Henry, by his two sons and two daughters, and by the king of the Romans and his three sons: Leicester alone, either moved by a vain arrogance, or desirous to ingratiate himself with the people of England, protested against the deed, and insisted on the right, however distant, which might accrue to his consort. Louis perceived, in this obstinacy, the unbounded ambition of the earl; and as the barons insisted that the money due by treaty should be at their disposal, not at Henry's, he also saw, and probably with regret, the low condition to which this monarch, who had more erred from weakness than from any bad intentions, was reduced by the turbulence of his own subjects.

The situation of Henry wore a more favourable aspect, in the year 1261. The twenty-four barons had now enjoyed the sovereign power nearly three years; and had visibly employed it, not for the reformation of the state, which they declared was their sole object, but for the aggrandizement of themselves and their families. The breach of trust was apparent to all the world, and excited universal murmurs; the dissensions among the barons themselves, which increased the evil, made also the remedy more obvious and easy; and the secret desertion, in particular of the earl of Gloucester to the crown, seemed to promise Henry success in any attempt he might think proper to make for the resumption of his authority. Yet durst he not take that step, so reconcilable both to justice and policy, without making a previous application to Rome, and desiring an absolution from his oaths and engagements.

The pope was at this time much dissatisfied with the conduct of the barons; who, in order to acquire popularity with the people and clergy of England, had expelled all the Italian ecclesiastics, had confiscated their benefices, and expressed a determination to maintain the liberties and privileges of the English church, in which the rights of patronage belonging to their own families were included. The extreme animosity of the English clergy against the Italians was also a source of his disgust to this order; and an attempt which had been made by them for farther liberty, and greater independence on the civil power, was therefore less acceptable to the court of Rome.

About the same time that the barons, by the Statutes of Oxford, had annihilated the prerogatives of the monarchy, the clergy met in a synod at Merton, and passed several ordinances, which were no less calculated to promote their own grandeur at the expence of the crown. They decreed, that it was unlawful to try ecclesiastics by secular judges; that the clergy were not to regard any prohibitions from civil courts; that lay-patrons had no right to confer spiritual benefices; that the magistrate was obliged, without farther inquiry, to imprison all persons against whom a sentence of excommunication had been issued; and that ancient usage, without any particular grant or charter, was a sufficient authority for any clerical possessions or privileges. About a century before, these claims would have been supported by the court of Rome beyond the most fundamental articles of faith: they were the chief points maintained by that prince of martyrs, Thomas à Becket; and his resolution in defending them had exalted him to the high station which he held in the catalogue of Romish saints. But principles were changed with the times: the pope was become jealous of the independence of the English clergy, which made them stand less in need of his protection, and even emboldened them to resist his authority, and to complain of the preference given to the Italian courtiers, whose interests, it is natural to imagine, were the chief object of his concern. He was ready, therefore, on the king's application, to annul these new constitutions of the church of England as dangerous innovations; and, at the same time, he absolved Henry and all his subjects from the oath which they had taken to observe the provisions of Oxford.

Prince Edward returned to England during these transactions. His liberal mind, though in such early youth, had taught him the great prejudice which his father had incurred, by his levity, inconstancy, and frequent breach of promise, refused for a long time to take advantage of this absolution; and declared that the Provisions of Oxford, how unreasonable soever in themselves, and how much soever abused by the barons, ought still to be adhered to by those who had sworn to observe them. He himself had been constrained by violence to take that oath; yet was he determined to keep it. By this scrupulous fidelity, the prince acquired the confidence of all parties, and was afterwards enabled to recover fully the royal authority, and to perform such great actions, both during his own reign and that of his father.

The situation of England, during this period, as well as that of most European kingdoms, was somewhat peculiar. There was no regular military force maintained in the nation: the sword, however, was not, properly speaking, in the hands of the people: the barons were alone entrusted with the defence of the community; and after any effort which they made, either against their own prince or against foreigners, as the military retainers departed home, the armies were disbanded, and could not speedily be re-assembled at pleasure. It was easy, therefore, for a few barons, by a combination, to be beforehand with another party, to collect suddenly their troops, and to appear unexpectedly in the field with an army, which their antagonists, though equal, or even superior in power and interest, would not dare to encounter. Hence the sudden revolutions, which often took place in those governments: hence the frequent victories obtained without a blow by one faction over the other; and hence it happened, that the seeming prevalence of a party was seldom a prognostic of the long continuance in authority.

The king, having received the pope's absolution from his oath, accompanied with menaces of excommunication against all opponents, trusting to the countenance of the church, to the support promised him by many considerable barons, and to the returning favour of the people, immediately took off the mask. After justifying his conduct by a proclamation, in which he set forth the private ambition, and the breach of trust, conspicuous in the earl of Leicester, and his associates, he declared, that he had resumed the government, and was determined thenceforth to exert the royal authority for the protection of his subjects. He removed Hugh le Despenser and Nicholas de Ely, the justiciary and chancellor appointed by the barons; and put Philip Basset and Walter de Merton in their places. He substituted new sheriffs in all the counties: he placed new governors in most of the castles: he changed all the officers of his household: he summoned a parliament, which assembled at London on the 23rd of April, 1262, in which the resumption of his authority was ratified, with only five dissenting voices.

By this means the kingdom was involved in great confusion; some paying obedience to the officers and magistrates nominated by the king, while others still obeyed those who had been appointed by the barons; and many, profiting by the general anarchy, were wholly unrestrained by any authority whatever, and lived as if a total dissolution of government had taken place.

By the generous declaration of prince Edward abovementioned, that he was determined to keep the oath he had taken to maintain the Provisions of Oxford, his father Henry was highly mortified, and his confusion was greatly increased by an accommodation which took place between the rival earls of Leicester and Gloucester, who saw no prospect of success but in the sacrifice of their private animosities to the good of that cause in which they were both embarked. These noblemen renewed, with added solemnity, their oaths to support each other, and to maintain the Statutes of Oxford, with their lives and fortunes. The party of the barons being thus fortified, they gave the king to understand, that unless he would voluntarily remove from his person those evil counsellors who had given him such pernicious advice, they would find means to effect that removal by compulsion.

Henry, who had engaged in an enterprize he was unable to conduct, had by this time relapsed into his native perplexity and irresolution; and, as he could not determine upon what answer it would become him to make, he took no notice of the message, but remained in the Tower, from an apprehension that his person would not be safe in any other habitation. His fears, however, daily acquiring fresh strength, he was induced to seek for a diminution of them, by attempting to increase the number of his adherents; and, with this view, published the pope's bull, which absolved him from the obligation of his oath. This imprudent step was attended with effects diametrically opposite to those which he had expected to derive from it, as it deprived him of that regard which many, from principles of loyalty, still preserved for his person, and furnished his enemies with a plausible pretext for representing him as a prince, on whose faith and sincerity not the smallest dependence could be placed. The barons, encouraged by this defection, resolved to make some desperate attempt; and accordingly formed a plan for surprizing him at Winchester, whither he had lately repaired, on the faith of a negociation with which they thought to amuse him: but Henry, having gained intelligence of their design, returned to the Tower in time to hinder its success.

A civil war now seemed unavoidable; but each party being unwilling to incur the odium of having caused it, they mutually accepted the mediation of the king of the Romans; who effected an accommodation on the following terms: That Henry should once more submit to the Provisions of Oxford; and that the barons should change and mitigate certain arrangements which were most offensive to the king. The earl of Leicester, however, protested against the arrangement; alledging, that they could not, with any regard to their own honour and safety, repose the smallest degree of confidence in the professional sincerity of a prince who had made the most sacred ties subservient to his own interested views: and, having made this declaration, he retired to France in disgust. Several other barons also expressed their dislike to the articles; but suffered themselves to be over-ruled by a majority, rather than incur the danger of being reproached as the authors of civil dissension. By this treaty the tranquillity of England appeared to be restored; yet under this specious semblance of peace, the embers of discord still glowed; and in a little time burst into a flame, that raged with uncommon violence. The agreement, however, was ratified, and Henry embraced the opportunity afforded him by the pacification to repair in person to the continent, in order to regulate the affairs of Gascony; and being seized with a dangerous distemper at Bourdeaux, he was under the necessity of prolonging his stay much beyond the time which he had originally fixed for his return.

Richard earl of Gloucester, dying in the mean time, his son Gilbert made a voyage to Gascony to receive the investiture of the earldom; but the conduct of his father had irritated Henry to such a degree, that he was compelled to submit to the trouble of a tedious solicitation, and even present him with a considerable sum of money, before he could obtain his request.

The king, in order to cut off every objection to his conduct, offered to refer all the differences between him and the earl of Leicester, to Margaret queen of France. The integrity of Louis gave a mighty influence to any decision which issued from his court; and Henry probably hoped that the barons would submit to the award of that princess. By an admirable conduct, probably as political as just, Louis continually interposed his good offices to allay the civil discords of the English: he forwarded all healing measures, which might give security to both parties; and he still endeavoured, though without success, to sooth by persuasion the fierce ambition of the earl of Leicester, and to convince him how much it was his duty to submit to the authority of his sovereign in a peaceable manner.

The bold and artful Leicester was nowise discouraged by the bad success of his former enterprizes. The death of Richard earl of Gloucester, who was his chief rival in power, and who, before his decease, had joined the royal party, seemed to open a new field to his violence, and to expose the throne to fresh insults and injuries. It was in vain that the king professed his intentions of observing strictly the Great Charter, even of maintaining all the regulations made by the reforming barons at Oxford or afterwards, except those which entirely annihilated the royal authority; these powerful chieftains, now hateful to the court, could not peaceably resign the hopes of entire independence and uncontrolled power, with which they had flattered themselves, and which they had so long enjoyed. Many of them engaged in Leicester's views: and among the rest, Gilbert the young earl of Gloucester, who brought him a mighty accession of power, from the extensive authority possessed by that opulent family. Even Henry, son of the king of the Romans, commonly called Henry d'Allmaine, though a prince of the blood, joined the party of the barons, in 1263, against the king, the head of his own family. The earl of Leicester himself, who still resided in France, secretly formed the links of this great conspiracy, and planned the whole scheme of operations.

The princes of Wales, notwithstanding the various attempts made to subdue them by the monarchs, both of the Saxon and Norman line, still preserved their authority in their own country. Though they had frequently been compelled to pay tribute to the crown of England, they were with difficulty retained in subordination, or even in peace; and almost through every reign since the Conquest, they had infested the English frontiers with such petty incursions and sudden inroads, as seldom merit to be recorded in a general history. The English, still content with repelling their invasions, and forcing them back into their native mountains, had never pursued the advantages obtained over them, nor been able, even under their greatest and most active princes, to reduce them even to a state of feudal subjection on the country. This advantage was reserved to the present monarch, the weakest and most indolent prince, who obtained from chance what he could neither obtain from his conduct nor his courage.

In the year 1237, Llewellyn prince of Wales, declining in years, and broken with infirmities, and harrassed with the rebellion and undutiful behaviour of his youngest son Griffin, had recourse to the protection of Henry; and consenting to subject his principality, which had hitherto, with some short intervals of exception, maintained its independence, to vassalage under the crown of England, had purchased security and tranquillity on these dishonourable terms. His eldest son and heir, David, renewed his homage to England; and having taken his brother prisoner, delivered him into Henry's hands, who committed him to custody in the Tower. That prince, endeavouring to make his escape, lost his life in the attempt: and David, freed from the apprehensions of so dangerous a competitor, paid thenceforth less regard to the English monarch, and even renewed those incursions, by which the Welch, during so many ages, had been accustomed to infest the English border. Llewellyn, however, the son of Griffin, who succeeded to his uncle David, had been obliged to renew the homage, which was now claimed by England as an established right; but he was well pleased with an opportunity of fomenting those civil discords, on which he rested his present security, and founded his hopes of future independence. He entered into a confederacy with the earl of Leicester, and collecting all the force of his principality, invaded England with an army of thirty thousand men. He ravaged the lands of Roger de Mortimer, and of all the barons who adhered to the crown; he marched into Cheshire, and committed similar depredations on prince Edward's territories; every place where his disorderly troops appeared was laid waste with fire and sword; and though Mortimer, a gallant and experienced warrior, made stout resistance, it was found necessary that the prince himself should head the army against the invader. Edward repulsed Llewellyn, and obliged him to take shelter in the mountains of North Wales; but he was prevented from making further progress against the enemy, by the disorders which soon after broke out in England, and now began to wear a most serious aspect.

The Welch invasion was the appointed signal for the malcontent barons to rise in arms; and Leicester, coming over secretly from France, collected all the forces of his party, and commenced an open rebellion. He seized the person of the bishop of Hereford; a prelate become hateful to all the inferior clergy, on account of his devoted attachment to the court of Rome. Simon bishop of Norwich, and John Mansel, because they had published the pope's bull, absolving the king and kingdom from their oaths to observe the Provisions of Oxford, were made prisoners, and exposed to the rage of the party. The king's demesnes were ravaged with unbounded fury; and as it was Leicester's interest to allure to his side, by the hopes of plunder, all the disorderly ruffians in England, he gave them a general license to pillage the barons of the opposite party, and even all such as observed a strict neutrality. But one of the principal resources of his faction was the populace of the cities, particularly of London; and as he had, by his hypocritical pretensions to sanctity, and his zeal against Rome, engaged the monks and inferior clergy in his party, his dominion over the lower ranks of men became uncontrollable. Thomas Fitz-Richard, mayor of London, a furious and licentious man, gave the countenance of authority to these disorders in the metropolis, and having declared war against the opulent citizens, he loosened all the bands of government, by which that turbulent city was commonly but ill restrained. On the approach of Easter, the zeal of superstition, the appetite for plunder, or what is often as prevalent with the populace as either of these motives, the pleasure of being engaged in a riot, and committing havoc and destruction, prompted them to attack the unhappy Jews, who were first pillaged without resistance, then massacred to the number of five hundred persons. The Lombard bankers were next exposed to the rage of the populace; and though, by taking sanctuary in the churches, they escaped with their lives, all their money and goods became a prey to the licentious multitude. Even the houses of the rich citizens, though English, were attacked by night; and way was made by sword and by fire to the pillage of their goods, and often to the destruction of their persons, who sometimes perished in the flames. The queen, who resided with her royal consort in the Tower, was terrified by such dangerous commotions in the neighbourhood of her residence, resolved to go by water to the castle of Windsor; but as she approached London Bridge, the populace assembled, and insulted her in the most brutal manner: they exclaimed, "Drown the witch;" and besides abusing her with the most opprobrious language, and pelting her with rotten eggs and dirt, they had prepared large stones to sink her barge, when she should attempt to shoot the bridge; and she was so frightened, that she prudently returned to the Tower.

The violence and fury of Leicester's faction had risen to such a height in all parts of England, that the king, unable to resist their power, was obliged to set on foot a treaty of peace; and to make an accommodation with the barons on the most disadvantageous terms, on the 18th of July, 1263. He agreed to confirm anew the Provisions of Oxford, even those which entirely annihilated the royal authority; and the barons were again re-instated in the sovereignty of the kingdom. They restored Hugh le Despenser to the office of chief justiciary; they appointed their own creatures sheriffs in every county of England; they took possession of all the royal castles and fortresses; they even named all the officers of the king's household; and they summoned a parliament to meet at Westminster, on the 11th of October, in order to settle more fully the plan of government. They here produced a new list of twenty-four barons, to whom they proposed that the administration should be entirely committed; and they insisted that their authority should continue, not only during the reign of the present king, but also during that of his successor.

Prince Edward, previous to his father's accommodation with the barons, had repaired to Bristol with a determination to defend the castle of that place against all attacks; and for that purpose he issued orders to the inhabitants to supply all the necessary stores and provisions at their own expence: but the people being incensed at a demand which they deemed arbitrary and oppressive, a sedition ensued; and the prince was compelled to retire to the castle for safety; where he was immediately invested. Wholly unprepared for sustaining a siege, he was compelled to have recourse to a stratagem in order to escape the fury of the enraged populace. He desired to speak with the bishop of Worcester, to whom he declared his intention of espousing the cause of the barons; but observed, that he first wished to try whether he could not persuade his father to grant them the satisfaction they required without proceeding to extremities; he therefore proposed, that the bishop should exert his influence with the people to procure him permission to attempt the execution of his design; and, to favour his deception, he entreated that prelate to accompany him, that he might assist him with his advice, and be convinced of the sincerity of his professions. The bishop, satisfied with his declarations, represented to the populace the evil effects that might arise from the detention of the prince at such a critical juncture. The siege was accordingly raised; and the prince departed for London, accompanied by the unsuspecting prelate. When they arrived at Egham, Edward bade a hasty adieu to his companion; and, clapping spurs to his horse, rode to the castle of Windsor, where he thought himself secure: but the bishop, provoked at his escape, and at the artifice he had employed to effect it, hastened to London, and persuaded the barons to lay immediate siege to that fortress. The prince, knowing that he was unable to defend himself, was no sooner apprized of their march, than he advanced to meet the earl of Leicester, in the hope of amusing him with a negociation, by which he might be allowed to keep possession of the castle; but the earl refusing to comply with the terms he proposed, he was detained a prisoner, and compelled to purchase his liberty by surrendering the fortress to that baron.

Edward having recovered his liberty, employed his activity in defending the prerogatives of his family, and gained a great party even among those who had at first adhered to the cause of the barons. His cousin Henry d'Allmaine; Roger Bigod, earl Mareschal; earl Warrenne; Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford; John lord Basset; Ralph Basset; Hamond l'Estrange; Roger de Mortimer; Henry de Piercy; Robert de Brus; Roger de Leybourne, with almost all the lords marchers, as they were called, on the boarders of Wales and Scotland, the most warlike parts of the kingdom, declared in favour of the royal cause; and hostilities, which were scarcely well composed, were again renewed in every part of England. But the near balance of the parties in point of force, joined to the universal clamour of the people, who were harassed with perpetual commotions, obliged the king and barons to open anew the negociations for peace; and it was agreed by both sides to submit their differences to the arbitration of Louis IX. king of France.

This virtuous monarch, the only man, who in like circumstances, could safely have been intrusted with such an authority by a neighbouring nation, had never ceased to interpose his good offices between the English king and his rebellious subjects; and had even, during the short interval of peace, invited over to Paris both the king and the earl of Leicester, in order to accommodate the differences between them; but found, that the fears and animosities on both sides, as well as the ambition of Leicester were so violent, as to render all his endeavours ineffectual. But when this solemn appeal, ratified by the oaths and subscriptions of the leaders in both factions, was made to his judgement, he was not discouraged from pursuing his honourable purpose: he summoned the states of France at Paris on the 23rd of January, 1264; and there, in the presence of that assembly, as well as in that of the king of England and Peter de Montfort, Leicester's son, he brought this great cause to a trial and examination. It appeared to him, that the Provisions of Oxford, even had they not been extorted by force, had they not been so exorbitant in their nature, and subversive of the ancient constitution, were expressly established as a temporary expedient, and could not, without breach of trust, be rendered perpetual by the barons. He therefore annulled these provisions; restored to the king the possession of his castles, and the power of nomination to the great offices; allowed him to retain what foreigners he pleased in his kingdom, and even to confer on them places of trust and dignity; and, in a word, reestablish the royal power in the same condition on which it stood before the meeting of the parliament at Oxford. But while he thus suppressed dangerous innovations, and preserved unimpaired the prerogatives of the English crown, he was not negligent of the rights of the people; and besides ordering that a general amnesty should be granted for all past offences, he declared, that his award was not in any wise meant to derogate from the privileges and liberties which the nation enjoyed by any former concessions or charters.

This equitable sentence was no sooner known in England, than Leicester and his confederates determined to reject it, and to have recourse to arms, in order to procure to themselves more safe and advantageous conditions. Without regard to his oaths and subscriptions, the enterprizing earl of Leicester directed his two sons, Richard and Peter de Montfort, in conjunction with Robert de Ferrars, earl of Derby; to attack the city of Worcester; while Henry and Simon de Montfort, two others of his sons, assisted by Llewellyn, prince of Wales, were ordered to lay waste the estate of Roger de Mortimer, a man whose loyalty had withstood every temptation. The earl himself resided at London; and employing as his instrument Fitz-Richard, the seditious mayor, who had violently and illegally prolonged his authority, he wrought up that city to the highest ferment and agitation. The populace formed themselves into bands and companies; chose leaders; practised all military exercises; committed violence on the royalists; and, to give them greater countenance in their disorders, an association was entered into between the city and eighteen great barons, never to make peace with the king but by common consent and approbation. At the head of those who bound themselves by oath to maintain this association, were the earls of Leicester, Gloucester, and Derby, with Hugh le Despenser the chief justiciary; men who had all previously sworn to submit to the award of the French monarch. Their only pretence for this breach of faith was, that the latter part of Louis's sentence was, as they affirmed, a contradiction to the former: he ratified the Charter of liberties, yet annulled the Provisions of Oxford; which were only calculated, as they maintained, to preserve that charter; and without which, in their estimation, they had no security for its observance.

The king and prince, finding a civil war inevitable, prepared themselves for defence; and summoning the military vassals from all quarters, and being reinforced by Baliol lord of Galloway, Brus lord of Annandale, Henry Piercy, John Comyn, and other barons of the north, they composed an army, formidable, as well from its numbers as its military prowess and experience. The first enterprize of the royalists was the attack of Northampton, which was defended by Simon de Montfort, with many of the principal barons of that party; and a breach being made in the walls by Philip Basset, the place was carried by assault, and both the governor and the garrison were made prisoners, on the 5th of April, 1264. The royalists marched thence to Leicester and Nottingham; both which places opened their gates to them. Prince Edward then proceeded with a detachment into the county of Derby, in order to ravage with fire and sword the lands of the earl of that name, and take revenge on him for his disloyalty.

The earl of Leicester, master of London, and of the counties in the south-east of England, formed the siege of Rochester, the only place that declared for the king in those parts, and which, besides earl Warrenne, the governor, was garrisoned by many noble and powerful barons of the royal party. The king and prince hastened from Nottingham, where they were then quartered, to the relief of the place; and on their approach, Leicester raised the siege, and retreated to London, which being the centre of his power, he was afraid might, in his absence, fall into the king's hands, either by force, or by a correspondence with the principal citizens, who were all secretly inclined to the royal cause. Reinforced by a great body of Londoners, and having summoned his partizans from all quarters, he thought himself strong enough to hazard a general battle with the royalists, and to determine the fate of the nation in one decisive engagement; which, if it proved successful, must be completely against the king, who had no retreat for his broken troops in those parts; while Leicester himself, in case of any sinister accident, could easily take shelter in the city. To give the better colouring to his cause, he previously sent a message with conditions of peace to Henry, submissive in the language, but exorbitant in the demands; and when the messenger returned with an answer adapted to the insolence of the proposal from the king, the prince and the king of the Romans, he sent a new message, renouncing, in the name of himself and of the associated barons, all fealty and allegiance to Henry. He then marched out of the city with his army, divided into four bodies: the first commanded by his two sons, Henry and Guy de Montfort, together with Humphrey de Bohun earl of Hereford, who had deserted to the barons; the second led by the earl of Gloucester, with William de Montchesny and John Fitz-John; the third, composed of Londoners, under the command of Nicholas de Segrave; the fourth headed by himself in person. The bishop of Chichester gave a general absolution to the army, accompanied with assurances that, if any of them should fall in the ensuing action, they would infallibly be received into heaven, as the reward of their suffering in so meritorious a cause.

The earl of Leicester, who possessed great talents for war, conducted his march with such skill and secrecy, that he had nearly surprized the royalists in their quarters at Lewes in Sussex, on the 14th of May; but the vigilance and activity of prince Edward soon repaired this negligence; and he led out the king's army to the field in three bodies. He himself conducted the van, attended by earl Warrenne and William de Valence: the main body was commanded by the king of the Romans and his son Henry: the king himself was placed in the rear at the head of his principal nobility. Prince Edward rushed upon the Londoners, who had demanded the post of honour in leading the rebel army, but who, from their ignorance of discipline and want of experience, were ill fitted to resist the veteran veteran army, of whom the prince's body was composed. They were broken in an instant; were chased off the field; and Edward transported by his martial ardour, and eager to revenge the insolence of the Londoners against his mother, he pursued them to the distance of four miles, without giving them any quarter, and without reflecting on the fate which in the mean time attended the rest of the army. The earl of Leicester, perceiving the royalists thrown into confusion by their eagerness in the pursuit, led on his remaining troops against the bodies commanded by the two royal brothers, Henry, and the king of the Romans. He defeated with great slaughter the forces headed by the king of the Romans; and that prince was obliged to yield himself prisoner to the earl of Gloucester; he then penetrated to the body where the king himself was placed, threw it into disorder, pursued his advantage, chased it into the town of Lewes, and Henry was compelled to surrender himself prisoner.

Prince Edward, returning to the field of battle from his precipitate pursuit of the Londoners, was astonished to find it strewed with the dead bodies of his friends, and still more to hear, that his father and uncle were defeated and taken prisoners, together with Arundel, Comyn, Brus, Hamond l'Estrange, Roger Leybourne, and many considerable barons of his party. Earl Warrenne, Hugh Bigod, and William de Valence, struck with despair at this event, immediately took to flight, hastened to Pevensey, and made their escape to the continent with seven hundred of their followers. But the prince, intrepid amidst the greatest disasters, exhorted his troops to revenge the death of their friends, to relieve the royal captives, and to snatch an easy conquest from an enemy disordered by their own victory. He found his followers intimidated by their situation; while Leicester, afraid of a sudden and violent blow from the prince, amused him by a feigned negociation, till he was able to recall his troops from the pursuit, and bring them into order. There now appeared no farther resource to the royal party; surrounded by the armies and garrisons of the enemy, destitute of forage and provisions, and deprived of their sovereign, as well as of their principal leaders, who could alone inspirit them to an obstinate resistance. The prince, therefore, was compelled to submit to Leicester's conditions, which were short, summary, and comprehensive; such as might naturally be expected from the unfortunate situation of the royalists. It was stipulated that prince Edward and Henry d'Allmaine, son to the king of the Romans, should surrender themselves prisoners as pledges in lieu of the two kings; that all other prisoners on both sides should be released; and that, in order to settle fully the terms of agreement, application should be made to the king of France, that he should name six Frenchmen, three prelates, and three noblemen: these six to chuse two others of their own country: and these two to chuse one Englishman, who, in conjunction with themselves, were to be invested by both parties with full powers to make what regulations they thought proper for the settlement of the kingdom. The prince and young Henry accordingly delivered themselves into Leicester's hands, who sent them under a guard to Dover castle. Such are the terms of agreement, commonly called the Mise of Louis, from an obsolete French term of that meaning: for it appears, that all the gentry and nobility of England, who valued themselves on their Norman extraction, and who disdained the language of their native country, made familiar use of the French tongue, till this period, and for some time after.

The earl of Leicester had no sooner gained his victory, and gotten the whole royal family in his power, than he openly violated every article of the treaty, and acted as sole master of the kingdom. He still detained the king in effect a prisoner, and made use of that monarch's authority for purposes the most prejudicial to his interests, and the most oppressive to his subjects. He disarmed the royalists, and kept his own partizans in a military posture: he observed the same partial conduct in the deliverance of the captives, and exclusive of those who had been taken in the battle of Lewes, he threw many of the king's adherents into prison: he carried the king from place to place, and obliged all the royal castles, on pretence of Henry's commands, to receive a governor and garrison of his own appointment: all the officers of the crown and of the household were named by him; and the whole authority, as well as arms of the state, was lodged in his hands: he instituted in the counties a new kind of magistracy, endowed with new and arbitrary powers, that of conservators of the peace. Grown wanton with success that exceeded his fondest expectations, he gave way to his favourite passions, ambition and avarice; and being wholly unrestrained either by fear or principle, he resolved to gratify them to the utmost He seized the estates of no less than eighteen barons, as his share of the spoil gained in the battle of Lewes: he engrossed to himself the ransom of all the prisoners; and told his barons, with a barefaced insolence, that it was sufficient for them, that he saved them by that victory from the forfeitures and attainders which hung over them: he even treated the earl of Gloucester in the same injurious manner, and applied to his own use the ransom of the king of the Romans, who in the field of battle had yielded himself prisoner to that nobleman. Henry, his eldest son, made a monopoly of all the wool in the kingdom, the only valuable commodity for foreign markets which it at that time produced. The inhabitants of the cinque-ports, during the present dissolution of government, practised the most licentious acts of piracy, plundering the ships of all nations, and throwing the mariners into the sea; which barbarity soon banished all merchants from the English coasts and harbours. Every foreign commodity rose to an exorbitant price: and woollen cloth, which the English had not then the art of dying, was worn by them white, and without receiving the last hand of the manufacturer. In answer to the complaints which arose on this occasion, Leicester replied, that the kingdom could well enough subsist within itself, and needed no intercourse with foreigners. And it was found, that he even combined with the pirates of the cinque-ports, and received as his share the third part of all the prizes they made.

No farther mention was made of the reference to the king of France, so essential an article in the agreement of Lewes; and Leicester summoned a parliament, entirely composed of his own partizans, in order to rivet, by their authority, that power which he had acquired by so much violence, and which he used with so much tyranny and injustice. An ordinance was there passed, to which the king's consent had been previously extorted by threats of perpetual imprisonment, that every act of royal power should be exercised by a council of nine barons, who were to be chosen and removed by a majority of three, Leicester himself, the earl of Gloucester, and the bishop of Chichester. By this intricate plan of government, the sceptre was really put into Leicester's hands; and as he had the entire direction of the bishop of Chichester, and thereby commanded all the resolutions of the council of three, who could appoint or discard at pleasure every member of the supreme council.

It was, however, impossible that things could long remain in this situation. The earl of Leicester was exposed to anxiety from every quarter; and felt that the smallest incident was capable of overturning that immense and ill-cemented fabric which he had reared. The queen, whom her husband had left on the continent, had collected an army of desperate adventurers from Germany, Burgundy, and other countries, and had assembled a great number of ships, with a view of invading the kingdom, and of bringing relief to her unfortunate family. Louis, detesting Leicester's usurpations and perjuries, and disgusted at the English barons, who had refused to submit to his award, secretly favoured all her enterprizes, and was generally believed to be making preparations for the same purpose. An English army, by the pretended authority of the captive king, was assembled on the sea-coast to oppose this projected invasion; but Leicester owed his safety more to cross winds, which long detained on the Flemish coast, and at last dispersed and ruined the queen's fleet, than to any resistance which, in their present situation, could have been expected from the English.

But Leicester was better able to resist the spiritual thunders which were levelled against him. The pope, still adhering to the king's cause against the barons, dispatched cardinal Guido as his legate into England, with orders to excommunicate, by name, the three earls, Leicester, Gloucester, and Norfolk, and all others in general, who concurred in the oppression and captivity of their sovereign. Leicester menaced the legate with instant death, if he dared to set foot within the kingdom; but Guido, meeting at Boulogne the bishops of Winchester, London, and Worcester, who had been sent thither on a negociation, commanded them, under the penalty of ecclesiastical censures, to carry his bull into England, and to publish it against the barons. When the prelates arrived off the coast, they were boarded by the piratical mariners of the Cinque-Ports, to whom it is supposed they gave a hint of the nature of the cargo which they brought along with them: the bull was torn and thrown into the sea; which furnished the prelates with a plausible excuse for not obeying the orders of the legate. Leicester then appealed from Guido to the pope in person; but, before the ambassadors appointed to defend his cause could reach Rome, the pontiff was dead; and they found the legate himself, from whom they had appealed, seated on the papal throne, by the name of Urban IV. The aspiring Leicester was not dismayed by this incident; and as he found that a great part of his popularity in England was founded on his opposition to the court of Rome, which was now become odious, he bade defiance to the spiritual thunders that were levelled against him, and persisted with the more obstinacy in the prosecution of his plans.

That he might both increase and turn to advantage his popularity, Leicester summoned a new parliament to meet at London, on the 20th of January, 1265, where he knew his power was uncontrollable; and he fixed this assembly on a more democratical basis than any which had ever been summoned since the foundation of the monarchy.

This memorable parliament merits a distinguished place in the history of England; not from the transactions that passed in it, but from the peculiar mode of assembling it; but being the first, since the days of William the First, in which the people were permitted to have any weight or influence.

Leicester summoned, by particular writs, only eleven bishops, five earls, and eighteen barons, all of his own party, to attend it; but, in order to supply the deficiency occasioned by the non-attendance of the prelates, earls, and barons of the royal party, who were not summoned, he issued writs to sixty-four abbots, thirty-seven friers, and five deans, many of whom were not immediate tenants of the crown. This singular circumstance was probably owing to the great partiality which the clergy entertained for Leicester, whom they regarded as the first champion of ecclesiastical prerogative. Writs were also sent to the different sheriffs, directing them to send from each county two knights of known discretion to attend this parliament. But what is chiefly worthy of remark is, that the citizens of different cities, and the burgesses of different boroughs, received similar notice of attendance; each city being required to send two of its citizens most renowned for their honesty and discretion, and each borough two of its burgesses most famed for their wisdom and integrity: an order of men which, in former ages, had been deemed too insignificant to enjoy a place in the grand council of the nation. Each of the Cinque Ports were likewise commanded to send two of its barons. But in what manner these new members of the parliament were chosen, whether by vote, or by the arbitrary will of the magistrates, is not known.

From this parliament the English House of Commons is generally esteemed to have derived its origin; and it is certain that prior to this period, there is no mention made by historians of any representatives sent to parliament by the boroughs. In all the general accounts given in preceding times of those assemblies, the prelates and barons, or Magnates et Nobiles, are mentioned as the constituent members; and even in the most particular narratives of parliamentary transactions, there is not throughout the whole the smallest appearance of a House of Commons. This glorious institution, when matured by the wisdom of subsequent ages, was attended with the most beneficial effects to the nation, and it tended to bring the English constitution to that superior state of excellence which distinguishes it from all other kingdoms of Europe; by giving the greater body of the people an adequate portion of influence in the council, by whose decrees they were to be governed, equally to guard themselves against the dangers of despotism, and the formidable terrors of aristocracy. From this period the feudal system, so inimical to every principle of civil liberty, began gradually to decline, though for a considerable time its declension was almost imperceptible; and both the king and the people, who had experienced its inconveniencies, though not in an equal degree, concurred in favouring this newly elected power, which evinced a greater regard to the legal prerogatives of the crown than the imperious barons, and at the same time afforded protection to the inferior orders of the state.

Leicester, having thus assembled a parliament of his own model, and trusting to the attachment of the populace of London, seized the opportunity of crushing his rivals among the powerful barons. Robert de Ferrars, earl of Derby, was accused in the king's name, seized, and committed to custody, without the form of a legal trial. John Gifford, menaced with a similar fate, fled from London, and took shelter in the borders of Wales. Even the earl of Gloucester, whose power and influence had so much contributed to the success of the barons, but who of late was extremely disgusted with Leicester's arbitrary conduct, found himself in danger from the prevailing authority of his quondam confederate; and retired from parliament. This known dissension gave courage to all Leicester's enemies and to the king's friends, who were now sure of protection from so powerful a leader. Though Roger Mortimer, Hamond L'Estrange, and other powerful marchers of Wales, had been obliged to leave the kingdom, their authority still remained over the territories subjected to their jurisdiction; and there were many others who were disposed to give disturbance to the new government. The animosities, inseparable from the feudal aristocracy, broke out with fresh violence, and threatened the kingdom with new convulsions and disorders.

The earl of Leicester, surrounded with these difficulties, embraced a measure, from which he hoped to reap some present advantages, but which proved in the end the source of all his future calamities. The active and intrepid prince Edward had languished in prison ever since the fatal battle of Lewes; and as he was extremely popular in the kingdom, there arose a general desire of seeing him again restored to liberty. Leicester finding that he could with difficulty oppose the concurring wishes of the nation, stipulated with the prince, that, in return, he should order his adherents to deliver up to the barons all their castles, particularly those on the borders of Wales; and should swear neither to depart the kingdom during three years, nor introduce into it any foreign forces. The king took an oath to the same effect, and also passed a charter, in which he confirmed the agreement or Misc of Lewes; and even permitted his subjects to rise in arms against him, if he should ever attempt to infringe it. This convention being signed and ratified, prince Edward was conveyed from Dover Castle, the place of his imprisonment, to Westminster Hall, where he was declared free by the barons on the 11th of March, and nine prelates joined in pronouncing a sentence of excommunication against all such as should be accessary to the violation of this agreement. But instead of really recovering his liberty, as he had vainly expected, he found that the whole transaction was a fraud on the part of Leicester; that he himself still continued a prisoner at large, and was guarded by the emissaries of that nobleman; and that, while the faction reaped all the benefit from the performance of his part of the treaty, care was taken that he should enjoy no advantage by it.

As the earl of Gloucester, on his rupture with the barons, had retired for safety to his estates on the borders of Wales, Leicester followed him with an army to Hereford, continued still to menace and negociate; and that he might add authority to his cause, he carried both the king and prince along with him. The earl of Gloucester here concerted with young Edward the manner of that prince's escape. He found means to convey to him a horse of extraordinary swiftness; and appointed Roger Mortimer, who had returned into the kingdom, to be ready at hand with a small party to receive the prince, and to guard him to a place of safety. Edward pretended to take the air with some of Leicester's retinue, who were his guards, on the 28th of May; and making matches between their horses, after he thought he had tired and blown them sufficiently, he suddenly mounted Gloucester's horse, and called to his attendants, that he had long enough enjoyed the pleasure of their company, and now bid them adieu. They followed him for some time, without being able to overtake him; and the appearance of Mortimer with his company put an end to their pursuit.

The royalists, secretly prepared for this event, immediately flew to arms; and the joy of this prince's deliverance, the oppressions under which the nation laboured, the expectation of a new scene of affairs, and the countenance of the earl of Gloucester, procured Edward an army which Leicester was utterly unable to withstand. This nobleman found himself in a remote quarter of the kingdom; surrounded by his enemies; barred from all communication with his friends by the Severne, whose bridges Edward had broken down; and obliged to fight the cause of his party under these multiplied disadvantages. In this extremity he wrote to his son Simon de Montfort, to hasten from London with an army for his relief; and Simon had advanced to Kenilworth with that view, where, fancying that all Edward's force and attention were directed against his father, he lay secure and unguarded. But the prince, making a sudden and forced march, surprized him in his camp, dispersed his army, and took the earl of Oxford, and many other noblemen prisoners, almost without resistance. Leicester, ignorant of his son's fate, passed the Severne in boats during Edward's absence, and lay at Evesham, in expectation of being every hour joined by his friends from London: whence the prince, who availed himself of every favourable moment, appeared in the field before him. Edward made a body of his troops advance from the road which led to Kenilworth, and ordered them to carry the banners taken from Simon's army; while he himself, making a circuit with the rest of his forces, proposed to attack the enemy on their quarter. Leicester was long deceived by this stratagem, and took one division of Edward's army for his friends; but at last, perceiving his mistake, and observing the great superiority and excellent disposition of the royalists, he exclaimed that they had learned from him the art of war; adding, "The Lord have mercy on our souls, for I see our bodies are the prince's!" The battle immediately began, though on very unequal terms. Leicester's army, by living on the mountains of Wales without bread, which was not then much used among the inhabitants, had been extremely weakened by sickness and desertion, and was soon broken by the victorious royalists; while his Welsh allies, accustomed only to a desultory kind of war, immediately took flight, and were pursued with great slaughter. Leicester himself, asking for quarter, was slain in the heat of the action, with his eldest son Henry, Hugh le Despenser, and about an hundred and sixty knights, and many other gentlemen of his party. The old king had been purposely placed by the rebels in the front of the battle; and being clad in armour, and thereby not known by his friends, he received a wound, and was in danger of his life: but crying out, "I am Henry of Winchester, your king," he was saved; and put in a place of safety by his son, who flew to his rescue (k).

Thus fell Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester, who attained to celebrity more from the confusion of the times, and the timid disposition of the reigning monarch, than from any singular abilities of his own. His character has been variously represented by different writers, but it will require only a small degree of sagacity to form a just opinion of it from his actions, which point out the violence, ingratitude, tyranny, rapacity, and treachery of the man, give a very bad idea of his moral character, and make us regard his death as the most fortunate event which in this conjuncture could have happened to the English nation: yet we must allow that he possessed great abilities, and the appearance of great virtues, who, though a stranger, could, at a time when foreigners were the most odious and the most universally decried, have acquired so extensive an interest in the kingdom, and have so nearly paved his way to the seat of royalty. His military capacity, and his political craft, were equally eminent: he possessed the talents both of governing men and conducting business; and though his ambition was boundless, it seems neither to have exceeded his courage nor his genius; and he had the happiness of making the low populace, as well as the haughty barons, co-operate towards the success of his selfish and dangerous purposes. A prince of greater abilities and vigour than Henry might have directed the talents of this nobleman either to the exaltation of his throne, or to the good of his people; but the advantages given to Leicester, by the weak and variable administration of the king, brought on the ruin of the royal authority, and produced great confusions in the kingdom, which, however, in the end preserved and improved national liberty, and the constitution. His popularity, even after his death, continued so great, that though he was excommunicated by Rome, the people believed him to be a saint; and many miracles were said to have been wrought upon his tomb.

The victory of Evesham, with the death of Leicester, proved decisive in favour of the royalists, and made an equal though an opposite impression on friends and enemies in every part of England. The king of the Romans was restored to liberty; and all the other prisoners of the royal party were released from confinement: Fitz-Richard, the seditious mayor of London, who had marked out forty of the most opulent citizens for slaughter, immediately stopped the execution of his purpose on receiving intelligence of this important event; and almost all the castles, garrisoned by the barons, hastened to make their submissions, and to open their gates to the king. The isle of Axholme alone, and that of Ely, trusting to the strength of their situation, ventured to make resistance; but were at last reduced, as well as the castle of Dover, by the valour and activity of prince Edward. Adam de Gourdon, a courageous baron, maintained himself during some time in the forests of Hampshire, committed depredations in the neighbourhood, and obliged the prince to lead a body of troops into that part of the country against him. Edward attacked the camp of the rebels, and being transported by the ardour of battle, leaped over the trench with a few followers, and encountered Gourdon in single combat. The victory was long disputed between these valiant combatants; but ended at last in the prince's favour, who wounded his antagonist, threw him from his horse, and took him prisoner. He not only gave him his life; but introduced him on the same night to the queen at Guildford, procured him his pardon, restored him to his estate, received him into favour, and was faithfully served by him the remainder of his days.

A complete victory of the sovereign over so extensive a rebellion frequently produces a revolution of government, and strengthens, as well as enlarges for some time the prerogatives of the crown: yet no sacrifices of national liberty were made on this occasion; the Great Charter remained still inviolate; and the king, sensible that his own barons, by whose assistance alone he had prevailed, were no less jealous of their independence than the other party, seems thenceforth to have carefully abstained from all those exertions of power which had afforded so plausible a pretence to the rebels. The clemency of this victory is also remarkable: no blood was shed on the scaffold: no attainders, except of the Montfort family, were carried into execution: and though a parliament assembled at Winchester attainted all those who had borne arms against the king, easy compositions were made with them for their lands; and the highest sum levied on the most noxious offenders did not exceed five years rent of their estate. Even the earl of Derby, who again rebelled, after having been pardoned and restored to his fortune, was obliged to pay only seven years rent, and was a second time restored. The mild disposition of the king, and the prudence of the prince, tempered the insolence of victory, and gradually restored order to the several members of the state, disjointed by so long a continuance of civil wars and commotions.

The city of London, which had been most violent against the king, and which seemed determined to stand upon its defence after almost all the kingdom had submitted, was restored to most of its liberties and privileges; and Fitz-Richard the mayor was only punished by fine and imprisonment. The countess of Leicester, the king's sister, who had been very forward in all attacks on the royal family, was dismissed the kingdom, with her two sons, Simon and Guy, who carried their hatred to the royal family so far, that five years afterwards, they assassinated, at Viterbo in Italy, their cousin Henry d'Allmaine, who at that very time was endeavouring to make their peace with the king; and by taking sanctuary in the church of the Franciscans, they escaped the punishment due to so great an enormity.

The merits of the earl of Gloucester, after he returned to his allegiance, had been so great in restoring the prince to his liberty, and assisting him in his victories against the rebellious barons, that he thought no honours nor rewards were adequate to requite them; it was almost impossible to content him in his demands; and his youth and temerity, as well as his great power, tempted him, under pretence that the king had not fulfilled the promises he had made to his followers before the battle of Evesham, he resolved to raise again the flames of rebellion in the kingdom.

The first symptom of his discontent was a refusal to attend a parliament that was assembled at St. Edmundsbury, on the 10th of February, 1267, to which he had been summoned. The messengers sent to him by the king found him employed in levying troops; but he gave them the most solemn assurances that they were only designed to act against Mortimer, who was his personal enemy: he even delivered to them a declaration, signed and sealed, that he would never bear arms against his sovereign. Notwithstanding standing these promises, he took an opportunity, while the king was employed in reducing the Isle of Ely, and the prince was engaged in the north, to march to London, where the mutinous populace, at his instigation, took to arms; and the prince was obliged to levy an army of thirty thousand men, in order to suppress them. Even this second rebellion did not provoke the king to any act of cruelty; and the earl of Gloucester himself escaped with total impunity. He was only required to enter into a bond of twenty thousand marks that he should never again be guilty of rebellion: a proof of the dangerous independence of the barons in those ages! These powerful nobles were, from the danger of the precedents, averse to the execution of the laws of forfeiture and felony against any of their brethren; though they should not refuse to concur in obliging them to fulfil any voluntary contract and engagement into which they had entered.

Having reduced his English subjects to obedience, the king resolved to chastise the Welsh, who had always supported the rebels with succours during the late commotions. For this purpose he advanced with his army to Shrewsbury; and Llewellyn, unable to contend with so powerful a force, was under the necessity of suing for peace, which was granted him on the following conditions: That the conquered lands should be restored on both sides, and the customs of the Marches preserved; that Llewellyn and his heirs should bear the title of Prince of Wales, and all the Welsh barons should do him homage, and swear him fealty; but that he and his successors should hold the principality as a fief of the English crown; and that, for this concession, he should pay to the king the sum of twenty-five thousand marks.

The troubles of the kingdom being thus appeased, Henry convoked a parliament at Northampton, in the month of April, 1268; in which Ottoboni the pope's legate, declared that the sovereign pontiff had determined to publish a crusade through all Christendom; and he therefore exhorted the English to contribute, by their riches and personal attendance, to the success of an expedition undertaken for the glory of God and the advantage of Holy Church. As the flames of civil discord were now totally extinguished, prince Edward, seduced by his thirst for glory, and by the prejudices of the age, as well as by the earnest solicitations of the king of France, resolved to assume the cross; and accordingly received it from the hands of the legate. His example was followed by the earls of Warwick and Pembroke, and upwards of one hundred and twenty knights, besides an inferior number of inferior rank, whom the late civil wars had inured to military toil.

While preparations were making for this holy expedition, another parliament was held at Marlborough, in which several laws were enacted, which are well known by the name of The Statutes of Marlborough. Among other salutary regulations, it was decreed, that all appeals from the courts of inferior lords should be carried directly to the king's courts, without passing through the courts of the lords immediately superior. It was also ordered, that money should bear no interest during the minority of the debtor. This law was reasonable, as the estates of minors were always in the hands of their lords; and the debtors could not possibly pay interest where they had no revenue. The charter of king John had first granted this indulgence, which was omitted in that granted by Henry at the commencement of his reign, and was not renewed till now. Most of the other articles contained in these statutes are calculated to restrain the oppressions of sheriffs, and the violence and indignities committed in distraining cattle and other personal property.

The itinerant judges, who had been restrained from discharging the duties of their office during the late commotions, began about this period to resume the practice of going the circuits, in order to settle the administration of justice in the different counties.

Charles Count of Anjou, was by this time seated on the throne of Sicily, after a victory obtained over young Conradin, whom he cruelly put to death; and, as the king of Tunis had paid an annual tribute to the emperor, Frederic II. Charles pretended that the right devolved to him, as king of the Two Sicilies: he therefore demanded the tribute; and, the Moorish monarch having scornfully refused to comply with his request, he persuaded his brother, the king of France, to invade his dominions; alledging, that an expedition against the Saracens of Barbary would prove as acceptable to God as a new crusade against the infidels of Palestine, where he had already met with such bad success. Louis, whose superstitious zeal enabled him to bear with patience the horrors of captivity, which he had already experienced, and was sufficiently strong to overbalance every consideration of policy, and every dictate of common sense, consented to join the troops of his brother in making a descent on the coast of Africa, and was very desirous of engaging prince Edward in the same enterprize. With this view he invited him to his court, where he communicated the scheme, and secured his association with a loan of thirty thousand marks; in consequence of which the plan of the expedition was finally adjusted, and the execution of it fixed for the middle of August in the ensuing year. Accordingly preparations were made for the prince's departure; and he previously took every possible precaution to settle the state in such a manner as to dread no bad effects from his absence. As the extensive power and known turbulence of the earl of Gloucester inspired him with apprehensions, he insisted on taking him along with him, in consequence of a vow which that nobleman had made to resume the cross and repair to Palestine. In the mean time, he compelled him to resign some of his castles, and to enter into a bond not to disturb the peace of the kingdom.

When these necessary arrangements were completed, he sailed with his army from Portsmouth, in the month of May, 1270, and arrived in Louis's camp before Tunis in Africa, where he found that monarch already dead, from an epidemical dysentery, that had likewise destroyed a great number of his troops. The great, if not only weakness of this prince in his government, was his imprudent passion for crusades; but it was his zeal chiefly that procured him from the clergy the title of St. Louis, by which he is known in the French history; and if that appellation had not been so extremely prostitute as to become rather a term of reproach, he seems, by his uniform probity and goodness, as well as his piety, to have fully merited the title; for he was one of the most virtuous sovereigns that ever filled the Gallic throne. He was succeeded by his son Philip, denominated the Hardy: a prince of some merit, though much inferior to that of his father.

Not discouraged by this event, Prince Edward continued his voyage to the Holy Land, where he signalized himself by acts of valour; revived the glory of the English name in those parts; and struck such terror into the Saracens, that they employed an assassin to murder him, who wounded him in the arm, but perished in the attempt (l). Meanwhile, his absence from England was attended with many of those pernicious consequences which had been dreaded from it. The laws were not executed: the barons oppressed the common people with impunity: they gave shelter on their estates to bands of robbers, whom they employed in committing ravages on the estates of their enemies: the populace of London, no longer awed by the fear of punishment, returned to their usual licentiousness; and the old king, unequal to the burthen of public affairs, sent letters to his son, requesting him to return immediately, and to assist him in swaying that sceptre which was ready to drop from his feeble and irresolute hands

A serious riot took place at the city of Norwich, in which a church and a convent were burnt by the mob, claimed the king's particular attention, and he repaired to St. Edmundsbury, where he convoked a parliament, to concert measures for bringing the rioters to justice. He then, pursuant to the advice of his prelates and nobles, went to Norwich in person, deprived the city of its liberties, and caused thirty of the principal insurgents to be put to death. On his return to St. Edmundsbury, he was seized with the disorder which put a period to his existence. Having been conveyed by easy journies from thence to Westminster, he there expired, on the 16th of November, 1272, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, and fifty-seventh of his reign.

(l). The ruffian was furnished with letters from the governor of Joppa, containing proposals for an accommodation; by which means he obtained admittance to Edward, who conversed with him freely, at different times, in the French language, which the infidel understood. Having thus secured free egress and regress, he entered the prince's apartment on a summer's afternoon; and, the weather being extremely hot, found him sitting, in a loose garment, on his bed side. Nobody being present, he judged this a proper opportunity for the execution of his infamous project; and, drawing a dagger from his bosom, aimed a blow at the prince's heart. The prince, in parrying the stroke, received a deep wound in his arm; and perceiving the infidel about to repeat his blow, he wrested the weapon from his hand, and plunged it in his bosom.

His

His brother, the king of the Romans, (for he never attained the title of emperor,) died about seven months before him.

The most obvious circumstance of Henry's character is, his incapacity for government, which rendered him as much a prisoner in the hands of his own ministers and favourites, and as little at his own disposal, as when detained a captive in the hands of his enemies. From this source rather, than from insincerity or treachery, arose his negligence in observing his promises; and he was too easily induced, for the sake of present convenience, to sacrifice the lasting advantages arising from the trust and confidence of his people. Hence too were derived his profusion to favourites, his attachment to strangers, the variableness of his conduct, his hasty resentments, and his sudden forgiveness and return of affection. Instead of reducing the dangerous power of his nobles, by obliging them to observe the laws towards their inferiors, and setting them the salutary example in his own government; he was seduced to imitate their conduct, and to make his arbitrary will, or rather that of his ministers, the rule of his actions. Instead of accommodating himself, by a strict frugality, to the embarrassed situation in which his revenue had been left, by the military expeditions of his uncle, the dissipations of his father, and the usurpations of the barons; he was tempted to levy money by irregular exactions, which, without enriching himself, impoverished, at least disgusted, his people. Of all men nature seemed least to have fitted him for being a tyrant; yet are there instances of oppression in his reign which, though derived from the precedents left him by his predecessors, had been carefully guarded against by the Great Charter, and are inconsistent with all rules of good government. And on the whole we may say, that greater abilities with his good dispositions, would have prevented him from falling into his faults; or, with worse dispositions, would have enabled him to maintain and defend them.

This prince was noted for his piety and devotion, and his regular attendance on public worship; and a saying of his on that head is much celebrated by ancient writers. He was engaged in a dispute with Louis IX. of France, concerning the preference between sermons and masses: he maintained the superiority of the latter, and affirmed that he would rather have one hour's conversation with a friend, than hear twenty of the most elaborate discourses pronounced in his praise.

As to his violations of the most sacred oaths and promises, at the same time that we bestow on them that just condemnation which every deviation from veracity, even the most trivial, should incur, we cannot but recollect that he was absolved from the observance of those engagements by a power which the superstitious maxims of the age taught him, in spiritual concerns, to regard as supreme.

Though his reign was almost one continued scene of turbulence and confusion, Henry found leisure and opportunity to afford great encouragement to the arts; and, notwithstanding the numerous drawbacks on his revenues, expended considerable sums in accelerating their progress. His generosity as a friend, his fidelity as a husband, and his affection as a parent, likewise entitled him to a great share of commendation.

In short, from an attentive review of the life and conduct of this monarch, we are induced to believe that his vices were chiefly owing to his situation; and that he was endued with such qualities as, in a private sphere of life, might have ensured him respect and esteem.

Henry left two sons, Edward his successor, and Edmund earl of Lancaster; and two daughters, Margaret queen of Scotland, and Beatrix duchess of Bretagne. He had five other children, who died in their infancy.

The following are the most remarkable laws enacted during this reign. There had been great disputes between the civil and ecclesiastical courts concerning bastardy, but this controversy was finally settled by one of the Statutes of Merton, passed in the year 1236. The common law had deemed all those to be bastards who were born before wedlock: by the canon law they were legitimate: and when any dispute of inheritance arose, it had formerly been usual for the civil courts to issue writs to the spiritual, directing them to inquire into the legitimacy of the person. The bishop always returned an answer agreeable to the canon law, though contrary to the municiple law of the kingdom. For this reason the civil courts had changed the terms of their writ; and instead of requiring the spiritual courts to make inquisition concerning the legitimacy of the person, they only proposed the simple question of fact, whether he were born before or after wedlock? The prelates complained of this practice to the parliament assembled at Merton, and desired that the municiple law might be rendered conformable to the canon law: but received from all the nobility the memorable reply, "Nolumus leges Anglæ mutare," that is, "We will not change the laws of England."

In the thirty-fifth year of Henry the Third's reign an assize was fixed of bread, the price of which was settled, according to the different prices of corn, from one shilling a quarter to seven shillings and six-pence, money of that age; yet did the prices often rise much higher than any taken notice of by the statute. The Chronicle of Dunstable tells us, that in this reign (anno 1258) wheat was sold for a mark, nay, for a pound a quarter; that is, three pounds of our present money. The same law affords us a proof of the little communication between the parts of the kingdom, from the very different prices which the same commodity bore at the same time. A brewer, says the statute, may sell two gallons of ale for a penny in cities, and three or four gallons for the same price in the country. The Chronicle above-mentioned observes, that wheat one year was sold in many places for eight shillings a quarter, but never rose in Dunstable above a crown.

Though commerce was still very low, it seems rather to have increased since the reign of William the First; at least if we may judge of the increase of money by the price of corn. The medium between the highest and lowest prices of wheat assigned by the statute is four shillings and three-pence a quarter, that is, says Hume, twelve shillings and nine-pence of our present money. Yet the middling price of cattle, so late as the reign of king Richard, we find to be above eight, near ten times lower than the present. It is to be remarked, that Henry's assize of corn was copied from a preceding assize established by king John: consequently the prizes which we have here compared of corn and cattle may be looked on as contemporary; and they were drawn, not from one particular year, but from an estimation of the middling prices for a series of years.

Interest had in that age amounted to an enormous height. Instances occur of fifty per cent. paid for money. There is an edict of Philip Augustus near this period, limiting the Jews in France to forty-eight per cent. Such profits tempted the Jews to remain in the kingdom, notwithstanding the grievous oppressions to which, from the prevalent bigotry and rapine of the times, they were continually exposed. It is easy to imagine how precarious their state must have been under an indignant prince, somewhat restrained in his tyranny over his native subjects, but who possessed an unlimited authority over the Jews, the sole proprietors of money in the kingdom, and hated, on account of their riches, their religion, and their usury: yet will our ideas scarcely come up to the extortions which, in fact, we find to have been practised upon them. In the year 1241, twenty thousand marks were exacted from them: two years after money was again extorted; and one Jew alone, Aaron of York, was obliged to pay above four thousand marks: in 1250, Henry renewed his oppressions; and the same Aaron was condemned to pay him thirty thousand marks upon an accusation of forgery: the high penalty imposed upon him, and which, it seems, he was thought able to pay, is rather a presumption of his innocence than of his guilt. In 1255, the king demanded eight thousand marks from the Jews, and threatened to hang them if they refused compliance. They now lost all patience, and desired leave to retire with their effects out of the kingdom. But the king replied: "How can I remedy the oppressions you complain of? I am myself a beggar. I am despoiled, I am stripped of all my revenues: I owe above twenty thousand marks; nay, if I had said thirty thousand, I should not exceed the truth: I am obliged to pay my son prince Edward fifteeen thousand marks a year; I have not a farthing; and I must have money, from any hand, from any quarter, or by any means." He then delivered over the Jews to the earl of Cornwall, that, as Matthew Paris shrewdly observes, "those whom the one brother had flayed, the other might embowel." King John, his father, once demanded ten thousand marks from a Jew of Bristol; and on his refusal, ordered one of his teeth to be drawn every day till he should comply. The Jew lost seven teeth, and then

then paid the sum required of him. One talliage laid upon the Jews in 1243 amounted to sixty thousand marks; a sum equal to the whole yearly revenue of the crown.

To give a better pretence for extortions, the Jews were accused with having crucified a child in derision of the sufferings of Christ. Eighteen of them were hanged at once for this crime; though it was no wise credible, that even the antipathy borne them by the Christians, and the oppressions under which they laboured, would ever have pushed them to be guilty of that dangerous enormity. But it is natural to imagine, that a race, exposed to such insults and indignities, both from king and people, and who had so uncertain an enjoyment of their riches, would carry usury to the utmost extremity, and by their great profits make themselves some compensation for their continual perils. Though these acts of violence against the Jews proceeded much from bigotry, they were still more derived from avidity and rapine. So far from desiring in that age to convert them, it was enacted by law in France, that, if any Jew embraced Christianity, he forfeited all his goods, without exception, to the king or his superior lord. These plunderers were careful, lest the profits accruing from their dominion over that unhappy race should be diminished by their conversion.

Commerce must indeed be in a wretched condition, where interest was so high, and where the sole proprietors of money employed it in usury only, and were exposed to such extortion and injustice. But the bad police of the country was another obstacle to improvement; and rendered all communication dangerous, and all property precarious. The Chronicle of Dunstable says, that men were never secure in their houses, and that whole villages were often plundered by bands of robbers, though no civil wars at that time prevailed in the kingdom. In 1249, some years before the insurrection of the barons, two merchants of Brabant came to the king at Winchester, and told him, that they had been spoiled of all their goods by certain robbers, whom they knew, because they saw their faces every day in his court; that like practices prevailed all over England, and travellers were continually exposed to the danger of being robbed, maimed, and murdered; that these crimes escaped with impunity, because the ministers of justice themselves were in a confederacy with the robbers; and that they, for their part, instead of bringing matters to a fruitless trial by law, were willing, though merchants, to decide their cause with the robbers by arms and a duel. The king, provoked by these abuses, ordered a jury to be inclosed, and to try the robbers: the jury, though consisting of twelve men of property in Hampshire, were found to be also in a confederacy with the felons, and acquitted them. Henry, in a rage, committed the jury to prison, threatened them with severe punishment, and ordered a new jury to be inclosed, who, dreading the fate of their fellows, at last found a verdict against the criminals. Many of the king's own household were discovered to have participated in the guilt; and they said, for their excuse, that they received no wages from him, and were obliged to rob for a subsistence. "Knights and esquires," says the Dictum of Kenelworth, "who were robbers, if they have no land, shall pay the half of their goods, and find sufficient security to keep in future the peace of the kingdom." Such were the manners of the times!

The trial by ordeal was abolished in this reign by order of council: a faint mark of improvement in the age.

Henry granted a charter to the town of Newcastle, in which he gave a licence to the inhabitants to dig coal. This is the first mention of coal in England.

We learn from Madox, that this king gave at one time one hundred shillings to master Henry, his poet: also the same year he ordered this poet ten pounds.

It appears from Selden, that in the forty-seventh of this reign, a hundred and fifty temporal, and fifty spiritual barons were summoned to perform the service due by their tenures. In the thirty-fifth of the subsequent reign, eighty-six temporal barons, twenty bishops, and forty-eight abbots, were summoned to a parliament convened at Carlisle.

CHAP. V.

EDWARD I.

THE death of almost every king of England since the Conquest had been attended with commotions, and the council, reflecting on the recent civil wars, and the animosities which naturally remain after these great convulsions, apprehended dangerous consequences from the absence of prince Edward, successor of Henry. They therefore hastened to proclaim him, to swear allegiance to him, and to summon the states of the kingdom, in order to provide for the public peace in this important conjuncture. Walter Giffard, archbishop of York, the earl of Cornwall, son of Richard king of the Romans, and the earl of Gloucester, were appointed guardians of the realm. At a subsequent meeting of the parliament in January, 1273, this choice was confirmed; and those nobles proceeded peaceably to the exercise of their authority, without either meeting with opposition from any of the people, or being disturbed with emulation and faction among themselves. The high character acquired by Edward during the commotions of his father's reign, his military genius, his success in subduing the rebels, his moderation in settling the kingdom, had procured him great esteem, mixed with affection, among all orders of men; and no one could reasonably entertain hopes of making any advantage of his absence, or of raising disturbance in the nation. The earl of Gloucester himself, whose great power and turbulent spirit had excited most jealousy, was forward to give proofs of his allegiance: and the other malcontents, being destitute of a leader, were obliged, however reluctant, to remain quiet and submissive.

Prince Edward, after having signalized himself in the Holy Land, and concluded a truce with the sultan of Babylon for ten years, ten weeks, and ten days, sailed for England. He had reached Sicily when he received intelligence of his father's death: and discovered a deep concern on the occasion. At the same time he learned the death of an infant son, John, whom his princess, Eleanor of Castile, had borne him at Acre in Palestine; and as he appeared much less affected with that misfortune, the king of Sicily expressed a surprize at this difference of sentiment; but was told by Edward, that the death of a son was a loss which he might hope to repair; the death of a father was a loss irreparable.

As soon as he was acquainted with the quiet settlement of the kingdom, Edward was in no hurry to take possession of the throne. On the frontiers of Savoy he was met by several English nobles and prelates; and his queen, having left him at Lyons, repaired to Gascony, where she was soon delivered of a son, who was named Alphonso. He spent near a year in France, before he made his appearance in England. In his passage by Chalons in Burgundy, he was challenged by the prince of the country to a tournament which he was preparing; and as Edward excelled in those martial and dangerous exercises, the true image of war, he declined not the opportunity of acquiring honour in that great assembly of the neighbouring nobles. The English monarch and his knights obtained the honour of the day, and the image of war was here unfortunately turned into the thing itself. The French knights, provoked at the superiority of the English made a serious attack upon them, which was repulsed, and much blood was idly shed in the quarrel. This rencontre received the name of The petty Battle of Chalons.

From Chalons Edward went to Paris, and did homage to Philip for the dominions which he held in France. He thence returned to Guienne, in 1274, and settled that province, which was in some confusion. He made his journey to London through France, landing at Dover on the 2nd of August; in his passage he accommodated at Montreuil a difference with Margaret countess of Flanders, heiress of that territory; he was received with joyful acclamations by his people, and was solemnly crowned at Westminster, by Robert archbishop of Canterbury, on the 19th of August.

The king immediately applied himself to the re-establishment of his kingdom, and to the correcting of those disorders which the civil commotions and the loose administration of his father had introduced into every part of government. The plan of his policy was equally generous and prudent. He considered the great barons both as the immediate rivals of the crown, and oppressors of the people; and he purposed by an exact distribution of justice, and a rigid execution of the laws, to give at once protection to the inferior orders of the state, and to diminish the arbitrary power of the great, on which their dangerous authority was chiefly founded. Making it a rule in his own conduct to observe, except on extraordinary occasions, the privileges secured to them by the Great Charter, he acquired a right to insist upon their observance of the same charter towards their vassals and inferiors; and he made the crown be regarded by all the gentry and commonalty of the kingdom, as the fountain of justice, and the general asylum against oppression. Besides enacting several useful statutes, in a parliament which he summoned at Westminster, on the 16th of February, 1275, he inspected the conduct of all his magistrates and judges, and displaced such as were either negligent or corrupt: he provided them with sufficient force for the execution of justice; he extirpated all bands and confederacies of robbers, and he repressed those more silent robberies which were committed either by the power of the nobles, or under the countenance of public authority. By this rigid administration, the face of affairs was soon changed; and order and justice took place of violence and oppression: but amidst the excellent institutions and public-spirited plans of Edward, there still appears somewhat both of the severity of his personal character, and of the prejudices of the age.

As the various kinds of malefactors, the murderers, robbers, incendiaries, ravishers, and plunderers, had become so numerous and powerful, that the ordinary ministers of justice, especially in the western counties, were afraid to execute the laws against them, the king provided an extraordinary remedy for the evil; and he erected a new tribunal which would have been deemed, in times of more regular liberty, a great stretch of arbitrary power. It consisted of commissioners, who were empowered to inquire into disorders and crimes of all kinds, and to inflict the proper punishments upon the delinquents. The officers, charged with this unusual commission, made their circuits through the counties of England most infested with this evil, and carried terror into all those parts of the kingdom. In their zeal to punish crimes, they did not sufficiently distinguish between the innocent and guilty; the smallest suspicion became a ground of accusation and trial; the slightest evidence was received against criminals; prisons were crowded with malefactors, real or pretended; severe fines were levied for small offences; and the king, though his exhausted exchequer was supplied by this expedient, found it necessary to stop this course of rigour, and after terrifying and dissipating, by this tribunal, the gangs of disorderly people in England, he prudently annulled the commission.

The adulteration of the coin was loudly complained of, and as this crime required more art than the English of that age, who chiefly employed force and violence in their iniquities, were possessed of, the imputation fell upon the Jews. Edward also seems to have indulged a strong prepossession against that people; and this ill-judged zeal for Christianity being naturally augmented by an expedition to the Holy Land, he let loose the whole rigour of his justice against that unhappy race. Two hundred and eighty of them were hanged at once for this crime in London alone, besides those who suffered in other parts of the nation. The houses and lands, (for the Jews had of late ventured to make purchases of that kind,) as well as the goods of great multitudes, were sold and confiscated to the use of the king, who, lest it should be suspected that the riches of the sufferers were the chief part of their guilt, ordered a moiety of the money raised by these confiscations to be set apart and bestowed upon such as were willing to be converted to Christianity. But resentment was more prevalent with them than any temptation from their poverty; and very few of them could be induced by interest to embrace the religion of their persecutors. The miseries of this people did not here terminate. Though the arbitrary talliages and executions levied upon them had yielded a constant and considerable revenue to the crown; Edward resolved some time after, about 1290, to purge the kingdom of that hated race, and to seize to himself their whole property as the reward of his labour. He left them only money sufficient to bear their charges into foreign countries, where new persecutions and extortions awaited them: but the inhabitants of the Cinque Ports, imitating the avidity of their sovereign, despoiled most of them of this small pittance and even threw many of them into the sea: a crime for which the king, who was determined to be sole plunderer in his dominions, inflicted a capital punishment upon them. No less than fifteen thousand Jews were at this time robbed of their effects, and banished the kingdom. As it is impossible for a nation to subsist without lenders of money, the practice of usury was thenceforth exercised by the English themselves upon their fellow-citizens, or by Lombards and other foreigners.

The great poverty of the crown, was probably the cause of this egregious tyranny exercised against the Jews; but Edward also practised other more honourable means of replenishing his exhausted treasury. He employed a strict frugality in the management and distribution of his revenue: he engaged the parliament to vote him a fifteenth of all moveables; the pope to grant him the tenth of all ecclesiastical revenues for three years; and the merchants to consent to a perpetual imposition of half a mark on every sack of wool exported, and a mark on every three hundred skins. He also issued commissions to inquire into all encroachments on the royal demesnes; into the value of escheats, forfeitures, and wardships; and into the means of repairing or improving every branch of the revenue. The commissioners, in the execution of their office, began to carry matters too far against the nobility, and to question titles to estates which had been transmitted from father to son for several generations. Earl Warrenne, who had done such eminent service in the late reign, being required to show his titles, drew an old rusty sword from its scabbard; and subjoined that William the Bastard had not conquered the kingdom for himself alone: "This," said he, "is the instrument by which my ancestors gained their estates, and by which I am resolved to preserve them while I have life." This bold declaration being reported to Edward, he became sensible of the danger of proceeding in the investigation, and prudently annulled the commission.

Edward's active spirit could not long remain without employment. He soon after, in the year 1276, undertook an enterprize more prudent for himself, and more advantageous to his people. Llewellyn, prince of Wales, had been deeply engaged with the Montfort faction; had entered into their conspiracies against the crown; had frequently fought on their side; and till the battle of Evesham, so fatal to that party, had employed every expedient to depress the royal cause, and promote the success of the barons. In the general accommodation made with the vanquished, Llewellyn had also obtained his pardon; but as he was the most powerful, and therefore the most hateful vassal of the crown, he became anxious about his situation, and dreaded the future effects of the resentment and jealousy of Edward. For this reason, he determined to provide for his security by maintaining a secret correspondence with his former associates; and made his addresses to a daughter of the earl of Leicester, who was sent to him from beyond sea, but, being intercepted in her passage near the isles of Sicily, was detained in the court of England. This incident increasing the jealousy between Edward, and Llewellyn, the latter, when required to come to England, and do homage to the new king, scrupled to put himself in the hands of an enemy, desired a safe conduct from Edward, insisted upon having the king's son and other noblemen delivered to him as hostages, and demanded that his consort should previously be set at liberty. The king, having now brought the state to a full settlement, was not displeased with this occasion of exercising his authority, and subduing entirely the principality of Wales. He refused all Llewellyn's demands, except that of a safe-conduct; sent him repeated summons to perform the duty of a vassal; levied an army to reduce him to obedience; obtained a new aid of a fifteenth from parliament; and marched out with certain assurance of success against the enemy, in 1277. Besides the great disproportion of force between the kingdom and the principality, the circumstances of the two states were entirely reversed; and the same intestine dissensions which had formerly weakened England, now prevailed in Wales, and had even taken place in the reigning family. David and Roderic, brothers to Llewellyn, dispossessed of their inheritance by that prince, had been obliged to have recourse to the protection of Edward, and they seconded with all their interest, which was extensive, his attempts to enslave their native country. The Welch prince had no resource but in the inaccessible situation of his mountains, which had hitherto through many ages defended his forefathers against all attempts of the Saxon and Norman conquerors; and retiring among the hills of Snowden, resolved to defend himself to the last extremity. But Edward, equally vigorous and cautious, entering by the north with a formidable army, pierced into the heart of the country; and having carefully explored every road before him, and secured every pass behind him, approached the Welsh army in its last retreat. He here avoided the putting to trial the valour of a nation proud of its ancient independence, and, inflamed with animosity against its hereditary enemies, he trusted to the slow but sure effects of famine for reducing that people to subjection. The rude and simple manners of the natives, as well as the mountainous situation situation of their country, had made them entirely neglect tillage, and trust to pasturage for their subsistence. Destitute of magazines, cooped up in a narrow corner, they, as well as their cattle, suffered all the rigours of famine; and Llewellyn, without being able to strike a blow for his independence, was at last obliged to submit at discretion, and receive the terms imposed upon him by the victor. He bound himself, on the 19th of November, to pay to Edward fifty thousand pounds, as a reparation of damages; to do homage to the crown of England; to permit all the other barons of Wales, except four near Snowden, to swear fealty to the same crown; to relinquish the country between Cheshire and the river Conway; to settle on his brother Roderic a thousand marks a year, and on David five hundred; and to deliver ten hostages as a security for his future submission.

Edward, on the performance of the other articles, remitted to the prince of Wales the payment of the fifty thousand pounds, which were stipulated by treaty, and which it is probable the poverty of the country made it absolutely impossible for him to levy. But notwithstanding this indulgence, complaints of iniquities soon arose on the side of the vanquished: the English, insolent on their easy and bloodless victory, oppressed the inhabitants of the districts which were yielded to them: the lords marchers committed all kinds of violence on their Welsh neighbours: new and more severe terms were imposed on Llewellyn himself; and Edward, when the prince attended him at Worcester, exacted a promise that he would retain no person in his principality who should be hateful to the English monarchy. There were other personal insults which raised the indignation of the Welsh, and made them determine rather to encounter a force which they had already experienced to be so much superior, than to bear oppression from the haughty victors. Prince David, seized with the national spirit, made peace with his brother, and promised to concur in the defence of public liberty. The Welsh flew to arms; and Edward, not displeased with the occasion of making his conquest final and absolute, assembled his military tenants, and advanced into Wales with an army which the inhabitants could not reasonably hope to resist. The situation of the country gave the Welsh at first some advantage over Luke de Tany, one of Edward's captains, who had passed the Menau with a detachment: but Llewellyn being surprized by Mortimer, was defeated and slain in an action, on the 11th of December, 1282, and two thousand of his followers were put to the sword. This memorable action was fought at Llanfair in Buelt. David, who succeeded him in the principality, could never collect an army sufficient to face the English; and being chased from hill to hill, and hunted from one retreat to another, was obliged to conceal himself under various disguises, and was at length betrayed to Edward, who sent him in chains to Shrewsbury; and bringing him to a formal trial before the peers of England, ordered this sovereign prince to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, as a traitor, for defending by arms the liberties of his native country, together with his own hereditary authority (m). All the Welsh nobility submitted to the conqueror; the laws of England, with the sheriffs and other ministers of justice, were established in that principality; and though it was long before national antipathies were extinguished, and a thorough union attained between the people; yet this important conquest, which it had required eight hundred years fully to effect, was at last, through the abilities of Edward, completed by the English.

A parliament was held at Acton Burnel in Shropshire, in October, 1283, wherein the laity granted a thirteenth, and the clergy a twentieth, part of their goods, to defray the expences of the war with Wales: and here also was enacted the law known by the name of the Statute of Acton Burnel, which enabled merchants to recover their debts, by recognizances, in the three great cities of London, York, and Bristol; but the ordinances for the incorporation of Wales with England were made at Ruddlan, where Edward had resided during the whole time of his expedition. He divided North Wales into counties; and appointed sheriffs and other officers for the due administration of justice, in the same manner as in England: but it was decreed that the Welsh should not be sued for debts and trespasses, except in their own country. He erected Ruddlan, Caernarvon, Aberystwith, and other towns, into corporations, and endowed them with particular privileges for the encouragement of trade, and for the purpose of alluring the natives from their mountains into a more sociable way of life, that, by tasting the sweets of industry, their attention might be diverted from the more dangerous objects of war and rebellion. He published a proclamation, offering peace and security to all such as would place themselves under his protection, and he left them in possession of the same lands and liberties which they had enjoyed under the government of their own princes: but he deviated from these principles of justice in his conduct to the British Bards, whom he treated with unexampled cruelty. From an idea that their traditional poetry, reciting the glorious deeds of their ancestors, animated by the music of their harps, tended to preserve the spirit of their countrymen, and to make a strong impression on the minds of their youth, he collected them together; and, from a policy which reflects disgrace on his memory, commanded them all to be put to death.

Notwithstanding this variety of precautions, he could not properly reconcile the Welsh to his government. The idea of paying obedience to a foreigner, and witnessing the abolition of their ancient laws and customs in favour of new regulations which they could not understand, and which were imposed on them by a people who were the objects of their detestation, inspired their minds with a disgust that could not easily be removed. In order, however, to conciliate their affections, we are told, that Edward promised to give them a prince of unexceptionable manners, a Welshman by birth, and one who could speak no other language. On their acclamations of joy, and promise of obedience, he invested in the principality his second son Edward, then an infant, who had been born at Caernarvon. The death of his eldest son Alphonso soon after made young Edward heir of the monarchy: the principality of Wales was fully annexed to the crown; and henceforth gives a title to the eldest son of the kings of England.

The settlement of Wales appeared so complete to Edward, that in less than two years after he set sail for France on the 24th of June, 1286, in order to make peace between Alphonso king of Arragon, and Philip the Fair, who had lately succeeded his father Philip III. on the throne of France. The difference between these two princes had arisen about the kingdom of Sicily, which the pope, after his hopes from England failed of success, had bestowed on Charles, brother to St. Louis, and which was claimed upon other titles by Peter king of Arragon, father to Alphonso. Edward had powers from both princes to settle the terms of peace, and he succeeded in his endeavours; but as the controversy nowise regards England, we shall not enter into a detail of it. He stayed abroad above three years; and on his return, August 12, 1289, found many disorders to have prevailed, both from open violence, and from the corruption of justice.

Thomas Chamberlain, a gentleman of good family, but of desperate fortune, had assembled several of his profligate associates at Boston in Lincolnshire, under pretence of holding a tournament, an exercise practised by the gentry only; but in reality with a view of plundering the rich fair that was held at that town, and robbing the merchants. To facilitate his purpose, he privately set fire to the town; and while the inhabitants were employed in quenching the flames, the conspirators broke into the booths, and carried off the goods. Chamberlain himself was detected and hanged; but maintained so steadily the point of honour to his accomplices, that he could not be prevailed on, by offers or promises, to discover any of them. Many other instances of robbery and violence broke out in all parts of England: though the singular circumstances attending this conspiracy have made it alone be particularly recorded by historians.

During Edward's residence in France, he was informed, that the Statute of Winchester, which had been enacted in 1285, for the more effectual suppression of robbers, and the prevention of public outrages, was wholly disregarded; that the numbers of thieves had greatly increased, and that they exercised their depredations with impunity; that the want of civil policy was owing to the privileges of the barons, who interrupted the course of justice by affording protection to criminals on their own estates. Finding that these abuses actually prevailed, he abolished the of-

(m) The cruel sentence was executed with rigour: the head of David, together with that of Llewellyn, was exposed to public view on the walls of the Tower; and his quarters were sent to York, Bristol, Northampton, and Winchester. Thus miserably perished the last of the ancient sovereigns of Wales!

fice of chief justiciary, and appointed a new species of magistrates, immediately dependent on the crown, and empowered to administer justice in all parts of the kingdom to which their commissions extended. These offices were granted to certain knights in every county of England, in order to maintain the peace, and to enforce a due observance of the Statute of Winchester; and the sheriffs were directed to assist them, in case of necessity, with the posse comitatus, for the execution of their orders and warrants. Such was the origin of Justices of the Peace, so denominated from the object of their institution.

But the corruption of the judges, by which the fountains of justice were poisoned, seemed of still more dangerous consequence. In order to remedy this prevailing abuse, Edward summoned a parliament, and brought the judges to a trial; where all of them, except two who were clergymen, were convicted of this flagrant iniquity, were fined and deposed. The amount of the fines levied upon them is alone a sufficient proof of their guilt; being above one hundred thousand marks, an immense sum in those days, and sufficient to defray the charges of an expensive war between two great kingdoms. The king afterwards made all the new judges make oath that they would not take bribes; but his expedient, of deposing and fining the old ones, was the more effectual remedy.

It is now proper to give an account of the state of affairs in Scotland, which gave rise to the most interesting transactions of this reign, and some of the subsequent; though the intercourse of that kingdom with England, either in peace or war, had hitherto produced so few events of moment, that, to avoid tediousness, we have omitted many of them, and have been very concise in relating the rest.

Though the government of Scotland had been continually exposed to factions and convulsions incident to all barbarous, and to many civilized nations; and though the successions of their kings had often been disordered by irregularities and usurpations, the true heir of the royal family had still in the end prevailed, and Alexander III. who had espoused Margaret the sister of Edward, probably inherited, after a period of about eight hundred years, and through a succession of males, the sceptre of all the Scottish princes who had governed the nation since its first establishment in the island. This prince died on the 19th of March, 1286, by a fall from his horse at Kinghorn, without leaving any male issue, and without any descendant, except Margaret, born of Eric, king of Norway, and of Margaret, daughter of the Scottish monarch. This princess, commonly called the maid of Norway, though a female, and an infant, and a foreigner, yet being a lawful heir of the kingdom, had, through her grandfather's care, been recognized successor by the states of Scotland; and on Alexander's death, the dispositions which had been previously made against that event, appeared so just and prudent, that no disorders ensued in the kingdom. Margaret was acknowledged queen of Scotland; five guardians, the bishops of St. Andrews and Glasgow, the earls of Fife and Buchan, and James, steward of Scotland, entered peaceably upon the administration; and the infant princess, under the protection of Edward her great uncle, and Eric her father, who exerted themselves on this occasion, seemed firmly seated on the throne of Scotland. The English monarch was naturally led to build mighty projects on this incident; and having lately by force of arms brought Wales under subjection, he attempted, by the marriage of Margaret with his eldest son Edward, to unite the whole island into one monarchy, and thereby to give it security both against domestic convulsions and foreign invasions. The amity which had of late prevailed between the two nations, and which, even in former times, had never been interrupted by any violent wars or injuries, facilitated the execution of this project; and the states of Scotland, which assembled at Brighton, near Kelso, on the 18th of July, 1290, gave their assent to the English proposals, and agreed that their young sovereign should be educated in the court of Edward. Anxious, however, for the liberty and independency of their country, they stipulated very equitable conditions, ere they trusted themselves into the hands of so great and so ambitious a monarch. It was agreed that they should enjoy all their ancient laws, liberties, and customs; that in case young Edward and Margaret should die without issue, the crown of Scotland should revert to the next heir, and should be inherited by him free and independent; that the military tenants of the crown should never be obliged to go out of Scotland, in order to do homage to the sovereign of the united kingdoms, nor the chapters of cathedral, collegiate, or conventual churches, in order to make elections; that the parliaments summoned for Scottish affairs should always be held within the bounds of that kingdom; and that Edward should bind himself under the penalty of one hundred thousand marks, payable to the pope for the use of the holy wars, to observe all these articles. Although Edward gave his assent to the article concerning the future independency of the Scottish crown, with a saving of his former rights; this reserve gave no alarm to the nobility of Scotland, both because these rights, having hitherto been little heard of, had occasioned no disturbance, and because the Scots had so near a prospect of seeing them entirely absorbed in the rights of their sovereignty.

But this project, so happily formed and so amicably conducted, failed of success, by the sudden death of the Norwegian princess, who expired on her passage to Scotland, and left a dismal prospect to the kingdom. Though disorders were for the present obviated by the authority of the regency formerly established, the succession itself of the crown was now become an object of dispute; and the regents could not expect that a controversy, which is not usually decided by reason and argument alone, would be peaceably settled by them, or even by the states of the kingdom, amidst so many powerful pretenders. The posterity of William king of Scotland, the prince taken prisoner by Henry II. being all extinct by the death of Margaret of Norway; the right of the crown devolved on the issue of David earl of Huntingdon, brother to William, whose male line being also extinct, left the succession open to the posterity of his daughters. The earl of Huntingdon had three daughters; Margaret, married to Alan lord of Galloway, Isabella, wife of Robert Brus or Bruce, lord of Annandale, and Adama, who espoused Henry lord Hastings. Margaret, the eldest of the sisters, left one daughter, Devergilda, married to John Baliol, by whom she had a son of the same name, one of the present competitors for the crown: Isabella, the second, bore a son, Robert Bruce, who was now alive, and who also insisted on his claim: Adama, the third, left a son, John Hastings, who pretended that the kingdom of Scotland, like many other inheritances, was devisable among the three daughters of the earl of Huntingdon, and that he, in right of his mother, had a title to a third of it. Baliol and Bruce united against Hastings, in maintaining that the kingdom was indivisible; but each of them asserted the preference of his own title. Baliol was sprung from the elder branch: Bruce was one degree nearer the common stock: if the principle of representation was regarded, the former had the better claim: if propinquity was considered, the latter was entitled to the preference: the sentiments of men were divided: all the nobility had taken part on one side or the other: the people followed implicitly their leaders: the two claimants themselves had great power and numerous retainers in Scotland: and it is no wonder that, among the rude people, more accustomed to arms than enured to laws, a controversy of this nature should threaten the state with the most fatal convulsions.

Each century had its peculiar mode in conducting business; and men, guided more by custom than by reason, follow, without enquiry, the manners which are prevalent in their own time. The practice of that age, in controversies between states and princes, seems to have been to chuse a foreign prince, as an equal arbiter, by whom the question was decided, and whose sentence prevented those dismal confusions and disorders, inseparable at all times from war, and which were multiplied a hundred fold, and dispersed into every corner, by the nature of the feudal governments. The parliament of Scotland, therefore, threatened with a furious civil war, and allured by the great reputation of the English monarch, as well as by the present amicable correspondence between the two kingdoms, agreed in making a reference to Edward; and Fraser, bishop of St. Andrews, with their deputies, was sent to notify to him their resolution, and to claim his good offices in the present dangers to which they were exposed. His inclination, they flattered themselves, led him to prevent their dissensions, and to interpose with a power which none of the competitors would dare to withstand. When this expedient was proposed by one party, the other deemed it dangerous to object to it: indifferent persons thought that the perils of a civil war would thereby be prevented; and no one reflected on the ambitious character of Edward, and the almost certain ruin which must must attend a small state, divided by faction, when it thus implicitly submits itself to the will of so powerful and encroaching a neighbour.

The temptation was too strong for the virtue of the English monarch to resist. He purposed to lay hold of the present favourable opportunity, and if not to create, at least to revive, his claim of a feudal superiority over Scotland; a claim which had hitherto lain in the deepest obscurity, and would have effectually prevented the Scottish barons from chusing him for an umpire. He well knew, that, if this pretension was once submitted to, the absolute sovereignty of that kingdom would soon follow; and that one great vassal, cooped up in an island with his liege lord, without resource from foreign powers, without aid from any fellow vassals, could not long maintain his dominions against the efforts of a mighty kingdom, assisted by all the cavils which the feudal law afforded his superior against him. In pursuit of this great object, very advantageous to England, perhaps in the end no less beneficial to Scotland, but extremely unjust and iniquitous in itself, Edward busied himself in searching for proofs of his pretended superiority; and instead of looking into his own archives, which, if his claim had been real, must have afforded him numerous records of the homages done by the Scottish princes, and could alone yield him any authent testimony, he made all the monasteries be ransacked for old chronicles and histories written by Englishmen, and he collected all the passages which seemed anywise to favour his pretensions. Yet even in this method of proceeding, which pointed out the injustice of his claim, he was far from being fortunate. He began his proofs from the time of Edward the Elder, and continued them through all the subsequent Saxon and Norman times; but produced nothing to his purpose. The whole amount of his authorities during the Saxon period is, that the Scots had sometimes been defeated by the English, had received peace on disadvantageous terms, had made submissions to the English monarch, and had even perhaps fallen into some dependence on a power which was so much superior, and which they had not at that time sufficient force to resist. His authorities from the Norman period were, if possible still less conclusive. The historians indeed make frequent mention of homage done by the northern potentate; but none of them says that it was done for his kingdom; and several of them declare, that it was relative only to the fiefs which he enjoyed south of the Tweed; in the same manner, as the king of England himself swore fealty to the French monarch, for the fiefs which he inherited in France. And to such scandalous shifts was Edward reduced, that he quotes a passage from Hoveden, where it is asserted, that a Scottish king had done homage to England; but he purposely omits the latter part of the sentence, which expresses that this prince did homage for the lands which he held in England.

When William, king of Scotland, was taken prisoner in the battle of Alnwic, he was obliged, for the recovery of his liberty, to swear fealty to the victor for his crown itself. The deed was performed according to all the rites of the feudal law; the record was preserved in the English archives, and is mentioned by all the historians; but as it is the only one of the kind, and as historians speak of this superiority as a great acquisition gained by the fortunate arms of Henry II., there can remain no doubt, that the kingdom of Scotland was, in all former periods, entirely free and independent. Its subjection continued a very few years: king Richard desirous, before his departure for the Holy Land, to conciliate the friendship of William, renounced that homage which had been done by the Scottish princes for the lands which they held in England. But though this transaction rendered the independence of Scotland still more unquestionable, than if no fealty had ever been sworn to the English crown; the Scottish kings, apprized of the point aimed at by their powerful neighbour, seem for a long time to have retained some jealousy on that head, and, in doing homage, to have anxiously obviated all such pretensions. When William in 1200 did homage to John at Lincoln, he was careful to insert a salvo for his royal dignity: when Alexander III. sent assistance to his father-in-law Henry III. during the wars of the barons, he previously procured an acknowledgement, that this aid was granted only from friendship, not from any right claimed by the English monarch; and when the same prince was invited to assist at the coronation of this very Edward, he declined attendance, till he received a like acknowledgement.

But all these reasons were but a feeble rampart against the power of the sword, Edward, carrying with him a great army, to enforce his proofs, advanced to the frontiers, and invited the Scottish parliament, and all the competitors, to attend him in the castle of Norham, a place situated on the southern banks of the Tweed, a few miles distant from Berwick, in order to determine that cause which had been referred to his arbitration. But though this deference seemed due to so great a monarch, and was no more than what his father and the English barons had, in similar circumstances, paid to Louis IX., the king sent the Scottish barons an acknowledgement, that, though at that time they passed the frontiers, this step should never be drawn into precedent, or afford the English kings a pretence for exacting a like submission in any future transaction. When the whole Scottish nation had thus unwarily put themselves in his power, Edward opened the conference at Norham, on the 10th of May, 1291. He informed the parliament, by the mouth of Roger le Brabançon, his chief justiciary, that he was come thither to determine the right among the competitors to their crown; that he was determined to do strict justice to all parties; and that he was entitled to this authority, not in virtue of the reference made to him, but in quality of superior and liege lord of the kingdom. He then produced his proofs of this superiority, which he pretended to be unquestionable, and required of them to acknowledge it; a demand which betrayed Edward's consciousness of his defective title. The Scottish parliament was astonished at so new a pretension, and answered only by their silence; but the king, in order to maintain the appearance of free and regular proceedings, desired them to remove into their own country, to deliberate upon his claim, to examine his proofs, to propose their objections, and to inform him of their resolutions; and he appointed a plain at Upsettletod, on the northern banks of the Tweed, for that purpose.

When the Scottish barons assembled in this place, though indignant at the injustice of this claim, and at the fraud with which it had been conducted, they found themselves betrayed into a situation, in which it was impossible for them to make any defence for the ancient liberty and independence of their country. The king of England, a martial and politic prince, at the head of a powerful army, lay at a very small distance, and was only separated from them by a river fordable in many places. Yet, even in this desperate state of their affairs, the Scottish barons, as we learn from Walsingham, one of the best historians of that period, had the courage to reply, that, till they had a king, they could take no resolution on so momentous a point. The journal of king Edward says, that they made no answer at all. Therefore, interpreting their silence as consent, the king addressed himself to the several competitors, and previously to his pronouncing sentence, required their acknowledgement of his superiority.

It is evident from the genealogy of the royal family of Scotland, that there could only be two questions about the succession, and between Baliol and Bruce on the one hand, and lord Hastings on the other, concerning the partition of the crown; and that between Baliol and Bruce themselves concerning the preference of their respective titles, supposing the kingdom indivisible: yet there appeared on this occasion no less than nine claimants besides; John Comyn or Cummin lord of Badenoch, Florence earl of Holland, Patric Dunbar earl of March, William de Vescey, Robert de Pynkeni, Nicholas de Soules, Patric Galythly, Roger de Mandeville, Robert de Ross, not to mention the king of Norway, who claimed as heir to his daughter Margaret (n).

Edward found all the competitors equally obsequious on this occasion. Robert Bruce was the first that acknowledged Edward's right of superiority over Scotland; even in his petition, as though he anticipated the king's pretensions, he set forth his claim to the crown, by applying to him as liege lord of the kingdom; a step which was not taken by any of the other competitors. They all, (n) Some of these competitors were descended from more remote branches of the royal family; others were even sprung from illegitimate children; and as none of them had the least pretence of right, it is natural to conjecture, that Edward had secretly encouraged them to appear in the list of claimants, that he might sow the more division among the Scottish nobility, make the cause appear the more intricate, and be able to chuse, among a great number, the most obsequious candidate.

however, made a like acknowledgement when required; though Baliol, lest he should give offence to the Scottish nation, took care to be absent during the first days, and was the last that recognized the king's title. Edward next deliberated concerning the method of proceeding in the discussion of this great controversy. He gave orders, that Baliol, and such of the competitors as adhered to him, should chuse forty commissioners; Bruce and his adherents forty more: to these the king added twenty-four Englishmen: he ordered these hundred and four commissioners to examine the cause deliberately among themselves, and make their report to him; and promised in the ensuing year to give his determination. Meanwhile he pretended that it was requisite that the fortresses of Scotland should be delivered into his hands, that he might, without opposition, put the true heir in possession of the throne; and even this exorbitant demand was complied with, both by the states and by the claimants. The governors also of all the castles immediately resigned their command; except Umfreville earl of Angus, who refused, without a formal and particular acquittal from the parliament and the several claimants, to surrender his fortress to so domineering an arbiter, who had given to Scotland so many reasons of suspicion. Before this assembly broke up all the prelates and barons there present swore fealty to Edward; and that prince appointed commissioners to receive a like oath from all the other barons and persons of distinction in Scotland. Edward having finally made, as he imagined, this important acquisition, left the commissioners to sit at Berwick, and examine the titles of the several competitors who claimed the crown, which he was willing for some time to allow the lawful heir to enjoy. He went southwards to Ambresbury, both in order to assist at the funeral of his mother queen Eleanor (o), who died about this time, and to compose some differences which had arisen among the principal nobility.

Gilbert earl of Gloucester, the greatest baron of the kingdom, had espoused the king's daughter; and being elated by that alliance, permitted his bailiffs and vassals to commit violence on the lands of Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford, who retaliated the injury by like violence. But this was not a reign in which such illegal proceedings could pass with impunity. Edward ordered their conduct to be investigated, and the fact being verified by a verdict of jurors, he committed them both to prison, and would not restore them to their liberty till he exacted a fine of one thousand marks from Hereford, and one of ten thousand from his son-in-law.

During this interval, the titles of John Baliol and of Robert Bruce, whose claims appeared to be the best founded among the competitors for the crown of Scotland, were the subject of general disquisition, as well as of debate among the commissioners; who commenced their inquiries on the 2nd of August, 1292, which lasted three months; and having made known the result of their investigation to Edward, he appointed the 17th of November for pronouncing sentence. In order to give greater authority to his intended decision, he proposed this general question both to the commissioners and to all the celebrated lawyers in Europe; Whether a person descended from the eldest sister, but farther removed by one degree, were preferable, in the succession of kingdoms, fiefs, and other indivisible inheritances, to one descended from the younger sister, but one degree nearer to the common stock? This was the true state of the case; and the principle of representation had now gained such ground every where, that an uniform answer was returned to the king in the affirmative. He therefore pronounced sentence in favour of Baliol; and when Bruce, upon this disappointment, joined afterwards lord Hastings, and claimed a third of the kingdom, which he now pretended to be devisible, Edward, though his interest seemed more to require the partition of Scotland, again pronounced sentence in favour of Baliol. That competitor, upon renewing his oath of fealty to England, was put in possession of the kingdom; all his fortresses were restored to him; and the conduct of Edward, both in the deliberate solemnity of the proceedings, and in the justice of the award, was so far unexceptionable. Baliol was then crowned at Scone, and all the Scottish nobility swore obedience to him, except Robert Bruce, who absented himself from the ceremony; which was no sooner finished, than the new king repaired to Newcastle upon Tyne, where he renewed his homage and fealty to Edward.

Had the king entertained no other view than that of establishing his superiority over Scotland, though the iniquity of that claim was apparent, and was aggravated by the most egregious breach of trust, he might have fixed his pretensions, and have left that important acquisition to his posterity; but he immediately proceeded in such a manner, as made it evident, that, not content with this usurpation, he aimed also at the absolute sovereignty and dominion of the kingdom. Instead of gradually enuring the Scots to the yoke, he encouraged, in 1293, appeals to England; required king John himself, by six different summons on trivial occasions, to come to London; refused him the privilege of defending his cause by a procurator; and obliged him to appear at the bar of his parliament as a private person. These humiliating demands were hitherto quite unknown to a king of Scotland: they are, however, the necessary consequences of vassalage by the feudal law; and it is evident that Edward's intention was to enrage Baliol by these indignities, to engage in rebellion, and to assume the dominion of the state, as the punishment of his treason and felony. Accordingly Baliol, though a prince of a gentle spirit, returned into Scotland highly offended at this usage, and determined to vindicate his liberty; and the war which soon after broke out between France and England gave him a favourable opportunity for executiug his purpose.

The occasion of the rupture between France and England was this: a Norman and an English vessel met off the coast near Bayonne; and both of them having occasion for water, they sent their boats to land, and the several crews came at the same time to the same spring; there ensued a quarrel for the preference: a Norman, drawing his dagger, attempted to stab an Englishman; who grappling with him, threw his adversary on the ground; and the Norman, as was pretended, falling on his own dagger, was slain. This scuffle between two seamen about water, soon kindled a bloody war between the two nations, and involved a great part of Europe in the quarrel. The mariners of the Norman ship carried their complaints to the French king: Philip, without enquiring into the fact, without demanding redress, bade them take revenge, and trouble him no more about the matter. They seized an English ship in the channel; and hanging along with some dogs, several of the crew on the yard-arm, in presence of their companions, dismissed the vessel; and bade the mariners inform their countrymen, that vengeance was now taken for the blood of the Norman killed at Bayonne. This injury was resented by the mariners of the cinque-ports, who retaliated, by committing like barbarities on all French vessels without distinction. The French, provoked by their losses, preyed on the ships of all Edward's subjects, whether English or Gascon: the sea became a scene of piracy between the nations: the sovereigns, without either seconding or repressing the violence of their subjects, seemed to remain indifferent spectators: the English made private associations with the Irish and Dutch seamen; the French with the Flemish and Genoese; and the animosities of the people on both sides became every day more violent and barbarous. A fleet of two hundred Norman vessels set sail to the south for wine and other commodities; and in their passage seized all the English ships they met with; hanged the seamen, and seized the goods. The inhabitants of the English sea-ports, informed of this incident, fitted out a fleet of sixty sail, stronger and better manned than the others, and awaited the enemy on their return. After an obstinate battle, they put them to rout, and sunk, destroyed, or took the greater part of them. No quarter was given; and it is pretended that the loss of the French amounted to fifteen thousand men; which is accounted for by this circumstance, that the Norman fleet was employed in transporting a considerable body of soldiers from the south.

The affair was now become too important to be any longer overlooked by the sovereigns. On Philip's sending an envoy to demand reparation and restitution, the king dispatched the bishop of London to the French court, in order to accommodate the quarrel; but his proposals were rejected by the king of France; so that the war continued, and depredations were daily committed on both sides, by the Gascons on the western coast of France, as well as by the English in the channel.

Philip cited the king, on the 24th of November, 1294, as duke of Guienne, to appear in his court at Paris, and answer for these offences; but Edward, apprehensive of danger to that province, sent John St. John, an experienced soldier, to Bourdeaux, and gave him directions to put Guienne in a posture of defence. Anxious, however, to prevent a final rupture between the nations, the king dispatched his brother, Edmund earl of Lancaster, to Paris; and as this prince had espoused the queen of Navarre, mother to Jane queen of France, he seemed, on account of that alliance, the most proper person for finding expedients to accommodate the difference. Jane pretended to interpose with her good offices: Mary, the queen-dowager, feigned the same amicable disposition; and these two princesses told Edmund, that the circumstance the most difficult to adjust was the point of honour with Philip, who thought himself affronted by the injuries committed against him by his sub-vassals in Guienne; but if Edward would consent to give him seizin and possession of that province, he would think his honour fully repaired, would engage to restore Guienne immediately, and accept of an easy satisfaction for the other injuries. The king was consulted on the occasion; and as he then found himself in immediate danger of war with the Scots, which he regarded as the more important concern, this politic prince, blinded by his favourite passion for subduing that nation, allowed himself to be deceived by so gross an artifice. He sent his brother orders to sign and execute the treaty with the two queens; Philip solemnly promised to execute his part of it; and the king's citation to appear in the court of France was accordingly recalled: but the French monarch was no sooner put in possession of Guienne, than the citation was renewed; Edward was condemned for non-appearance; and Guienne, by a formal sentence, was declared to be forfeited and annexed to the crown of France.

The king, though extremely incensed at the perfidious conduct of Philip, acted with prudence and moderation. His first object was to procure money for defraying the expences of the war in which he was engaged: he seized many large sums that had been collected for the holy wars, and were deposited in different convents: he likewise obtained very considerable supplies from his parliament. The clergy at one time granted him one-half, the merchants one-sixth, and the rest of the laity one-tenth, of all their moveables. These sums were increased by a sale of a quantity of wool and hides, which had been prepared for exportation, and were seized by Edward, who promised to pay the full value for them at a future time.

Sensible of the extreme difficulties which he should encounter in attempting the recovery of Gascony, where he had not retained a single place in his hands, he endeavoured to compensate that loss, by forming alliances with several of the German princes, who he projected should attack France on all quarters, and make a diversion of her forces. Adolphus de Nassau, king of the Romans, entered into a treaty with him for that purpose; as did also Amadæus count of Savoy, the archbishop of Cologne, the counts of Gueldre and Luxembourg, the duke of Brabant and count of Barre, who had married his two daughters, Margaret and Eleanor. These alliances, however, were extremely burdensome to his narrow revenues, and proved in the issue entirely ineffectual. More impression was made on Guienne by an English army, which he completed by emptying the jails of many thousand thieves and robbers, who had been confined there for their crimes. The king himself was detained in England, first by contrary winds, then by his apprehensions of a Scottish invasion, and by a rebellion of the Welsh, (excited, if Mezeray may be credited, by the intrigues of Philip,) whom he repressed and brought again under subjection, in 1295. The small army, which he sent to Guienne, was commanded by his nephew, John de Bretagne earl of Richmond, and under him by John de St. John, Robert de Tibetot, and other officers of reputation; who made themselves masters of the town of Bayonne, as well as of Bourg, Blaye, Reole, St. Severe, and other places, which straitened Bourdeaux, and cut off its communication both by sea and land. The Gascon nobility were greatly attached to the English government, and seemed to promise still greater successes; but Philip's brother, Charles de Valois, who commanded the French armies, having laid siege to Podensac, a small fortress near Reole, in possession of the English, obliged Giffard the governor to capitulate; and the articles, though favourable to the English, left all the Gascons prisoners at discretion, of whom about fifty were hanged by Charles as rebels: a policy by which he both intimidated that people, and produced an irreparable breach between them and the English. That prince immediately attacked Reole, where the earl of Richmond himself commanded; and as the place seemed not tenable, the English general drew his troops to the water side, with an intention of embarking with the greater part of the army. The enraged Gascons fell upon his rear, and at the same time opened their gates to the French, who, besides making themselves masters of the place, took many prisoners of distinction. St. Severe was more vigorously defended by Hugh de Vere, son of the earl of Oxford; but was at last obliged to capitulate. The French king, not content with these successes in Gascony, projected an invasion of England; and, by a sudden attempt, his troops took and burnt Dover, but were obliged soon after to retire. And in order to make a greater diversion of the English force, and engage Edward in dangerous and important wars, he formed a secret alliance with John Baliol king of Scotland, the treaty being signed on the 23rd of October, 1295. This was the commencement of that strict union which during so many centuries was maintained by mutual interests and necessities between the French and Scottish nations. John confirmed this alliance, by stipulating a marriage between his eldest son Edward and Jane the daughter of Charles de Valois.

Before we proceed with our narrative of the war with Scotland, it may not be improper to introduce a summary account of the constitution of Parliament; and although it breaks the thread of the discourse, yet it must be recollected that it was to Edward the First that the parliament, as it at present stands, owes its origin, who constituted it about this period. Indeed it was the enormous expences which attended these multiplied wars of Edward, and his preparations for war, joined to alterations which had insensibly taken place in the general state of affairs, that obliged him to have frequent recourse to parliamentary supplies, that introduced the lower orders of the state into the public councils, and that laid the foundations of great and important changes in the government.

Though nothing could be worse calculated for cultivating the arts of peace, or maintaining peace itself, than the long subordination of vassalage from the king to the meanest gentleman, and the consequent slavery of the lower orders of the people; evils inseparable from the feudal system; that system was never able to fix the state in a proper warlike posture, or give it the full exertion of its power for defence, and still less for offence, against a public enemy. The military tenants, unaccustomed to obedience, unexperienced in war, held a rank in the troops by their birth, not by their merits or services; composed a disorderly, and consequently a feeble army; and during the few days which they were obliged by their tenures to remain in the field, were often more formidable to their own prince, than to foreign powers, against whom they were assembled. The sovereigns came gradually to disuse this cumbersome and dangerous machine, so apt to recoil upon the hand which held it; and exchanging the military service for pecuniary supplies, inlisted forces by means of a contract with particular officers, whom they dismissed at the end of the war (p). The barons and knights themselves often entered into these engagements with the prince; and were enabled to fill their bands, both by the authority which they possessed over their vassals and tenants, and from the great numbers of loose disorderly people, whom they found on their estates, and who willingly embraced an opportunity of gratifying their appetite for war and plunder.

Meanwhile the old Gothic fabric, being neglected, went gradually to decay. Though the Conqueror had divided all the lands of England into sixty thousand knights' fees, the number of these was insensibly diminished by various artifices; and the king at last found, that by putting the law in execution, he could assemble a small part only of the ancient force of the kingdom. It was an usual expedient for men who held of the king or great barons by military tenure, to transfer their land to the church, and receive it back by another tenure, called frank-almoigne, by which they were not bound to perform any service (q). A law was made against this practice; but the abuse had probably gone far before it was attended to, and was not entirely corrected by the new statute, which, like most laws of that age, had been but feebly executed by the magistrate against the perpetual interest of so many individuals. The constable and mareschal, when they mustered the armies, often in a hurry, and for want of better information, received the service of a baron for fewer knights' fees than were due by him; and one precedent of this kind was held good against the king, and became ever after a reason for diminishing the service (r). The rolls of knights' fees were inaccurately kept; no care was taken to correct correct them before the armies were summoned into the field (s); it was then too late to think of examining records and charters; and the service was accepted on the terms which the vassal himself was pleased to acknowledge, after all the various subdivisions and conjunctions of property had thrown an obscurity on the nature and extent of his tenure (t). It is easy to judge of the intricacies which would attend disputes of this kind with individuals; when even the number of military fees belonging to the church, whose property was fixed and unalienable, became the subject of controversy; and we find, that when the bishop of Durham was charged with seventy knights' fees for the aid levied on occasion of the marriage of Henry II.'s daughter to the duke of Saxony, that prelate acknowledged ten, and disowned the other sixty (u). It is not known in what manner this difference was terminated; but had the question been concerning an armament to defend the kingdom, the bishops' service would probably have been received without opposition for ten fees; and this rate must also have fixed all his future payments. Pecuniary scutages, therefore, diminished as much as military services (v): other methods of filling the exchequer, as well as the armies, must be devised: new situations produced new laws and institutions; and the great alterations in the finances and military power of the crown, as well as in private property, were the source of equal innovations in every part of the legislature or civil government.

The exorbitant estates conferred by the Norman on his barons and chieftains, remained not long entire and unimpaired. The landed property was gradually shared out into more hands; and those immense baronies were divided, either by provisions to younger children, by partitions among co-heirs, by sale, or by escheating to the king, who gratified a great number of his courtiers, by dealing them out among them in smaller portions. Such moderate estates, as they had required œconomy, and confined the proprietors to live at home, were better calculated for duration: and the order of knights and small barons grew daily more numerous, and began to form a very respectable rank or order in the state. As they were all immediate vassals of the crown by military tenure, they were, by the principles of the feudal law, equally entitled with the greatest barons to a seat in the national or general councils; and this right, though regarded as a privilege which the owners would not entirely relinquish, was also considered as a burthen, which they desired to be subjected to on extraordinary occasions only. Hence it was provided in the charter of king John, that while the great barons were summoned to the national council by a particular writ, the small barons, under which appellation the knights were also comprehended, should only be called by a general summons of the sheriff. The distinction between great and small barons, like that between rich and poor, was not exactly defined; but agreeably to the inaccurate genius of that age, and to the simplicity of ancient government, was left to be determined by the discretion of the king and his ministers. It was usual for the prince to require, by a particular summons, the attendance of a baron in one parliament, and to neglect him on future occasions (w); nor was this uncertainty ever complained of as an injury. He attended when required: he was better pleased, at other times, to be exempted from the burthen; and as he was acknowledged to be of the same order with the greatest barons, it gave them no surprize to see him take his seat in the great council, whether he appeared of his own accord, or by a particular summons from the king. The barons by writ, therefore, began gradually to intermix themselves with the barons by tenure; and as Camden informs us (x), from an ancient manuscript now lost, that after the battle of Evesham a positive law was enacted, prohibiting every baron from appearing in parliament who was not invited thither by a particular summons, the whole baronage of England held thenceforward their seat by writ, and this important privilege of their tenures was in effect abolished. Only where writs had been regularly continued for some time in one great family, the omission of them would have been regarded as an affront, and even as an injury.

A similar alteration gradually took place in the order of earls, who were the highest rank of barons. The dignity of an earl, like that of a baron, was formerly territorial and official (y): he exercised jurisdiction within his county: he levied the third of the fines to his own profit: he was at once a civil and a military magistrate; and though his authority, from the time of William I. was hereditary in England, the title was so much connected with the office, that where the king intended to create a new earl, he had no other expedient than to erect a certain territory into a county or earldom, and to bestow it upon the person and his family (z). But as the sheriffs, who were the vicegerents of the earls, were named by the king, and removeable at pleasure, he found them more dependent upon him; and endeavoured to throw the whole authority and jurisdiction of the office into their hands. This magistrate was at the head of the finances, and levied all the king's rents within the county: he assessed at pleasure the talliages of the inhabitants in royal demesne: he had usually committed to him the management of wards, and often of escheats: he presided in the lower courts of judicature; and thus, though inferior to the earl in dignity, he was soon considered, by this union of the judicial and fiscal powers, and by the confidence reposed in by the king, as much superior to him in authority, and undermined his influence within his own jurisdiction (a). It became usual, in creating an earl, to give him a fixed salary, commonly about twenty pounds a year, in lieu of his third of the fines: the diminution of his power kept pace with the retrenchment of his profit; and the dignity of earl, instead of being territorial and official, dwindled into personal and titular. Such were the mighty alterations which already had fully taken place, or were gradually advancing in the house of peers; that is, in the parliament: for there seems anciently to have been no other house.

But though the introduction of barons by writ, and of titular earls, had given some increase to royal authority, there were other causes which counterbalanced those innovations, and tended in a higher degree to diminish the power of the sovereign. The disuse into which the feudal militia had in a great measure fallen, made the barons almost forget their dependence on the crown: by the diminution of the number of knights' fees, the king had no reasonable compensation when he levied scutages, and exchanged their service for money: the alienations of the crown lands had reduced him to poverty; and, above all, the concession of the Great Charter had set bounds to kingly power, and had rendered it more difficult and dangerous for the prince to exert any extraordinary act of arbitrary authority. In this situation, the king courted the friendship of the lesser barons and knights, whose influence was by no means dangerous to him, and who, being exposed to oppression from their powerful neighbours, sought a legal protection under the authority of the throne. He desired, therefore, to have their presence in parliament, where they served to control the turbulent resolutions of the great. To exact a regular attendance of the whole body would have produced confusion, and would have imposed too heavy a burden upon them. To summon only a few by writ, though it was practised, and had a good effect, served not entirely the king's purpose: because these members had no farther authority than attended their personal character, and were eclipsed by the appearance of the more powerful nobility. He therefore dispensed with the attendance of most of the lesser barons in parliament; and, in return for this indulgence, required them to chuse in each county a certain number of their own body, whose charges they bore, and who, having gained the confidence, carried with them of course the authority of the whole order. This expedient had been practised at different times in the reign of Henry III. (b) and regularly during that of the present king. The numbers sent up by each county varied at the will of the prince (c): they took their seat

(v) In order to pay the sum of one hundred thousand marks, as king Richard's ransom, twenty shillings were imposed on each knight's fee. Had the fees remained on the original footing as settled by the Conqueror, this scutage would have amounted to ninety thousand marks, which was nearly the sum required; but we find that other grievous taxes were imposed to complete it: a certain proof that many frauds and abuses had prevailed in the roll of knights' fees.

among the other peers; because by their tenure they belonged to that order (d): the introducing of them into that house scarcely appeared an innovation; and though it was in the king's power, by varying their number, to command the resolutions of the whole parliament, this circumstance was not attended to in an age when force was more prevalent than laws, and when a resolution, though taken by the majority of a legal assembly, could not be executed if it opposed the will of the more powerful minority.

But there were other important consequences which followed the diminution and consequent disuse of the ancient feudal militia. The king's expence in levying and maintaining a military force for every enterprize was increased beyond what his narrow revenues were able to bear: as the scutages of his military tenants, which were accepted in lieu of their personal service, had fallen to nothing, there were no means of supply but from voluntary aids granted him by the parliament and clergy; or from the talliages which he might levy upon the towns and inhabitants in royal demesne. In the preceding year Edward had been obliged to exact no less than the sixth of all moveables from the merchants, a tenth from the laity, and a moiety of all ecclesiastical benefices (e), for his expedition into Poictou, and the suppression of the Welsh; and this distressful situation, which was likely often to return upon him and his successors, made him think of a new device, and summon the representatives of all the boroughs to parliament. This period, which is the twenty-third of his reign, seems to be the real and true epoch of the house of commons, and the faint dawn of popular government in England. For the representatives of the counties were only deputies from the smaller barons and lesser nobility; and the former precedent of representatives from the boroughs, who were summoned by the earl of Leicester, was regarded as the act of a violent usurpation, had been discontinued in all the subsequent parliaments; and if such a measure had not become necessary on other accounts, that precedent was more likely to hurt than give credit to it.

During the course of several years the kings of England, in imitation of other European princes, had embraced the salutary policy of encouraging and protecting the lower and more industrious orders of the state; whom they found well disposed to obey the laws and civil magistrate, and whose ingenuity and labour furnished commodities requisite for the ornament of peace and the support of war. Though the inhabitants of the country were still left at the disposal of their imperious lords; many attempts were made to give more security and liberty to citizens, and make them enjoy unmolested the fruits of their industry. Boroughs were erected by royal patent within the demesne lands: liberty of trade was conferred upon them; the inhabitants were allowed to farm at a fixed rent their own tolls and customs (f): they were permitted to elect their own magistrates: justice was administered to them by these magistrates, without obliging them to attend the sheriff or county court; and some shadow of independence, by means of these privileges, was gradually acquired by the people (g). The king, however, retained still the power of levying talliages or taxes upon them at pleasure (h); and though their poverty and the customs of the age, made these demands neither frequent nor exorbitant, such unlimited authority in the sovereign was a sensible check upon commerce, and was utterly incompatible with the principles of a free government. But when the multiplied necessities of the crown produce a greater avidity for supply, the king, whose prerogative entitled him to exact it, found that he had not power sufficient to enforce his edicts, and that it was necessary before he imposed taxes, to smooth the way for his demand, and to obtain the previous consent of the boroughs, by solicitations, remonstrances, and authority. The inconvenience of transacting this business with every particular borough was soon felt; and Edward became sensible, that the most expeditious way of obtaining supply was, to assemble the deputies of all the boroughs, to lay before them the necessities of the state, to discuss the matter in their presence, and to require their consent to the demands of their sovereign. For this reason he issued writs to the sheriffs, enjoining them to send to parliament, along with two knights of the shire, two deputies from each borough within their county (i), and these provided with sufficient powers from their community to consent in their name, to what he and his council should require of them. "As it is a most equitable rule," says he, in his preamble to this writ, "that whatever concerns all should be approved of by all; and common dangers be repelled by united efforts (k); a noble principle, which may seem to indicate a liberal mind in the king, and which laid the foundation of a free and an equitable government.

After the election of these deputies by the aldermen and common council, they gave sureties for their attendance before the king and parliament: their expences were respectively borne by the borough which sent them; and they had so little idea of appearing as legislators, a character extremely wide of their low rank and condition (l), that no intelligence could be more disagreeable to any borough, than to find that they must elect, or to any individual than that he was elected to a trust from which no profit or honour could possibly be derived (m): they composed not, properly speaking, any essential part of the parliament: they sat apart both from the barons and knights (n), who disdained to mix with personages of such mean extraction: after they had given their consent to the taxes required of them, their business being then finished, they separated, even though the parliament still continued to sit, and to canvass the national business (o): and as they all consisted of men who were real burgesses of the place from which they were sent, the sheriff, when he found no person of abilities or wealth sufficient for the office, often took the liberty of omitting particular boroughs in his returns; and as he received the thanks of the people for this indulgence, he gave no displeasure to the court, who levied on all the boroughs, without distinction, the tax agreed to by the majority of deputies (p).

The union, however, of the representatives from the boroughs gave gradually more weight to the whole order; and it became customary for them, in return for the supplies which they granted, to prefer petitions to the crown for the redress of any particular grievance of which they found reason to complain. The more the king's demands multiplied, the faster these petitions increased both in number and authority; and the prince found it difficult to refuse men whose grants had supported his throne, and to whose assistance he might so soon be again obliged to have recourse. The commons, however, were still much below the rank of legislators (q). Their petitions, though they received a verbal assent from the throne, were only the (q) Throughout the reign of Edward I. the assent of the commons is not once expressed in any of the enacting clauses; nor in the reigns ensuing, till the 9 Edward III. nor in any of the enacting clauses of 10 Rich. II. Nay even so low as Hen. VI. from the beginning till the 8th of his reign, the assent of the commons is not once expressed in any enacting clause. See Preface to Ruffhead's edition of the Statutes, p. 7. If it should be asserted, that the commons had really given their assent to these statutes, though they are not expressly mentioned, this very omission, proceeding, if you will, from carelessness, is a proof how little they were respected. The commons were so little accustomed to transact public business, that they had no speaker till after the parliament 6th Edw. III. See Prynne's Preface to Cotton's Abridgement: not till the first of Richard II. in the opinion of most antiquaries. The commons were very unwilling to meddle in any state affairs, and commonly either referred themselves to the lords, or desired a select committee of that house to assist them, as appears from Cotton. 5 E. rudiments of laws: the judges were afterwards entrusted with the power of putting them into form; and the king, by adding to them the sanction of his authority, and that sometimes without the assent of the nobles, bestowed validity upon them. The age did not refine so much as to perceive the danger of these irregularities. No man was displeased that the sovereign, at the desire of any class of men, should issue an order which appeared only to concern that class; and his predecessors were so near possessing the whole legislative power, that he gave no disgust by assuming it in this seemingly inoffensive manner. But time and farther experience gradually opened men's eyes, and corrected these abuses. It was found that no laws could be fixed for one order of men, without affecting the whole; and that the force and efficacy of laws depended entirely on the terms employed in wording them. The house of peers, therefore, the most powerful order in the state, with reason, expected that their assent should be expressly granted to all public ordinances (r); and in the reign of Henry V. the commons required that no laws should be framed merely upon their petitions, unless the statutes were worded by themselves, and had passed their house in the form of a bill (s).

But as the same causes which had produced a partition of property continued still to operate, the number of knights and smaller barons, or what the English call the gentry, perpetually increased, and they sunk into a rank still more inferior to the great nobility. The equality of tenure was lost in the great inferiority of power and property; and the house of representatives from the counties was gradually separated from that of the peers, and formed a distinct order in the state (t). The growth of commerce in the mean time, augmented the private wealth and consideration of the burgesses; the frequent demands of the crown increased their public importance; and as they resembled the knights of shires in one material circumstance, that of representing particular bodies of men; it no longer appeared unsuitable to unite them together in the same house, and to confound their rights and privileges (u). Thus the third estate, that of the commons, reached at last its present form; and as the country gentlemen made thenceforward no scruple of appearing as deputies from the boroughs, the distinction between the members was entirely lost, and the lower house acquired thence a great accession of weight and importance in the kingdom. Still, however, the office of this estate was very different from that which it has since exercised with so much advantage to the public. Instead of checking and controlling the authority of the king, they were naturally induced to adhere to him as the great fountain of law and justice, and to support him against the power of the aristocracy, which at once was the source of oppression to themselves, and disturbed him in the execution of the laws. The king in his turn gave countenance to an order of men, so useful and so little dangerous: the peers also were obliged to pay them some consideration; and by this means the third estate, formerly so abject in England, as well as in all other European nations, rose by slow degrees to their present importance; and in their progress made arts and commerce, the necessary attendants of liberty and equality, flourish in the kingdom (v).

What sufficiently proves that the commencement of the house of burgesses, who are the true commons, was not an affair of chance, but arose from the necessities of the present situation, is, that Edward at the very same time summoned deputies from the inferior clergy, the first that ever met in England (w), and he required them to impose taxes on their constituents for the public service. Formerly the ecclesiastical benefices bore no part of the burthens of the state: the pope indeed of late had often levied impositions upon them: he had sometimes granted this power to the sovereign (x): the king himself had in the preceding year exacted, by menaces and violence, a very grievous tax of half the revenues of the clergy; but as this precedent was dangerous, and could not easily be repeated in a government which required the consent of the subject to any extraordinary resolution, Edward found it expedient to assemble a lower house of convocation, to lay before them his necessities, and to ask some supply; but on this occasion he met with difficulties. Whether that the clergy thought themselves the most independent body in the kingdom, or were disgusted by the former exorbitant impositions, they absolutely refused their assent to the king's demand of a fifth of their moveables, and it was not till a second meeting that, on their persisting in this refusal, he was willing to accept of a tenth. The barons and knights granted him, without hesitation, an eleventh; the bur(r) In those instances found in Cotton's Abridgement, where the king appears to answer of himself the petitions of the commons, he probably exerted no more than that power which was long inherent in the crown, of regulating matters by royal edicts or proclamations. But no durable or general statute seems ever to have been made by the king from the petition of the commons alone, without the assent of the peers. It is more likely that the peers alone, without the commons, would enact statutes.

(u) It is very agreeable to the maxims of all the feudal governments, that every order of the state should give their consent to the acts which more immediately concerned them; and as the notion of a political system was not then so well understood, the other orders of the state were often not consulted on these occasions. In this reign even the merchants, though no public body, granted the king impositions on merchandise, because the first payments came out of their pockets. They did the same in the reign of Edward III. but the commons had then observed that the people paid these duties, though the merchants advanced them; and they therefore remonstrated against this practice. Cotton's Abridgement, p. 39. The taxes imposed by the knights on the counties were always lighter than those which the burgesses laid on the boroughs; a presumption that in voting those taxes the knights and burgesses did not form the same house. See Chancellor West's Enquiry into the Manner of creating Peers, p. 8. But there are so many proofs that those two orders of representatives were long separate, that it is needless to insist on them. Mr. Carte, who had carefully consulted the rolls of parliament, affirms that they never appear to have been united till the 16th of Edward III. See his History, vol. ii. p. 451. But it is certain that this union was not even then final: in 1372, the burgesses acted by themselves, and voted a tax after the knights were dismissed. See Tyrrel, Hist. vol. iii. p. 734. from Rot. Claus. 46 Edw. III. n. 9. In 1376 they were the knights alone who passed a vote for the removal of Alice Pierce from the king's person, if we may credit Walsingham, p. 189. There is an instance of a like kind in the reign of Richard II. Cotton, p. 193. The different taxes voted by those two branches of the lower house naturally kept them separate: but as their petitions had mostly the same object, namely, the redress of grievances, and the support of law and justice, both against the crown and the barons, this cause as naturally united them, and was the reason why they at last joined in one house for the dispatch of business. The barons had few petitions. Their privileges were of more ancient date: grievances seldom affected them: they were themselves the chief oppressors. In 1333, the knights by themselves concurred with the bishops and barons in advising the king to stay his journey into Ireland. Here was a petition which regarded a matter of state, and was supposed to be above the capacity of the burgesses. The knights, therefore, acted apart in this petition. See Cotton Abridg. p. 13. Chief baron Gilbert thinks, that the reason why taxes always began with the commons or burgesses was, that they were limited by the instructions of their boroughs. See Gilbert's History of the Exchequer, p. 37.

(v) The chief argument from ancient authority, for the opinion that the representatives of boroughs preceded the forty-ninth of Henry III. is the famous petition of the borough of St. Albans, first taken notice of by Selden, and then by Petyt, Brady, Tyrrel, and others. In this petition, presented to the parliament in the reign of Edward II. the town of St. Albans asserts, that though they held in capite of the crown, and owed only for all other service, their attendance in parliament, yet the sheriff had omitted them in his writs; whereas both in the reign of the king's father, and all his predecessors, they had always sent members. Now, say the defenders of this opinion, if the commencement of the house of commons were in Henry III.'s reign, this expression could not have been used. But Madox, in his History of the Exchequer, p. 522, 523, 524, has endeavoured, and with great reason, to destroy the authority of this petition for the purpose alleged. He asserts, first, That there was no such tenure in England as that of holding by attendance in parliament, instead of all other service. Secondly, That the borough of St. Albans never held of the crown at all, but was always demesne land of the abbot. It is no wonder, therefore, that a petition which advances two falsehoods, should contain one historical mistake, which indeed amounts only to an inaccurate and exaggerated expression; no strange matter in ignorant burgesses of that age. Accordingly St. Albans continued still to belong to the abbot. It never held of the crown till after the dissolution of the monasteries. But the assurance of these petitioners is remarkable. They wanted to shake off the authority of their abbot, and to hold of the king; but were unwilling to pay any services even to the crown: upon which they framed this idle petition, which later writers have made the foundation of so many inferences and conclusions. From the tenour of the petition it appears, that there was a close connection between holding of the crown, and being represented in parliament: the latter had scarcely ever a place without the former: yet we learn from Tyrrel's Appendix, vol. iv. that there were some instances to the contrary. It is not improbable that Edward followed the roll of the earl of Leicester, who had summoned, without distinction, all the considerable boroughs of the kingdom; among which there might be some few who did not hold of the crown. Edward also found it necessary to impose taxes on all the boroughs in the kingdom without distinction. This was a good expedient for augmenting his revenue. We are not to imagine, because the house of commons have since become of great importance, that the first summoning of them would form any remarkable and striking epoch, and be generally known to the people even seventy or eighty years after. So ignorant were the generality of men in that age, that country burgesses would readily imagine an innovation, seemingly so little material, to have existed from time immemorial, because it was beyond their own memory, and perhaps that of their fathers. Even the parliament in the reign of Henry V. say, that Ireland had, from the beginning of time, been subject to the crown of England. (See Brady.) And surely, if any thing interests the people above all others, it is war and conquests, with their dates and circumstances.

gesses a seventh. But the clergy still scrupled to meet on the king's writ, lest by such an instance of obedience they should seem to acknowledge the authority of the temporal power; and this compromise was at last fallen upon, that the king should issue his writ to the archbishop; and that the archbishop should, in consequence of it summon the clergy, who, as they then appeared to obey their spiritual superior, no longer hesitated to meet in convocation. This expedient, however, was the cause why the ecclesiastics were separated into two houses of convocation under their several archbishops, and formed not one estate, as in other countries of Europe; which was at first the king's intention (y). Having given a clear and succinct account of the origin of parliaments in this kingdom, we proceed to the course of our narration.

Edward, fully sensible of the reasons of disgust which he had given to Baliol, informed of the dispositions of that people, and expecting the most violent effects of their resentment, employed the supplies granted him by his people, in making preparations against the hostilities of the king of Scots. When in this situation, he received intelligence of the treaty secretly concluded between John and Philip; and though uneasy at this concurrence of a French and Scottish war, he resolved not to encourage his enemies by a pusillanimous behaviour, or by yielding to their united efforts. He summoned John to perform the duty of a vassal, and to send him a supply of forces against the threatened invasion from France. He next required that the fortresses of Berwick, Jedborough, and Roxborough, should be put into his hands as a security during the war; he cited John to appear in an English parliament to be held at Newcastle; and when none of these successive demands were complied with, he marched to Newcastle, in the spring of 1296, with a numerous army of thirty thousand foot and four thousand horse, to chastise his rebellious vassal. The Scottish nation, who had little reliance on the vigour and ability of their prince, assigned him a council of twelve noblemen, in whose hands the power of the state was in fact deposited, and who put the country in the best posture of defence which the present distractions would admit. A great army, composed of forty thousand infantry, though supported only by five thousand cavalry, advanced to the frontiers; and after a fruitless attempt upon Carlisle, marched eastwards to defend those provinces which Edward was preparing to attack. But some of the most considerable of the Scottish nobles, Robert Bruce the father and son, the earls of March and Angus, prognosticating the ruin of their country, endeavoured here to obtain favour with Edward, by an early submission; and the king, encouraged by this incident, led his army into the enemy's country, and crossed the Tweed without opposition at Coldstream on the 28th of March. He then received a message from John, by which that prince, having now procured for himself and his nation pope Celestine's dispensation from former oaths, renounced the homage which had been done to England, and set Edward at defiance. The bravado was but ill supported by the military operations of the Scots. Berwick was already taken by assault: sir William Douglas, the governor, was made prisoner; above seven thousand of the garrison were put to the sword; and Edward, elated by this success, dispatched earl Warrenne with twelve thousand men, to lay siege to the castle of Dunbar, which was defended by the flower of the Scottish nobility.

The Scots, sensible of the importance of this fortress, which, if taken, must leave their whole country open to the enemy, advanced to its relief with their main army, under the command of the earls of Buchan, Lenox, and Marre, in order to relieve it. Warrenne, undismayed at the superiority of their number, marched out to give them battle. He attacked them with great impetuosity on the 27th of April, soon threw them into confusion, and chased them off the field with great slaughter. The loss of the Scots is said to have amounted to twenty thousand men: the castle of Dunbar, with all its garrison, surrendered next day to Edward, who, after the battle, had brought up the main body of the English, and who now proceeded with an assured confidence of success. The castle of Roxborough was yielded by James, steward of Scotland; and that nobleman, from whom the royal family of Stuart descended, was again obliged to swear fealty to Edward. After a feeble resistance, the castles of Edinburgh and Stirling opened their gates to the enemy. All the southern parts were instantly subdued by the English; and, to enable them the better to reduce the northern, Edward sent for a strong reinforcement of Welsh and Irish, who, being accustomed to a desultory kind of war, were the best fitted to pursue the fugitive Scots into the recesses of their lakes and mountains. But the spirit of the nation was already broken by their misfortunes; and the feeble and timid Baliol, discontented with his own subjects, and overawed by the English, abandoned all those resources which his people might yet have possessed in this extremity. An interview took place between the two kings at a place called Stroutharrack, on the 2nd of July, and Baliol made his submissions to Edward; expressed the deepest penitence for his disloyalty to his liege lord; and made a solemn and irrevocable resignation of his crown into the hands of that monarch. Edward marched northwards to Aberdeen and Elgin, without meeting an enemy: even the turbulent Highlanders, ever refractory to their own princes, and averse to the restraint of laws, endeavoured to prevent the devastation of their country, by giving him early proofs of obedience; and Edward, having brought the whole kingdom to a seeming state of tranquillity, returned to the south with his army. There was a stone, to which the popular superstition of the Scots paid the highest veneration: all their kings were seated on it, when they received the rite of inauguration: an ancient tradition assured them, that, wherever this stone was placed, their nation should always govern; and it was carefully preserved at Scone, as the true palladium of their monarchy, and their ultimate resource amidst all their misfortunes. Edward got possession of it; and carried it with him to England. He gave orders to destroy the records, and all those monuments of antiquity, which might preserve the memory of the independence of the kingdom, and refute the English claims of superiority. The great seal of Baliol was broken; and that prince himself was carried prisoner to London, and committed to custody in the Tower. Two years after, he was restored to liberty, and submitted to a voluntary banishment in France; where he died at an advanced age in a private station. Earl Warrenne was left governor of Scotland: Englishmen were entrusted with the chief offices; and Edward, flattering himself that he had attained the end of all his wishes, and that the numerous acts of fraud and violence, which he had practised against Scotland, had terminated in the final reduction of that kingdom, returned with his army into England.

An attempt, which he made about the same time, for the recovery of Guienne, was not equally successful. He sent thither a reinforcement of seven thousand men, under the command of the earl of Lancaster. The prince at first gained some advantages over the French at Bourdeaux; but was soon after seized with a distemper, of which he died at Bayonne. The command devolved on the earl of Lincoln, who, from the superiority of the French, was compelled to remain in a state of inactivity during the rest of the compaign.

But the ambitious spirit of Edward could not be satisfied, so long as Guienne, the ancient patrimony of his family, remained in the hands of the French monarch. Finding that the distance of that province rendered all his efforts against it feeble and uncertain, he purposed to attack France in a quarter where she appeared more vulnerable; and with this view he married his daughter Elizabeth to John earl of Holland, and at the same time contracted an alliance with Guy earl of Flanders, stipulated to pay him the sum of seventy-five thousand pounds, and projected an invasion, with their united forces, upon Philip, their common enemy. He hoped that, when he himself, at the head of English, Flemish, and Dutch armies, reinforced by his German allies, to whom he had promised or remitted considerable sums, should enter the frontiers of France, and threaten the capital itself, Philip would be obliged to relinquish his acquisitions, and purchase peace by the restitution of Guienne. But, in order to set this great machine in motion, considerable supplies were requisite from the parliament; and Edward, without much difficulty, obtained from the barons and knights a new grant of a twelfth of all their moveables, and from the boroughs, that of an eighth. The great and almost unlimited power of the king over the latter, enabled him to throw the heavier part of the burthen on them; and the prejudices which he seems always to have entertained against the church, on account of the former zeal of the clergy for the Montfort faction, made him resolve to load them with still more considerable impositions, and he required quired of them a fifth of their moveables. But he here met with an opposition, which for some time disconcerted all his measures and engaged him in enterprizes that were somewhat dangerous to him; and would have proved fatal to any of his predecessors.

Boniface VIII. who had succeeded Celestine in the pontifical chair, was a man of the most lofty and enterprizing spirit; and was determined to carry the authority of the tiara, and his dominion over the temporal power, to as great a height as it had ever attained in any former period. Sensible that his immediate predecessors, by oppressing the church in every province of Christendom, had extremely alienated the affections of the clergy, and had afforded the civil magistrate a pretence for laying like impositions on ecclesiastical revenues, he attempted to resume the former station of the sovereign pontiff, and to establish himself as the common protector of the spiritual order against all invaders. For this purpose, he issued a general bull, prohibiting all princes from levying, without his consent, any taxes upon the clergy, and all clergymen from submitting to such impositions; and threatened both of them with the penalties of excommunication in case of disobedience. This edict is said to have been procured by the solicitation of Robert de Winchelsey, archbishop of Canterbury, who had been promoted to that see on the death of archbishop Peckham in 1292, and who intended to employ it as a rampart against the extortions which the church had felt from Edward, and the still greater, which that prince's multiplied necessities gave them reason to apprehend. When a demand, therefore, was made on the clergy of a fifth of their moveables, a tax which was probably much more grevious than a fifth of their revenue, the clergy took shelter under the bull of pope Boniface, and pleaded conscience in refusing compliance. The king came not immediately to extremities on this repulse; but, after locking up all their granaries and barns, and prohibiting all rent to be paid them, he appointed a new synod, which assembled on the 15th of January, 1297, to confer with him upon his demand. The primate not dismayed by these proofs of Edward's resolution, here plainly told him, that the clergy owed obedience to two sovereigns, their spiritual and their temporal; but their duty bound them to a much stricter attachment to the former than to the latter: they could not comply with his commands in contradiction to the express prohibition of the sovereign pontiff.

Edward, however, paid little regard to those privileges, on which they set so high a value. He had formerly seized, in an arbitrary manner, all the money and plate belonging to the church and convents, and had applied them to the public service; and they could not but expect more violent treatment on this sharp refusal, grounded on such dangerous principles. He therefore resolved to employ the power in his hands; and told the ecclesiastics, that, since they refused to support the civil government, they were unworthy to receive any benefit from it; and he would accordingly put them out of the protection of the laws. This vigorous measure was immediately carried into execution. Orders were issued to the judges to receive no cause brought before them by the clergy; to hear and decide all causes in which they were defendants: to do every man justice against them; and do them justice against nobody. The ecclesiastics soon found themselves in a most miserable situation. They could not remain in their own houses or convents for want of subsistence: if they went abroad in quest of maintenance, they were dismounted, robbed of their horses and clothes, abused by every ruffian, and no redress could be obtained by them for the most violent injury. The primate himself was attacked on the highway, was stripped of his equipage and furniture, and was at last reduced to board himself, with a single servant, in the house of a country clergyman; and though the archbishop issued a general sentence of excommunication against all who attacked the persons or property of ecclesiastics, it was not regarded.

The spirits of the clergy were at last broken by this harsh treatment. Besides that the whole province of York, which lay nearest the danger that still hung over them from the Scots, voluntarily, from the first, voted a fifth of their moveables; the bishops of Salisbury, Ely, and some others, made a composition for the secular clergy within their dioceses; and they agreed not to pay the fifth, which would have been an act of disobedience to Boniface's bull, but to deposit a sum equivalent in some church appointed them; whence it was taken by the king's officers. Many particular convents and clergymen made payment of a like sum, and received the king's protection. Those who had not ready money, entered into recognizances for the payment. And there was scarcely found one ecclesiastic in the kingdom, who seemed willing to suffer, for the sake of religious privileges, this new species of martyrdom, the most tedious and languishing of any, the most mortifying to spiritual pride, and not rewarded by that crown of glory, which the church holds up, with such ostentation, to her devoted adherents.

But as the supplies granted by parliament, though considerable, were not sufficient to answer the king's necessities, and that levied by compositions with the clergy came in slowly, Edward, for the purpose of obtaining farther supply, exerted his arbitrary power, and laid an oppressive hand on all orders of men in the kingdom. He limited the merchants in the quantity of wool allowed to be exported; and at the same time forced them to pay him a duty of forty shillings a sack, which was computed to be above the third of the value. He seized all the rest of the wool, as well as all the leather of the kingdom, into his hands, and disposed of these commodities for his own benefit: he required the sheriffs of each county to supply him with two thousand quarters of wheat, and as many of oats, which he permitted them to seize wherever they could find them: the cattle and other commodities necessary for supplying his army were laid hold of without the consent of the owners; and though he promised to pay afterwards the equivalent of all these goods, men saw but little probability that he could ever be reduced to a strict observance of his engagements. He evinced, at the same time an equal disregard to the principles of the feudal law, by which all the lands of this kingdom were held. In order to increase his army, and enable him to support that great effort which he intended to make against France, he required the attendance of every proprietor of land possessed of twenty pounds a year, even though he held not of the crown, and was not obliged by his tenure to perform any such service.

These acts of violence and arbitrary power, notwithstanding the great personal regard generally borne to the king, created murmurs in every order of men; and it was not long ere some of the great nobility, jealous of their own privileges as well as of national liberty, gave countenance and authority to these complaints. Edward, assembled an army on the sea-coast, which he purposed to send over to Gascony, to make a diversion in that quarter, while he himself should in person make an impression on the side of Flanders; and he intended to put these forces under the command of Humphrey Bohun earl of Hereford, the high constable, and Roger Bigod earl of Norfolk, the mareschal of England. But these two powerful noblemen refused to execute his commands, and affirmed, that they were only obliged by their office to attend his person in the wars. A violent altercation ensued; and the king, in the height of his passion, addressed himself to the constable, exclaimed, "Sir earl, by the eternal God, you shall either go or hang." "By the eternal God, Sir King," replied Hereford, "I will neither go nor hang." And he immediately departed, accompanied by the mareschal, and more than thirty other considerable barons.

Upon this opposition, the king thought it prudent to lay aside the project of an expedition against Guienne: and to assemble the forces which he proposed to transport into Flanders. But the two earls, irritated in the contest and elated by impunity, pretending that none of their ancestors had ever served in that country, refused to perform the duty of their office in mustering the army. The king, now finding it advisable to proceed with moderation, instead of attainting the earls, who possessed their dignities by hereditary right, appointed Thomas de Berkeley, and Geoffrey de Geyneville, to act, in that emergency, as constable and mareschal. He endeavoured to reconcile himself with the church; took the primate again into favour; made him, in conjunction with Reginald de Grey, tutor to the prince, whom he intended to appoint guardian of the kingdom during his absence; and he even assembled a great number of the nobility in Westminster Hall, to whom he deigned to make an apology for his past conduct. He pleaded, by way of palliation, the urgent necessities of the crown; his extreme want of money; his engagements from honour as well as interest to support his foreign allies: and he promised, if ever he returned in safety, to redress all their grievances, to restore the due execution of the laws, and to make all his subjects ample compensation for the losses which they had sustained in the seizure of their effects. Meanwhile he begged them to suspend their animosities; to judge of him by his future conduct, of which, he hoped, he should be more master; to remain faithful to his government, or, if he should perish in the present war to preserve their allegiance to his son and successor.

There were certainly, from the concurrence of discontents among the great, and grievances of the people, materials sufficient in any other period to have kindled a civil war in England; but the vigour and abilities of Edward kept every one in awe; and his dexterity, in stopping on the brink of danger, and retracting the measures to which he had been pushed by his violent temper and arbitrary principles, saved the nation from so great a calamity. The two great earls of Hereford and Norfolk dared not to break out into open violence: they proceeded no farther than framing a remonstrance, which was delivered to the king at Winchelsea, when he was ready to embark for Flanders. They there complained of the violations of the great charter, and of that of forests; the violent seizure of corn, leather, cattle, and above all, of wool, a commodity which they affirmed to be equal in value to half the lands of the kingdom; the arbitrary imposition of forty shillings a sack on the small quantity of wool allowed to be exported by the merchants; and they claimed an immediate redress of all these grievances. The king told them, that as the greater part of his council were now at a distance, he could not deliberate on measures of so great importance without their advice.

But the constable and mareschal, with the barons of their party, resolved to take advantage of Edward's absence, and to obtain an explicit assent to their demands. When summoned to attend the parliament at London, they came accompanied by all the barons of their party, and with a great body of cavalry and infantry; and before they would enter the city, required that the gates should be delivered into their custody. The primate, who secretly favoured all their pretensions, advised the council to comply with their request; and thus they became masters both of the young prince and of the resolutions of parliament. Their demands, however, were moderate; and such as sufficiently justify the purity of their intentions in all their past measures: they only required, that the two charters, which had been frequently violated should receive a solemn confirmation; that a clause should be added to secure the nation for ever against all impositions and taxes without consent of parliament; and that they themselves, and their adherents, who had refused to attend the king into Flanders, should be pardoned for the offence, and should be again received into favour. The young prince of Wales and his council assented to these terms; and the charters were sent over to the king in Flanders to be there confirmed by him. Edward felt the utmost reluctance to this measure, which, he apprehended, would for the future impose fetters on his conduct, and set limits to his lawless authority. On various pretences he delayed giving any answer to the disputes for three days; and when the pernicious consequences of his refusal were represented to him, he was at last obliged, after many internal struggles, to affix his seal to the charters, as also to the clause that bereaved him of the power, which he had hitherto assumed, of imposing arbitrary taxes on his subjects.

That we may finish at once this interesting transaction concerning the settlement of the charters, we shall briefly mention the subsequent events which relate to it. The constable and mareschal, informed of the king's compliance, were satisfied; and not only ceased from disturbing the government, but assisted the regency with their power against the Scots, who had risen in arms, and had thrown off the yoke of England. But being sensible, that the smallest pretence would suffice to make Edward retract these detested laws, which, though they had often received the sanction both of king and parliament, and had been acknowledged during three reigns, were never yet deemed to have sufficient validity; they insisted, that he should again confirm them on his return to England, and should thereby renounce all plea which he might derive from his residing in a foreign country, when he formerly affixed his seal to them. It appeared that they judged aright of Edward's character and intentions: he delayed his confirmation as long as possible; and when the fear of worse consequences obliged him to comply, he expressly added a salvo for his royal dignity or prerogative, which in effect enervated the whole force of the charters. The two earls and their adherents left the parliament in disgust; and the king was constrained, on a future occasion, to grant to the people, without any subterfuge, a clear and absolute confirmation of those laws, which were so much the object of their affection. Even farther securities were then provided for the establishment of national privileges. Three knights were appointed to be chosen in each county, and were invested with the power of punishing, by fine and imprisonment, every transgression or violation of the charters: a precaution which, though it was soon disused, as encroaching too much on royal prerogative, proves the attachment which the English, in that age, bore to liberty, and their well-grounded jealousy of the arbitrary disposition of Edward. The work, however, was not yet entirely finished and complete. In order to execute the lesser charter, it was requisite, by new perambulations, to set bounds to the royal forests, and to disafforest all land which former encroachments had comprehended within their limits. Edward discovered the same reluctance to comply with this equitable demand; and it was not till after many delays on his part, and many solicitations and requests, and even menaces of war and violence (z) on the part of the barons, that the perambulations were made, and exact boundaries fixed, by a jury in each county, to the extent of his forests. Had not his ambitious and active temper raised him so many foreign enemies, and obliged him to have recourse so often to the assistance of his subjects, it is not likely that those concessions could ever have been extorted from him. But while the people, after so many successful struggles, deemed themselves happy in the secure possession of their privileges, they were surprised in 1305 to find that Edward had secretly applied to Rome, and had procured, from that court, an absolution from all oaths and engagements, which he had so often reiterated, to observe both the charters. There are some historians so credulous as to imagine, that this perilous step was taken by him for no other purpose than to acquire the merit of granting a new confirmation of the charters, as he did soon after; and a confirmation so much the more unquestionable, as it could never after be invalidated by his successors, on pretence of any force or violence which had been imposed upon him. But besides that this might have been done with a better grace, if he had never applied for any such absolution, the whole tenor of his conduct proves him to be little susceptible of such refinements in patriotism; and this very deed itself, in which he confirmed the charters afresh, carries on the face of it a very opposite presumption. Though he ratified the charters in general, he still took advantage of the papal bull so far as to invalidate the late perambulations of the forests, which had been made with such care and attention, and to reserve to himself the power, in case of favourable incidents, to extend as much as formerly those arbitrary jurisdictions. If the power was not in fact made use of, we can only conclude that the favourable incidents did not offer. Thus, after the contests of near a whole century, and these ever accompanied with violent jealousies, often with public convulsions, the Great Charter was finally established; and the English nation have the honour of extorting, by their perseverance, this concession from the ablest, the most warlike, and the most ambitious of all their princes (a). It is computed, that above thirty confirmations of the charter were at different times required of several kings, and granted by them in full parliament; a precaution which, while it discovers some ignorance of the true nature of law and government, proves a laudable jealousy of national privileges in the people, and an extreme anxiety lest contrary precedents should ever be pleaded as an authority for infringing them. Accordingly we find, that, though arbitrary practices often prevail, and were even able to establish themselves into settled customs, the validity of the Great Charter was never afterwards formally disputed; and that grant was still regarded as the basis of English government, and the

(z) We are told by Tyrrell, vol. ii. p. 145. from the Chronicle of St. Alban's, that the barons, not content with the execution of the charter of forests, demanded of Edward as high terms as had been imposed on his father by the earl of Leicester; but no other historian mentions this particular.

(a) It must, however, be remarked, that the king never forgave the chief actors in this transaction; and he found means afterwards to oblige both the constable and mareschal to resign their offices into his hands. The former received a new grant of it: but the office of mareschal was given to Thomas of Brotherton, the king's second son.

sure rule by which the authority of every custom was to be tried and canvassed. The jurisdiction of the star chamber, martial law, imprisonment by warrants from the privy-council, and other practices of a like nature, though established for several centuries, were scarcely ever allowed by the English to be parts of their constitution: the affection of the nation for liberty still prevailed over all precedent, and even all political reasoning: the exercise of these powers, after being long the source of secret murmurs among the people, was, in fulness of time, solemnly abolished as illegal, at least as oppressive, by the whole legislative authority.

Though the king's impatience to appear at the head of his armies in Flanders made him overlook all considerations, either of domestic discontents or of commotions among the Scots; his embarkation had been so long retarded by the various obstructions thrown in his way, that he lost the proper season for action, and after his arrival made no progress against the enemy. The king of France, taking advantage of his absence, had made an incursion into the Low Countries; had defeated the Flemings in the battle of Furnes; had made himself master of Lisle, St. Omer, Courtrai, and Ypres; and threatened to take full vengeance on the earl of Flanders, his rebellious vassal. But Edward, seconded by an English army of fifty thousand men, was soon able to stop the career of his victories; and Philip, finding all the weak resources of his kingdom nearly exhausted, began to dread a reverse of fortune, and to apprehend an invasion on France itself. The king of England, on the other hand, being disappointed of assistance from Adolphus, king of the Romans, which he had purchased at a very high price, and finding many urgent calls for his presence in England, was desirous of ending, on any honourable terms, a war which served only to divert his force from the execution of more important projects. This disposition in both monarchs soon produced a cessation of hostilities for two years; and engaged them to refer all their differences to the arbitration of the sovereign pontiff.

Boniface was among the last of the sovereign pontiffs that exercised an authority over the temporal jurisdiction of princes; and these exorbitant pretensions, which he had been tempted to assume from the successful example of his predecessors, but of which the season was now past, involved him in so many calamities, and were attended with so unfortunate a catastrophe, that they have been secretly abandoned, though never openly relinquished, by his successor in the apostolic chair. Edward and Philip equally jealous of papal claims, took care to insert in their reference, which was made in the year 1298, that Boniface was made judge of the difference by their consent, as a private person, not by any right of his pontificate; and the pope, without seeming to be offended at this mortifying clause, proceeded to give sentence between them in which they both acquiesced. He brought them to agree that their union should be cemented by a double marriage; that of Edward himself, who was now a widower, with Margaret, Philip's sister, and that of the prince of Wales with Isabella, daughter of that monarch. Philip was likewise willing to restore Guienne to the English, which he had indeed no good pretence to detain; but he insisted that the Scots, and their king John Baliol, should, as his allies, be comprehended in the treaty, and should be restored to their liberty. The difference, after several disputes, was compromised, by their making mutual sacrifices to each other. Edward agreed to abandon his ally the earl of Flanders, on condition that Philip should treat in like manner his ally the king of Scots. The prospect of conquering these two countries, whose situation made them so commodious an acquisition to the respective kingdoms, prevailed over all other considerations; and though they were both finally disappointed in their hopes, their conduct was very reconcileable to the principles of an interested policy. A peace was accordingly concluded at Montreuil, on the 9th of June, 1299, was ratified by the two monarchs on the 3d of August following, and, about a month after, Edward was married to the princess Margaret of France. This was the first specimen which the Scots had of the French alliance, and which was exactly conformable to what a smaller power must always expect, when it blindly attaches itself to the will and fortunes of a greater. That unhappy people, now engaged in a brave though unequal contest for their liberties, were totally abandoned, by the ally in whom they reposed their final confidence, to the will of an imperious conqueror.

Though England as well as other European countries was, in its ancient state, but ill qualified for making, and still worse for maintaining, conquests, Scotland was so much inferior in its internal force, and was so ill situated for receiving foreign succours, that it was no wonder Edward, an ambitious monarch, should have cast his eye on so tempting an acquisition, which brought both security and greatness to his native country. But the instruments which he employed to maintain his dominion over the northern nations were not happily chosen; and acted not with the requisite prudence and moderation in reconciling the Scots to a yoke which they bore with such extreme reluctance. Warrenne, earl of Surrey, retiring into England on account of his bad state of health, left the administration entirely in the hands of Ormesby, who was appointed justiciary of Scotland, and to Cressingham, who bore the office of treasurer; and a small military force remained to secure the precarious authority of those ministers. The latter had no other object than the gratification of his avarice by the most rapacious and illegal means. The former distinguished himself by the rigour and severity of his temper; and both of them treating the Scots as a conquered people, made them sensible too early of the grievous servitude into which they had fallen. As Edward required that all the proprietors of land should swear fealty to him; every one who refused or delayed giving this testimony of submission, was outlawed and imprisoned, and punished without mercy; and the bravest and most generous spirits of the nation were thus exasperated to the highest degree against the English government.

Every thing was now ripe for a revolution; and a leader was only wanting to head an enraged people, who evinced a determined resolution to rescue their country from the yoke of oppression. The task was arduous; it required extraordinary courage to attempt, and singular talents to accomplish it. The Scottish nobles, aware of the difficulties that must attend the desperate undertaking, stood aloof: that prudence which had ever distinguished the very natives of Caledonia was displayed in its full vigour; their valour, at this time impetuous, was rendered subservient to it, and this national virtue was so strongly implanted in their bosoms as to damp the ardour of patriotism.

In this emergency, there was one William Wallace, the son of a private gentleman in the West of Scotland, of a small fortune, but descended of an ancient family, whose courage prompted him to undertake, and enabled him finally to accomplish, the desperate attempt of delivering his native country from the dominion of foreigners. This man, whose valourous exploits are the object of just admiration, but have been much exaggerated by the traditions of his countrymen, had been provoked by the insolence of an English officer to put him to death; and finding himself obnoxious on that account to the severity of the administration, he fled into the woods, and offered himself as a leader to all those whom their crimes, or bad fortune, or avowed hatred of the English, had reduced to a like necessity. He was endowed with gigantic force of body, with heroic courage of mind, with disinterested magnanimity, with incredible patience, and ability to bear hunger, fatigue, and all the severities of the seasons; and he soon acquired, among those desperate fugitives, that authority to which his virtues so justly entitled him. Beginning with small attempts, in which he was always successful, he gradually proceeded to more momentous enterprizes; and he discovered equal caution in securing his followers, and valour in annoying the enemy. By his knowledge of the country he was enabled, when pursued, to ensure a retreat among the morasses, or forests, or mountains; and again collecting his dispersed associates, he unexpectedly appeared in another quarter, and surprized, and routed, and put to the sword the unwary English. Every day brought accounts of his great actions, which were received with no less favour by his countrymen than terror by the enemy: all those who thirsted after military fame were desirous to partake of his renown: his successful valour seemed to vindicate the nation from the ignominy into which it had fallen, by its tame submission to the English; and though no nobleman of note ventured as yet to join his party, he had gained a general confidence and attachment, which birth and fortune are not alone able to confer.

Wallace having, by many fortunate enterprizes, brought the valour of his followers to correspond to his own, resolved to strike a decisive blow against the English government; and he concerted the plan of surprizing Ormesby of Scone, and of taking vengeance on him for all the violence and tyranny of which he had been guilty. The justiciary, apprized of his intentions, fled with precipitation into England; and all the other English officers imitated his example: their terror added alacrity and courage to the Scots, who betook themselves to arms in every quarter: many of the principal barons, and among the rest sir William Douglas, openly countenanced Wallace's party: Robert Bruce secretly favoured and promoted the cause; and the Scots, shaking off their fetters, prepared themselves to defend, by an united effort, that liberty which they had so unexpectedly recovered from the hands of their oppressors.

But Warrenne, collecting an army of forty thousand men in the north of England, determined to re-establish his authority; and he endeavoured, by the celerity of his march, to compensate for his past negligence, which had enabled the Scots to throw off the yoke of the English government. By a forced march he entered Annandale, and came up with the enemy at Iwine, before their forces were fully collected, and before they had put themselves in a proper posture of defence. Many of the Scottish nobles, alarmed with their dangerous situation, here submitted to the English, renewed their oaths of fealty, promised to deliver hotages for their good behaviour, and received a pardon for past offences. Others who had not yet declared themselves, such as the steward of Scotland, Richard Lundy, and the earl of Lenox, joined, though with reluctance, the English army; and waited a favourable opportunity for embracing the cause of their distressed countrymen. But Wallace, whose authority over his retainers was more fully confirmed by the defection of these great nobles, persevered obstinately in his purpose; and finding himself unable to give battle to the enemy, he marched northwards, with an intention of prolonging the war, and of turning to his advantage the situation of that mountainous and barren country. When Warrenne advanced to Stirling, he found Wallace encamped at Cambuskenneth, on the opposite banks of the Forth; and being continually urged by the impatient Cressingham, who was actuated both by personal and national animosities against the Scots, he prepared, notwithstanding the remonstrance of Richard Lundy, to attack them in that position, which Wallace, no less prudent than courageous, had chosen for his army. He ordered his army to pass a bridge which lay over the Forth; but he was soon convinced, by fatal experience, of the error of his conduct. Wallace, allowing such numbers of the English to pass as he thought proper, attacked them before they were fully formed, put them to rout, pushed part of them into the river, destroyed the rest by the edge of the sword, and gained a complete victory over them. Among the slain was Cressingham himself, whose memory was so extremely odious to the Scots, that they flayed his dead body, and made saddles and girths of the skin. This was on the 11h of September, 1297. Warrenne, finding the remainder of his army much dismayed by this misfortune, was obliged again to evacuate the kingdom, and retire into England. The castles of Roxborough and Berwick, ill fortified and feebly defended, fell soon into the hands of the Scots.

Wallace, universally revered as the deliverer of his country, now received from the hands of his followers the dignity of regent or guardian under the captive Baliol; and finding that the disorders of war, as well as the unfavourable seasons, had produced a famine in Scotland, he urged his army to march into England, to subsist at the expence of the enemy, and to revenge all past injuries, by retaliating on that hostile nation. The Scots, who deemed every thing possible under such a leader, joyfully attended his call. Wallace, breaking into the northern counties during the winter season, laid every place waste with fire and sword; and after extending on all sides, without opposition, the fury of his ravages as far as the bishopric of Durham, he returned, loaded with spoils, and crowned with glory, into his own country. The disorders which at that time prevailed in England, from the refractory behaviour of the constable and mareschal, made it impossible to collect an army sufficient to resist the enemy, and exposed the nation to this loss and dishonour.

The intelligence of these extraordinary events being transmitted to Edward, who was still on the continent, accelerated his return to England, where he arrived in the month of March, 1298, and was determined, by his activity and valour, not only of wiping off this disgrace, but of recovering the important conquest of Scotland, which he always regarded as the chief glory and advantage of his reign. He appeased the murmurs of his people by concessions and promises: he restored to the citizens of London the election of their own magistrates, of which they had been bereaved in the latter part of his father's reign: he ordered strict inquiry to be made concerning the corn and other goods which had been violently seized before his departure, as if he intended to pay the value to the owners: and making public professions of confirming and observing the charters, he regained the confidence of the discontented nobles. Having, by all these popular arts, acquired the affections of his people, he collected the whole military force of England, Wales, and Ireland, and marched with an army to the northern frontiers. When he arrived at Roxburgh he found himself at the head of eighty thousand foot and seven thousand horse.

Nothing could have enabled the Scots to resist but for one season so mighty a power, except an entire union among themselves; but as they were deprived of their king, whose personal qualities, even when he was present, appeared so contemptible, and had left among his subjects no principle of attachment to him or his family, factions, jealousies, and animosities arose among the great, and distracted all their councils. The elevation of Wallace, though purchased by so great merit and such eminent services, was the object of envy to the nobility, who dissatisfied at seeing a private gentleman raised above them by his rank, and still more by his glory and reputation. Wallace himself, sensible of their jealousy, and dreading the ruin of his country from those intestine discords, voluntarily resigned his authority, and retained only the command over that body of his followers, who, being accustomed to victory under his standard, refused to follow any other leader into the field. The chief power devolved on the steward of Scotland, and Cummin of Badenoch; men of eminent birth, under whom the great chieftains were more willing to serve in defence of their country. The two Scottish commanders, collecting their several forces from every quarter, fixed their station at Falkirk, and purposed there to abide the assault of the English. Wallace was at the head of a third body, which acted under his command. The Scottish army placed their pikemen along their front: lined the intervals between the three bodies with archers; and dreading the superiority of the English cavalry, endeavoured to secure their front by pallisadoes, tied together by ropes. In this disposition they expected the approach of the enemy.

The king, when he arrived in sight of the Scots, was pleased with the prospect of being able, by one decisive stroke, to determine the fortune of the war; and dividing his army also into three bodies, he led them to the attack on the 22d of July, 1298. The English archers, who began about this time to surpass those of other nations, first chased the Scottish bowmen off the field; then pouring in their arrows among the pikemen, who were cooped up within their entrenchments, threw them into disorder, and rendered the assault of the English pikemen and cavalry more easy and successful. The whole Scottish army was broken, and driven from the field with great slaughter; which the historians, attending more to the exaggerated relations of the populace than to the probability of things, make amount to fifty or sixty thousand men. It is only certain that the Scots never suffered a greater loss in any action, nor one which seemed to threaten more inevitable ruin to their country. In this general rout of the army, Wallace's military skill and presence of mind enabled him to keep his troops entire; and retiring behind the Carron, he marched leisurely along the banks of that small river, which protected him from the enemy. After the battle of Falkirk the king passed some time at Stirling for the recovery of his health, while his troops were employed in ravaging the country, and reducing the towns of Perth and St. Andrew's to ashes. He then directed his march westward, and found the castle of Ayr abandoned and burnt by Robert Bruce, who had once more forsaken the English interest. Edward would have pursued this wavering chieftain into Galloway; but was prevented by a scarcity of provisions: he therefore continued his march through the Forest of Selkirk to Annandale, where he reduced the castle of Lochmaban, and from thence proceeded to Carlisle. The subjection of Scotland, however, was not yet completed. The English army, after reducing the southern provinces, was obliged to retire, and left the northern counties in the hands of the natives.

The

The Scots had by this time begun to recover from the consternation into which they had been thrown by the victory of Falkirk; and, being determined to renew the contest for their independence, had collected a body of troops, and invested the castle of Stirling. In order to hinder that important fortress from falling into their hands, Edward set out to join his army in the north, soon after his marriage with the princess Margaret of France; but when he arrived at Berwick, his barons, discontented with his neglect to perform the promises he had made them, refused to proceed into Scotland, under a pretence that the season was too far advanced for such an expedition: the king therefore was constrained to disband his troops, after sending permission to the garrison of Stirling Castle to surrender on the best terms they could procure. But as he had resolved to persevere in the conquest of Scotland, he found it necessary to remove the discontents of his barons; and for that purpose he summoned a parliament to meet at London in Lent, 1300. He there solemnly confirmed the two charters; and the sheriffs throughout England were ordered to publish them in the courts of justice every quarter. Farther securities were likewise provided for the establishment of national privileges. Three knights were appointed to be chosen in each county, who were invested with the power of punishing, by fine and imprisonment, every violation of the charters. But in order to execute the Charter of Forests, it was requisite by new perambulations to ascertain the exact boundaries of the royal forest, and to disafforest all lands which former encroachments had comprehended within their limits: for this purpose he issued writs to the sheriffs; and the boundaries were fixed by a jury in each county.

Having adopted these popular measures, he assembled his army about midsummer; and, entering the west of Scotland, took some castles, and penetrated into Galloway; where a petition was presented to him from the guardians and community of the realm, requesting he would permit their lawful sovereign, John Baliol, to return to his dominions, and reign over them in peace; and allow the Scottish nobles to redeem their lands from the English, to whom they had been granted. This curious petition, as might naturally have been supposed, was rejected with disdain.

Edward's progress was interrupted by the presence of the archbishop of Canterbury, who arrived in the English camp on the 26th of August, and presented to the king a letter which he had received from the pope. The Scots, during Edward's negociation with the king of France, had endeavoured, by application to foreign courts, to procure some assistance. Though Philip had rejected their supplications, the Scottish ministers had experienced greater success with the court of Rome. Boniface, pleased with an occasion of exerting his authority, wrote a letter to Edward, exhorting him to desist from his oppressions in Scotland; and displaying all the proofs, such as had probably been furnished him by the Scots themselves, for the ancient independence of that kingdom. Among other arguments, he mentioned the treaty conducted and finished by Edward himself, for the marriage of his son with the heiress of Scotland; a treaty which would have been absurd, had he been superior lord of the kingdom, and had possessed, by the provisions of the feudal law, the right of disposing of his ward in marriage. He enumerated several other striking facts, which fell within the compass of Edward's own knowledge; particularly, that Alexander, when he did homage to the king, openly and expressly declared in his presence, that he swore fealty not for his crown, but for the lands which he held in England: and the pope's letter might have passed for a reasonable one, had he not in being thus strenuous to confute the pretensions of Edward, subjoined his own claim to be liege lord of Scotland.

The extreme absurdity and imprudence of this claim, certainly not less unjust than the other, must have excited surprize equal to the indignation it inspired, had it issued from any other quarter; but the papal ambition had been so accustomed to soar on the wings of injustice, that no flight it could take, however lofty, or into regions hitherto unexplored, was able to create the smallest astonishment. His holiness pretended to derive this curious claim to the feudal sovereignty of Scotland from the most remote antiquity; and it was certainly a proof of his sagacity to place its foundation in times immemorial—in times that not only defied the exertions of memory, but rendered abortive the most laborious researches of plain temporal sense, unassisted by spiritual inspiration. But he seems to have deviated from his accustomed policy, in boldly asserting, that the justice of his claim was notorious, and its validity fully supported by prescription, when not a man in the kingdom had ever heard of its existence. He surely should have been content to rest his right in the mere antiquity of his claim, and have imputed its apparent novelty to the meekness and forbearance of his predecessors; and more especially to the mild, gentle, and unaspiring soul of the pious Hildebrand, whose mind, wholly absolved in spiritual contemplations, deigned not to bestow one solitary thought on the vain treasures of the earth; but, continually bent on the deity, recollecting that "all his paths are paths of peace," and encouraged by the benedictions of his Redeemer on the promoters of concord, wisely forbore to engage in terrestrial disputes; and rather chose to forego his pretensions, though founded in justice, or suffer claims of acknowledged validity to lie dormant, than by his powerful interference to give birth to discord, scatter desolation over the land, and deluge the plains with the blood of his fellow creatures.

It is somewhat extraordinary that arguments, such as Boniface advanced in support of his claim, should have been productive of considerable trouble both to the king and to his ministers. After some time passed in collecting materials for an answer to his holiness, they laid the affair before the parliament, which assembled at Lincoln on the 23th of January, 1301. The English barons, inspired with indignation at the presumption of a foreign priest, in summoning their sovereign to appear before him—for the pope had cited Edward to appear and plead his cause, either in person or by deputy, in his presence, before the expiration of six months—unanimously declared that they would not suffer their king to submit to such an indignity. A deed expressive of their sentiments, dated at Lincoln the 12th of February, was signed and sealed by one hundred and four of the temporal barons in the name of the whole parliament of England. Edward also made a reply, in his own name, to the letter of Boniface; which contains particulars no less singular and remarkable. He attempts to prove the superiority of England by historical facts, deduced from the period of Brutus the Trojan, who, he said, founded the British monarchy in the age of Eli and Samuel: he supports his position by all the events which passed in the island before the arrival of the Romans: and after laying great stress on the extensive dominions and heroic victories of king Arthur, he vouchsafes at last to descend to the time of Edward the Elder, with which, in his first speech to the states of Scotland, he had chosen to begin his claim of superiority. He asserts it to be a fact, "notorious and confirmed by the records of antiquity," that the English monarchs had often conferred the kingdom of Scotland on their own subjects; had dethroned these vassal kings when unfaithful to them; and had substituted others in their stead. He displays with great pomp the full and complete homage which William had done to Henry II., but forbears to mention the formal abolition of that extorted deed by king Richard, and the renunciation of all future claims of the same nature. Yet this paper he hypocritically begins with a solemn appeal to the Almighty, the searcher of hearts, for his own firm persuasion of the justice of his claim; and the barons assembled in parliament at Lincoln, concur in maintaining before the pope, under their seals, the validity of these pretensions. At the same time, however, they take care to inform Boniface, that, though they had justified their cause before him, they did not acknowledge him for their judge: they had sworn to maintain all its royal prerogatives, and would never permit the king himself, were he willing, to relinquish its independence.

That neglect, almost total, of truth and justice, which sovereign states discover in their transactions with each other, is an evil universal and inveterate; is one great source of the misery to which the human race is continually exposed; and it may be doubted whether, in many instances, it be found in the end to contribute to the interests of those princes themselves, who thus sacrifice their integrity to their politics. As few monarchs have lain under stronger temptations to violate the principles of equity, than Edward in his transactions with Scotland; so never were they violated with less scruple and reserve: yet his advantages were hitherto precarious and uncertain; and the Scots, once roused to arms and enured to war, began to appear a formidable enemy, even to this military and ambitious monarch.

At the time when the primate delivered the pope's letter to his sovereign, Edward, whose troops were in great distress from a scarcity of provisions, had marched them back into England, and granted the Scots a truce from the 30th of October to Whitsunday in the following year. That time being now expired, he re-entered Scotland about Midsummer, attended by his son, the prince of Wales, and a powerful army. The Scots, being in no condition to hazard a battle, retired to their woods and mountains, contenting themselves with making excursions, in which they sometimes cut off detached parties of the English, and intercepted some convoys of provisions. Thus the whole campaign was passed without any action of importance; and Edward retired to Linlithgow at the approach of winter, where he signed a truce with the Scots, on the 26th of January, 1301, that was to continue till the 30th of November following. At the expiration of this second truce, he sent an army into Scotland under the command of John de Segrave, one of the most celebrated warriors of that age. This general divided his forces into three bodies, that marched at the distance of some miles from each other; and, as he expected no opposition, he advanced with the most careless security as far as Roslin, in the vicinity of Edinburgh. There he was attacked unexpectedly by the Scottish army, under the command of John Cummin, the regent, and sir Simon Frazer, who soon put his first division to flight, and pursued them with great slaughter. The few that escaped, flying to the second division, gave warning of the approach of the enemy: the soldiers ran to their arms; and were immediately led on to take revenge for the death of their countrymen. The Scots, elated with the advantage already obtained, made a vigorous impression upon them: the English, animated with a thirst of vengeance, maintained a stout resistance: the victory was long undecided between them; but at last declared itself entirely in favour of the former, who broke the English and chased them to the third division, now advancing with a hasty march to support their distressed companions. Many of the Scots had fallen in the two first actions; most of them were wounded; and all of them extremely fatigued by the long continuance of the combat: yet were they so transported with success and military rage, that, having suddenly recovered their order, and arming the followers of their camp with the spoils of the slaughtered enemy, they drove with fury upon the ranks of the dismayed English. The favourable moment decided the battle; which the Scots, had they met with a steady resistance, were not long able to maintain: the English were chased off the field: three victories were thus gained in one day: and the renown of these great exploits, seconded by the favourable dispositions of the people, soon made the regent master of all the fortresses in the south; and it became necessary for Edward to begin anew the conquest of the kingdom.

The Scots, independent of the advantages they had recently obtained, derived some encouragement from their hopes of assistance from France; but these were speedily defeated by a treaty of peace that was concluded on the 20th of May, 1303, between the kings of England and France, in which the Scots were totally neglected.

The king, having now no other enemies to contend with, prepared for this enterprize with his usual vigour and abilities. He assembled both a great fleet and a great army; and entering the frontiers of Scotland, appeared with a force which the enemy could not think of resisting in the open field: the English navy, which sailed along the coast, secured the army from any danger of famine: Edward's vigilance preserved it from surprizes; and by this prudent disposition they marched victorious from one extremity of the kingdom to the other, ravaging the open country, reducing all the castles, and receiving the submissions of all the nobility, even those of Cummin the regent. The most obstinate resistance was made by the castle of Brechin, defended by sir Thomas Maule; the place sustained a regular siege, and for some time defied all the efforts of the English to reduce it, and its gates were not opened, till the death of the governor by discouraging the garrison, obliged them to submit to the fate which had overwhelmed the rest of the kingdom. Wallace, though he attended the English army in their march, found but few opportunities of signalizing that valour which had formerly made him so terrible to his enemies.

Edward having completed his conquest, which employed him during the space of near two years, now undertook the more difficult work of settling the country, of establishing a new form of government, and of making his acquisition durable to the crown of England. He seems to have carried matters to extremity against the natives: he abrogated all the Scottish laws and customs: he endeavoured to substitute the English in their place: he entirely rased or destroyed all the monuments of antiquity: such records or histories as had escaped his former search were now burnt or dispersed; and he hastened, by too precipitate steps, to abolish entirely the Scottish name, and to sink it finally in the English.

Edward, however, still deemed his favourite conquest exposed to some danger, so long as Wallace was alive; and being prompted both by revenge and policy, he employed every art to discover his retreat, and become master of his person. At last, that hardy warrior, who was determined, amidst the universal slavery of his countrymen, still to maintain his independency, was betrayed into Edward's hands by sir John Monteith (b), his friend, whom he had made acquainted with the place of his concealment (c).

This heroic captive was immediately conveyed to London, and, on the day after his arrival, was brought to his trial at Westminster Hall. Being accused of treason, he pleaded "Not Guilty," though he objected at the same time to the competency of the court; he expatiated on the injustice and absurdity of preferring an accusation of treason against him, when he had never made submissions, swore fealty, or in any way acknowledged the sovereignty of that prince against whom the treason was said to be committed: he farther affirmed, that as he was a free-born native of an independent kingdom, he could not be deemed subject to the laws of a foreign country. But Edward, being enraged at some acts of violence committed by Wallace during the fury of war, had resolved to overawe the Scots by an example of severity: the judges therefore overruled a plea that should have been received as unanswerable, and condemned Wallace to die the death of a traitor. He was accordingly executed on Tower Hill on the 23rd of August, 1305. The conduct of Edward in this particular must reflect disgrace on his memory: brave and magnanimous himself, he should have respected similar qualities in an enemy, nor have suffered the voice of Revenge to silence the dictates of Justice. Though the character of Wallace has been variously represented, yet his actions must convince every impartial mind that his courage was intrepid, his patriotism ardent, and his integrity incorruptible.

But the barbarous policy of Edward failed of the purpose to which it was directed. The Scots, already disgusted at the great innovations introduced by the sword of a conqueror into their laws and government, were farther enraged at the injustice and cruelty exercised upon Wallace; and all the envy which, during his life-time, had attended that gallant chief, being now buried in his grave, he was universally regarded as the champion of Scotland, and the patron of her expiring independency. The people, inflamed with resentment, were every where disposed to rise against the English government; and it was not long ere a new and more fortunate leader presented himself, who conducted them to liberty, to victory, and to vengeance.

Robert Bruce, grandson of that Robert who had been one of the competitors for the crown, had succeeded, by his grandfather's and father's death, to all their rights; and the demise of John Baliol, together with the captivity of Edward, eldest son of that prince, seemed to open a full career to the aspiring genius of this young nobleman. He saw that the Scots, while the title to their crown had expired in the males of their ancient royal family, had been divided into parties nearly equal between the houses of Bruce and Baliol; and that every incident, which had since happened, had tended to wean them from any attachment to the latter. The slender capacity of John had proved unable to defend them against their enemies: he had meanly resigned his crown into the hands of the conqueror: he had, before his deliverance from captivity, reiterated that resignation in a manner seemingly voluntary; and had in that deed thrown out many reflections extremely dishonourable to his ancient subjects, whom he publicly called traitors, ruffians, and rebels, and with whom he declared he was determined to maintain no farther correspondence spondence: he had, during the time of his exile, adhered strictly to that resolution; and his son, being a prisoner, seemed ill qualified to revive the rights, now fully abandoned, of his family. Bruce therefore hoped that the Scots, so long exposed from the want of a leader to the oppressions of their enemies, would unanimously fly to his standard, and seat him on the vacant throne, to which he brought such plausible pretensions. His aspiring spirit, inflamed by the fervour of youth, and buoyed up by his natural courage, saw the glory alone of the enterprize, or regarded the prodigious difficulties which attended it, as the source only of farther glory. The miseries and oppressions which he had beheld his countrymen suffer in their unequal contest; the repeated defeats and misfortunes which they had undergone; proved to him so many incentives to bring them relief, and conduct them to vengeance against the haughty victor. The circumstances which attended Bruce's first declaration are variously related; but we shall rather follow the account given by the Scottish historians; not that their authority is in general anywise comparable to that of the English, but because they may be supposed sometimes better informed concerning facts which so nearly interested their own nation.

Bruce, who had long harboured in his breast the design of freeing his enslaved country, ventured at last to open his mind to John Cummin, earl of Badenoch, a powerful nobleman, with whom he lived in strict intimacy. He found his friend, as he imagined, fully possessed with the same sentiments; and he needed to employ no arts of persuasion to make him embrace the resolution of throwing off, on the first favourable opportunity, the usurped dominion of the English. But on the departure of Bruce, who attended Edward to London, Cummin, who either had all along dissembled with him, or began to reflect more coolly in his absence on the desperate nature of his undertaking, resolved to atone for his crime in assenting to this rebellion, by the merit of revealing the secret to the king of England. Edward did not immediately commit Bruce to custody; because he intended at the same time to seize his three brothers, who resided in Scotland; and he contented himself with secretly setting spies upon him, and ordering all his motions to be strictly watched. A nobleman of Edward's court, Bruce's intimate friend, was apprized of his danger; but not daring, amidst so many jealous eyes, to hold any conversation with him, he fell on an expedient to give him warning, that it was full time he should make his escape. He sent him by his servant a pair of gilt spurs, and a purse of gold, which he pretended to have borrowed from him; and left it to the sagacity of his friend to discover the meaning of the present. Bruce immediately contrived the means of his escape; and as the ground was at that time covered with snow, he had the precaution, it is said, to order his horses to be shod with their shoes inverted, that he might deceive those who should track his path over the open fields or cross roads, through which he purposed to travel. He arrived in a few days at his own castle at Lochmaban, where he communicated the treachery of Cummin to some particular friends; and being told that Cummin was at Dumfries, in Annandale, the chief seat of his family interest, he repaired thither, where he found a great number of the Scottish nobility assembled, and among the rest, John Cummin, his former associate.

The noblemen were astonished at the appearance of Bruce among them on the 10th of February; and still more when he discovered to them the object of his journey. He told them that he was come to live or die with them in defence of the liberties of his country, and hoped, with their assistance, to redeem the Scottish name from all the indignities which it had so long suffered from the tyranny of their imperious masters: that the sacrifice of the rights of his family was the first injury which had prepared the way for their ensuing slavery; and by resuming them, which was his firm purpose, he opened to them the joyful prospect of recovering from the fraudulent usurper their ancient and hereditary independence: that all past misfortunes had proceeded from their disunion; and they would soon appear no less formidable than of old to their enemies, if they now deigned to follow into the field their rightful prince, who knew no medium between death and victory: that their mountains, and their valour, which had, during so many ages, procured their liberty from all the efforts of the Roman empire, would still be sufficient, were they worthy of their generous ancestors, to defend them against the utmost violence of the English tyrant: that it was unbecoming men, born to the most ancient independence known in Europe, to submit to the will of any masters; but fatal to receive those who, being irritated by such persevering resistance, and inflamed with the highest animosity, would never deem themselves secure in their usurped dominion, but by exterminating all the ancient nobility, and even all the ancient inhabitants; and that, being reduced to this desperate extremity, it were better for them at once to perish, like brave men, with swords in their hands, than to dread long, and at last undergo the fate of the unfortunate Wallace, whose merits, in the brave and obstinate defence of his country, were finally rewarded by the hands of an English executioner.

The spirit with which this discourse was delivered, the bold sentiments which it conveyed, the novelty of Bruce's declaration, assisted by the graces of his youth and manly deportment, made deep impression on the minds of his audience, and roused all those principles of indignation and revenge with which they had long been secretly actuated. The Scottish nobles declared their unanimous resolution to use their utmost efforts in delivering their country from bondage, and to second the courage of Bruce, in asserting his and their undoubted rights against their common oppressors. Cummin alone, who had secretly taken his measures with the king, opposed this general determination; and by representing the great power of England, governed by a prince of such uncommon vigour and abilities, he endeavoured to set before them the certain destruction which they must expect, if they again violated their oaths of fealty, and shook off their allegiance to the victorious Edward. Bruce, already apprized of his treachery, and foreseeing the certain failure of all his own schemes of ambition and glory from the opposition of so potent a leader, took immediately his resolution; and moved partly by resentment, partly by policy, followed Cummin on the dissolution of the assembly, attacked him in the cloysters of the Grey Friars, through which he passed, and running him through the body, left him for dead. Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick, one of Bruce's friends, asking him soon after if the traitor was slain; "I believe so," replied Bruce. "And is that a matter," cried Kirkpatrick, "to be left to conjecture? I will secure him." Upon which he drew his dagger, ran to Cummin, and stabbed him to the heart (d).

The murder of Cummin affixed the seal to the conspiracy of the Scottish nobles: they had now no resource left but to shake off the yoke of England, or to perish in the attempt: the genius of the nation roused itself from its present dejection; and Bruce, flying to different quarters, excited his partizans to arms, attacked with success the dispersed bodies of the English, got possession of many of the castles, and having caused his authority to be acknowledged in most parts of the kingdom, was solemnly crowned and inaugurated in the abbey of Scone by the bishop of St. Andrews, (who had zealously embraced his cause,) on the 27th of March, 1306. The English were again chased out of the kingdom, except such as took shelter in the fortresses that still remained in their hands; and Edward found that the Scots, twice conquered in his reign, and often defeated, must yet be anew subdued. Not discouraged with these unexpected difficulties, he sent Aymer de Valence with a considerable force into Scotland, to check the progress of the malcontents; and that nobleman falling unexpectedly upon Bruce at Methven, in Perthshire, threw his army into such disorder as ended in a total defeat. Bruce fought with the most heroic courage, was thrice dismounted in the action, and as often recovered himself; but was at length obliged to yield to superior fortune, and take shelter, with a few followers, in the western isles. The earl of Athole, sir Simon Frazer, and sir Christopher Seton, who had been taken prisoners, were ordered by Edward to be executed as rebels and traitors. Many other acts of rigour were exercised by him; and that prince, vowing revenge against the whole Scottish nation, whom he deemed incorrigible in their aversion to his government, assembled a great army, and was preparing to enter the frontiers, sure of success, and determined to make the defenceless Scots the victims of his severity. About this time he was severely attacked with a dysentery, which confined him to his chamber, and a report was propagated that he was actually dead. To disprove it he departed from Carlisle on the 3rd of July, but the disorder rendered him so feeble that he was able to travel only three miles the first day. After a day's repose he renewed his journey, reached Burgh on the Sands, about five miles from Carlisle, on the 5th, and there expired in his tent, on the 7th of that month, 1307; enjoining with his last breath his son and successor to prosecute the enterprize, and never to desist till he had finally subdued the kingdom of Scotland. He expired in the sixty-ninth year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign, hated by his neighbours, but extremely respected and revered by his own subjects (e).

(d) This deed of Bruce and his associates, which contains circumstances justly condemned by our present manners, was regarded in that age as an effort of manly vigour and just policy. The family of Kirkpatrick took for the crest of their arms, which they still wear, a hand with a bloody dagger; and chose for their motto these words, "I will secure him;" the expression employed by their ancestor when he executed that violent action.

The enterprizes finished by this prince, and the projects which he formed, and brought near to a conclusion, were more prudent, more regularly conducted, and more advantageous to the solid interests of his kingdom, than those which were undertaken in any reign, either of his ancestors or his successors. He restored authority to the government, disordered by the weakness of his father; he maintained the laws against all the efforts of his turbulent barons; he fully annexed to his crown the principality of Wales; he took many wise and vigorous measures for reducing Scotland to a like condition; and though the equity of this latter enterprize may reasonably be questioned, the circumstances of the two kingdoms promised such certain success, and the advantage was so visible of uniting the whole island under one head, that those who give great indulgence to reasons of state in the measures of princes, will not be apt to regard this part of his conduct with much severity. But Edward, however exceptionable his character may appear on the head of justice, is the model of a politic and warlike king: he possessed industry, penetration, courage, vigilance, and enterprize: he was frugal in all expences that were not necessary; he knew how to open the public treasures on a proper occasion; he punished criminals with severity; he was gracious and affable to his servants, and courtiers; and being of a majestic figure, expert in all military exercises, and in the main well-proportioned in his limbs, notwithstanding the great length and the smallness of his legs, (by which he obtained the appellation of Long Shanks,) he was as well qualified to captivate the populace by his exterior appearance, as to gain the approbation of men of sense by his more solid virtues.

The chief advantage which the people of England reaped, and still continue to reap, from the reign of this great prince, was the correction, extension, amendment, and establishment of the laws, which Edward maintained in great vigour, and left much improved to posterity: for the acts of a wise legislator commonly remain, while the acquisitions of a conqueror often perish with him. This merit has justly gained to Edward the appellation of the English Justinian. Not only the numerous statutes passed in his reign touch the chief points of jurisprudence, and, according to Sir Edward Coke (f), truly deserve the name of establishments, because they were more constant, standing, and durable laws than any made since; but the regular order maintained in his administration gave an opportunity to the common law to refine itself, and brought the judges to a certainty in their determinations, and the lawyers to a precision in their pleadings. Sir Matthew Hale has remarked the sudden improvement of English law during this reign; and ventures to assert, that till his own time it had never received any considerable increase (g). Edward settled the jurisdiction of the several courts; first established the office of justice of peace; abstained from the practice too common before him, of interrupting justice by mandates from the privy-council (h); repressed robberies and disorders (i); encouraged trade, by giving merchants an easy method of recovering their debts (k); and, in short, introduced a new face of things by the vigour and wisdom of his administration. As law began now to be well established, the abuse of that blessing began also to be remarked. Instead of their former associations for robbery and violence, men entered into formal combinations to support each other in law-suits; and it was found requisite to check this iniquity by act of parliament (l).

There happened in this reign a considerable alteration in the execution of the laws: the king abolished the office of chief justiciary, which he thought possessed too much power, and was dangerous to the crown (m): he completed the division of the court of exchequer into four distinct courts, which managed each its several branch, without dependence on any one magistrate; and as the lawyers afterwards invented a method, by means of their fictions, of carrying business from one court to another, the several courts became rivals and checks to each other; a circumstance which tended much to improve the practice of the law in England.

But though Edward appeared thus, throughout his whole reign, a friend to law and justice, it cannot be said that he was an enemy to arbitrary power; and in a government more regular and legal than was that of England in his age, such practices as those which may be remarked in his administration, would have given sufficient ground of complaint, and sometimes were, even in his age, the object of general displeasure. The violent plunder and banishment of the Jews; the putting of the whole clergy at once, and by an arbitrary edict, out of the protection of law; the seizing of all the wool and leather of the kingdom; the heightening of the impositions on the former valuable commodity; the new and illegal commission of Trailbaston; the taking of all the money and plate of monasteries and churches, even before he had any quarrel with the clergy; the subjecting of every man possessed of twenty pounds a year to military service, though not bound to it by his tenure; his visible reluctance to confirm the Great Charter, as if that concession had no validity from the deeds of his predecessors; the captious clause which he at last annexed to his confirmation; his procuring of the pope's dispensation from the oaths which he had taken to observe that charter; and his levying of talliages at discretion even after the statute, or rather charter, by which he had renounced that prerogative; these are so many demonstrations of his arbitrary disposition, and prove with what exception and reserve we ought to celebrate his love of justice. He took care that his subjects should do justice to each other; but he desired always to have his own hands free in all transactions, both with them and with his neighbours.

The chief obstacle to the execution of justice in those times was the power of the great barons; and Edward was perfectly qualified, by his character and abilities, for keeping these tyrants in awe, and restraining their illegal practices. This salutary purpose was accordingly the great object of his attention; yet was he imprudently led into a measure which tended to increase and confirm their dangerous authority. He passed a statute which, by allowing them to entail their estates, made it impracticable to diminish the property of the great families, and left them every means of increase and acquisition (n).

Edward observed a contrary policy with regard to the church: he seems to have been the first Christian prince that passed a statute of mortmain; and prevented by law the clergy from making new acquisitions of lands, which by the ecclesiastical canons they were for ever prohibited from alienating. The opposition between his maxims with regard to the nobility and to the ecclesiastics, leads us to conjecture that it was only by chance he passed the beneficial statute of mortmain, and that his sole object was to maintain the number of knights' fees, and to prevent the superiors from being defrauded of the profits of wardship, marriage, livery, and other emoluments arising from the feudal tenures. This is indeed the reason assigned in the statute itself, and appears to have been his real object in (e) Edward had by his first wife, Eleanor of Castile, four sons; but Edward, his heir and successor, was the only one that survived him. She also bore him eleven daughters, most of whom died in their infancy: of the surviving, Joan was married first to Gilbert, earl of Gloucester, and after his death to Ralph de Monthermer: Margaret espoused John duke of Brabant: Elizabeth espoused first John, earl of Holland, and afterwards Humphrey de Bohun, earl of Hereford: Mary was a nun at Ambresbury. He had by his second wife Margaret of France, two sons and a daughter; Thomas, created earl of Norfolk, and mareschal of England; and Edmund, who was created earl of Kent by his brother when king. The princess died in her infancy.

The multitude of these letters of protection were the ground of a complaint by the commons in 3 Edward II. See Ryley, p. 525. This practice is declared illegal by the statute of Northampton, passed in the second of Edward III. but it still continued, like many other abuses. There are instances of it so late as the reign of queen Elizabeth.

enacting it. The author of the annals of Waverly ascribes this act chiefly to the king's anxiety for maintaining the military force of the kingdom; but adds that he was mistaken in his purpose; for that the Amalekites were overcome more by the prayers of Moses than by the sword of the Israelites. The statute of mortmain was often evaded afterwards by the invention of uses.

Edward was active in restraining the usurpations of the church; and, excepting his ardour for crusades, which adhered to him during his whole life, seems in other respects to have been little infected with superstition, the vice chiefly of weak minds. But the passion for crusades was really in that age the passion for glory. As the pope now felt himself somewhat more restrained in his former practice of pillaging the several churches in Europe, by laying impositions upon them, he permitted the generals of particular orders, who resided at Rome, to levy taxes on the convents subjected to their jurisdiction; and Edward was obliged to enact a law against this new abuse. It was also become a practice of the court of Rome to provide successors to benefices before they became vacant: Edward found it likewise necessary to prevent by law this species of injustice.

The tribute of one thousand marks a year, to which king John, in doing homage to the pope had subjected the kingdom, had been pretty regularly paid since his time, though the vassalage was constantly denied, and, indeed, for fear of giving offence, had been but little insisted on. The payment was called by a new name of census, not by that of tribute. King Edward seems to have always paid this money with great reluctance, and he suffered the arrears at one time to run on for six years (o), at another for eleven (p); but as princes in that age stood continually in need of the pope's good offices, for dispensations of marriage and for other concessions, the court of Rome always found means, sooner or later, to get possession of the money. The levying of first-fruits was also a new device begun in this reign, by which his holiness thrust his fingers very frequently into the purses of the faithful; and the king seems to have unwarily given way to it.

In the former reign the taxes had been partly scutages, partly such a proportional part of the moveables as was granted by parliament: in this scutages were entirely dropped; and the assessment on moveables was the chief method of taxation. Edward in his fourth year had a fifteenth granted him; in his fifth year a twelfth; in his eleventh year a thirtieth from the laity, a twentieth from the clergy; in his eighteenth year a fifteenth, in his twenty-second year a tenth from the laity, a sixth from London and other corporate towns, half of their benefices from the clergy; in his twenty-third year an eleventh from the barons and others, a tenth from the clergy, a seventh from the burgesses; in his twenty-fourth year a twelfth from the barons and others, an eighth from the burgesses, from the clergy nothing, because of the pope's inhibition; in his twenty-fifth year an eighth from the laity, a tenth from the clergy of Canterbury, a fifth from those of York; in his twenty-ninth year a fifteenth from the laity, on account of his confirming the perambulations of the forests; the clergy granted nothing; in his thirty-third year, first a thirtieth from the barons and others, and a twentieth from the burgesses, then a fifteenth from all his subjects; in his thirty-fourth year a thirtieth from all his subjects for knighting his eldest son.

These taxes were moderate; but the king had also duties upon exportation and importation granted him from time to time: the heaviest were commonly upon wool. Poundage, or a shilling a pound, was not regularly granted the kings for life till the reign of Henry V.

In 1296 the famous mercantile society, called the "Merchant Adventurers," had its first origin: it was instituted for the improvement of the woollen manufacture, and the vending of the cloth abroad, particularly at Antwerp (q). For the English at this time scarcely thought of any more distant commerce.

This king granted a charter or declaration of protection and privileges to foreign merchants, and also ascertained the customs or duties which those merchants were in return to pay on merchandize imported and exported. He promised them security; allowed them a jury on trials, consisting half of natives, half of foreigners; and appointed them a justiciary in London for their protection. But notwithstanding this seeming attention to foreign merchants, Edward did not free them from the cruel hardship of making one answerable for the debts, and even for the crimes, of another that came from the same country (r). We read of such practices among the present barbarous nations. The king also imposed on them a duty of two shillings on each tun of wine imported, over and above the old duty; and forty pence on each sack of wool exported, besides half a mark on the former duty (s).

In the year 1303 the Exchequer was robbed, and of no less a sum than one hundred thousand pounds, as is pretended (t). The abbot and monks of Westminster were indicted for this robbery, but acquitted. It does not appear that the king ever discovered the criminals with certainty; though his indignation fell on the society of Lombard merchants, particularly the Frescobaldi, very opulent Florentines.

The pope having, in 1307, collected much money in England, the king enjoined the nuncio not to export it in specie, but in bills of exchange (u). A proof that commerce was but ill understood at that time.

CHAP. VI.

EDWARD II.

THE prepossessions entertained in favour of Edward the Second kept the English from being fully sensible of the loss which they had sustained by the death of his father; and all men came with alacrity to take the oath of allegiance to his son and successor. This prince was in the twenty-third year of his age, of an agreeable figure, of a mild and gentle disposition, and having never discovered a propensity to any dangerous vice, it was natural to prognosticate tranquillity and happiness from his government. But the first act of his reign blasted all these hopes, and shewed him to be totally unqualified for that perilous situation, in which every English monarch, during those ages, had, (from the unstable form of the constitution, and the turbulent dispositions of the people derived from it,) the misfortune to be placed. The indefatigable Robert Bruce, though his army had been dispersed, and himself had been obliged to take shelter in the western isles, remained not long inactive; but before the death of the late king, had sallied from his retreat, had again collected his followers, had appeared in the field, and had obtained by surprize an important advantage over Aymer de Valence, who commanded the English forces. He was now become so considerable as to have afforded the king of England sufficient glory in subduing him, without incurring any danger of seeing all those mighty preparations made by his father fail in the enterprize. But Edward, having passed three weeks at Carlisle in receiving the homage of his barons and other military tenants of the crown, began his march to Scotland on the first of August, 1307, and on his arrival at Dumfries, received the oath of fealty from such of the Scottish nobles as chose to obey the citation he had previously issued for their attendance. But, far from pursuing the vigorous measures adopted by his father for the reduction of Bruce and his adherents, he advanced no farther than Cumnock, in the shire of Ayr, and having staid there but a few days, appointed Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, guardian of Scotland; and returned to England himself in the beginning of September, after disbanding a considerable part of his army. His grandees perceived from this conduct, that the authority of the crown, fallen into such feeble hands, was no longer to be dreaded, and that every insolence might be practised by them with impunity.

The next measure taken by Edward, during his residence at Dumfries, gave them an inclination to attack those prerogatives which no longer kept them in awe. There was one Piers Gavaston, son of a Gascon knight of some distinction, who had honourably served the late king, and who, in reward of his merits, had obtained an establishment for his son in the family of the prince of Wales. This young man soon insinuated himself into the affections of his master, by his agreeable behaviour, and by supplying him with all those innocent, though frivolous amusements which suited his capacity and his inclinations. He was endowed with the utmost elegance of shape and person, was noted for a fine mien and easy carriage, distinguished himself in all warlike and genteel exercises, and was celebrated for those quick sallies of wit in which his countrymen usually excel. By all these accomplishments he gained so entire an ascendant over young Edward, whose heart was strongly disposed to friendship and confidence, that the late king, apprehensive of the consequences, had banished him the kingdom, and had, before he died, made his son promise never to recal him. But no sooner did he find himself master, as he vainly imagined, than he sent for Gavaston; and even before his arrival at court, endowed him with the whole earldom of Cornwall, which had escheated to the crown by the death of Edmund, son of Richard, king of the Romans. Not content with conferring on him those possessions, which had sufficed as an appanage for a prince of the blood, he daily loaded him with new honours and riches; married him to his own niece, sister to the earl of Gloucester; and seemed to enjoy no pleasure in his royal dignity, but as it enabled him to exalt to the highest splendour this object of his affections. Actuated by the counsels of this foreign favourite, he displaced all his principal ministers: the chancellor, treasurer, judges, and barons of the Exchequer, were removed, and their offices conferred on the creatures of Gavaston. Langton, bishop of Litchfield, was committed to prison; and the temporalities of his see were sequestered, until his conduct and management of the treasury during the late reign could be fully investigated: while Gavaston himself, being appointed great chamberlain and secretary of state, governed the whole kingdom as prime minister.

The haughty barons, offended at the superiority of a minion, whose birth, though reputable, they despised as much inferior to their own, concealed not their discontent; and soon found reasons to justify their animosity in the character and conduct of the man they hated. Instead of disarming envy by the moderation and modesty of his behaviour, Gavaston displayed his power and influence with the utmost ostentation; and deemed no circumstance of his good fortune so agreeable as its enabling him to eclipse and mortify all his rivals. He was vain-glorious, profuse, rapacious; fond of exterior pomp and appearance, giddy with prosperity; and as he imagined that his fortune was now as strongly rooted in the kingdom, as his ascendant was uncontrolled over the weak monarch, he was negligent in engaging partizans, who might support his sudden and ill-established grandeur. At all tournaments he took delight in foiling the English nobility by his superior address: in every conversation he made them the object of his wit and raillery: every day his enemies multiplied upon him; and nought was wanting but a little time to cement their union, and render it fatal both to him and to his master.

The king now determined to take a journey to France, both in order to do homage for the duchy of Guienne, and to espouse the princess Isabella, to whom he had long been affianced, though unexpected accidents had hitherto retarded the completion of the marriage. Edward left Gavaston guardian of the realm, with a power to grant congés d'elire for ministers of cathedral and conventual churches; to receive the oaths from prelates at their election; to restore temporalities; to dispose of the prebendaries and benefices that were in the gift of the crown; and to bestow such wardships as might fall during the king's residence on the continent. Regardless of the murmurs excited by this imprudent mark of attachment to a foreigner, Edward crossed the sea to Boulogne in the month of January, 1308, where he did homage to the king of France for the duchy of Guienne; and the next day his nuptials were celebrated with great magnificence. Having feasted some days with the kings of France, Navarre, and Sicily, who assisted at his marriage, he returned to England on the 7th of February, with his consort, and a splendid train of French nobility: their coronation was performed in Westminster Abbey, on the 25th of the same month, by the bishops of Winchester, Salisbury, and Chichester, commissioned by Winchelsea the primate, whose suspension had been removed by the pope at the intercession of Edward; though he was prevented by sickness from assisting at the ceremony.

On his return with his young queen, Edward renewed all the proofs of that fond attachment to the favourite, of which every one so loudly complained. This princess was of an imperious and intriguing spirit; and finding that her husband's capacity required, as his temper inclined, him to be governed, she thought herself best intitled, on every account, to perform the office; and she contracted a mortal hatred against the person who had disappointed her in these expectations. She was well pleased, therefore, to see a combination of the nobility forming against Gavaston, who, sensible of her hatred, had wantonly provoked her by new insults and injuries.

Thomas, earl of Lancaster, cousin-german to the king, and first prince of the blood, was by far the most opulent and powerful subject in England, and possessed in his own right, and soon after in that of his wife, heiress of the family of Lincoln, no less than six earldoms, with a proportionable estate in land, attended with all the jurisdictions and power which commonly in that age were annexed to landed property. This nobleman was turbulent and factious in his disposition; mortally hated the favourite, whose influence over the king exceeded his own; and he soon became the head of that party among the barons, who desired the depression of this insolent stranger. The confederated nobles assembled in the refectory of Westminster Abbey, bound themselves by oath to expel Gavaston: both sides began already to put themselves in a warlike posture: the licentiousness of the age broke out in robberies and other disorders, the usual prelude of civil war; and the royal authority, despised in the king's own hands, and hated in those of Gavaston, became insufficient for the execution of the laws, and the maintenance of peace in the kingdom. A parliament being summoned to meet at Westminster on the 28th of April, Lancaster and his party came thither with an armed retinue; and were there enabled to impose their own terms on the sovereign. They required the banishment of Gavaston for life, imposed an oath on him never to return, and engaged the bishops, who never failed to interpose in all civil concerns, to pronounce him excommunicated, if he remained any longer in the kingdom. Edward was obliged to submit; but even in his compliance gave proofs of his attachment to his favourite (v).

Meanwhile the king, less shocked with the illegal violence which had been imposed upon him, than unhappy in the absence of his minion, employed every expedient to soften the opposition of the barons to his return; as if success in that point were the chief object of his government. The high office of hereditary steward was conferred on Lancaster: his father-in-law, the earl of Lincoln, was bought off by other grants: earl Warrenne was also mollified by civilities, grants, or promises: the insolence of Gavaston, being no longer before men's eyes, was less the object of general indignation; and Edward, deeming matters sufficiently prepared for his purpose, applied to the court of Rome, and obtained for Gaveston a dispensation from that oath which the barons had compelled him to take, that he would for ever abjure the realm. The recall was then issued; and the infatuated prince flew with the impatient ardour of a youthful bridegroom to meet his favourite at Chester, on his first landing from Ireland (w); flew into his arms with transports of joy; and having obtained the formal consent of the barons in parliament, which assembled on the 26th of July, to his re-establishment, set no longer any bounds to his extravagant fondness and affection.

Had the king and his favourite been capable of deriving wisdom from experience, they would have been careful, by prudence and moderation, to preserve the tranquillity they were now allowed to enjoy: but the insolence of Gavaston, whom no lesson of adversity could improve, was rather increased than diminished by the disgrace he had so lately experienced. His former life of dissipation and prodigality was renewed; and, with the view to secure a strong party in his favour, he prevailed on the king to deprive a great number of people of their places, and to bestow them on his own adherents. This imprudent conduct revived the animosity of the whole nation; the nobles were incensed at his presumption; and the earl of Lancaster, in particular, vowed revenge against him for some private injury which he had sustained at his hands. Their

(v) Instead of removing all umbrage by sending him to his own country, as was expected, he appointed him lord lieutenant of Ireland, attended him to Bristol on his journey thither, and before his departure conferred on him new lands and riches both in Gascony and England. Gavaston, who did not want bravery, and possessed talents for war, acted during his government with vigour against some Irish rebels, whom he reduced to obedience.

(w) This minion of the king's arrived in England about the close of June, 1309.

murmurs of discontent, however, seem to have inspired him with no kind of apprehension; on the contrary, he expressed the utmost contempt for their resentment. The first noblemen in the kingdom became the subject of his sarcasms and ridicule; and, though an object of universal detestation, he thought himself secure in the smiles of his sovereign, and set the machinations of his enemies at defiance.

The king, in order to avert the storm which he saw gathering over the head of his favourite, made a progress into the North; and summoned a parliament to meet at York, on the 18th of October, 1309, in which Gavaston took his seat as earl of Cornwall. But the barons, taking this opportunity to express their displeasure, refused to attend it; and finding that this expedient had not been successful, they began to think of employing sharper and more effectual remedies. Though there had scarcely been any national ground of complaint, except some dissipation of the public treasure: though all the acts of mal-administration, objected to the king and his favourite, seemed of a nature more proper to excite heart-burnings in a ball or assembly, than commotions in a great kingdom: yet such was the situation of the times, that the barons were determined, and were able, to make them the reasons of a total alteration in the constitution and civil government. As the barons refused to attend the parliament summoned to meet on the 18th of October, it was prorogued till the 13th of February, 1310; but the cause for complaint still subsisting, the barons again refused to attend; so that the king, whose necessities required an immediate supply, desired his favourite to absent himself for a time, and issued a third summons for the parliament to meet in March. It accordingly met at Westminster, and the barons attended: but in open defiance of the laws, and in contempt of the king's prohibition; for, as they came accompanied with a numerous retinue of armed followers, they found themselves entirely masters; and presented a petition, which was equivalent to a command, requiring Edward to devolve on a chosen junto the whole authority, both of the crown and of the parliament. The king was obliged to sign a commission, empowering the prelates and barons to elect twelve of their own order, under the title of Ordainers, who should, till the term of Michaelmas in the year following, have authority to enact ordinances for the government of the kingdom, and regulation of the king's household; consenting that these ordinances should thenceforth and for ever have the force of laws; allowing the ordainers to form associations among themselves and their friends, for their strict and regular observance; and all this for the greater glory of God, the security of the church, and the honour and advantage of the king and kingdom. The barons in return signed a declaration; in which they acknowledged that they owed these concessions merely to the king's free grace; promised that this commission should never be drawn into precedent; and engaged that the power of the Ordainers should expire at the time appointed (x).

The chosen junto accordingly framed their ordinances, and presented them to the king and parliament for their confirmation in the ensuing year. Some of these ordinances were laudable, and tended to the regular execution of justice: such as those requiring sheriffs to be men of property, abolishing the practice of issuing privy seals for the suspension of justice, restraining the practice of purveyance, prohibiting the adulteration and alteration of the coin, excluding foreigners from the farms of the revenue, ordering all payments to be regularly made into the exchequer, revoking all late grants of the crown, and giving the parties damages in the case of vexatious prosecutions. But what chiefly grieved the king, was the ordinance for the removal of evil counsellors, by which a great number of persons were by name excluded from every office of power and profit; and Piers Gavaston himself was for ever banished the king's dominions, under the penalty, in case of disobedience, of being declared a public enemy. Other persons, more agreeable to the barons, were substituted in all the offices. And it was ordained, that for the future all the considerable dignities in the household, as well as in the law, revenue, and military governments, should be appointed by the baronage in parliament; and the power of making war, or assembling his military tenants, should no longer be invested solely in the king, nor be exercised without the consent of the nobility.

Edward, from the same weakness both in his temper and situation, which had engaged him to grant this unlimited commission to the barons, was led to give a parliamentary sanction to their ordinances: but as a consequence of the same character, he secretly made a protest against them, and declared, that since the commission was granted only for the making of ordinances to the advantage of king and kingdom, such articles as should be found prejudicial to both, were to be held as not ratified and confirmed. It is no wonder, indeed, that he retained a firm purpose to revoke ordinances which had been imposed on him by violence, which entirely annihilated the royal authority, and above all, which deprived him of the company and society of a person whom, by an unusual infatuation, he valued above all the world, and above every consideration of interest or tranquillity.

As soon, therefore, as Edward, removing to York, had freed himself from the immediate terror of the barons' power, he invited back Gavaston from Flanders, which that favourite had made the place of his retreat; and declaring his banishment to be illegal, and contrary to the laws and customs of the kingdom, openly re-instated him in his former credit and authority. The barons, highly provoked at this disappointment, and apprehensive of danger to themselves, from the declared animosity of so powerful a minion, saw that either his or their ruin was now inevitable; and they renewed, with redoubled zeal, their former confederacy against him. The earl of Lancaster was a dangerous head of this alliance. Guy, earl of Warwick, entered into it with a furious and precipitate passion: Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford, the constable, and Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, brought to it a great accession of power and interest: even earl Warrenne deserted the royal cause, which he had hitherto supported, and was reduced to embrace the side of the confederates. And as Robert de Winchelsea, archbishop of Canterbury, professed himself of the same party, he determined the body of the clergy, and consequently the people, to declare against the king and his minion. So predominant at that time was the power of the great nobility, that the combination of a few of them was always able to shake the throne; and such an universal concurrence became irresistible. The earl of Lancaster suddenly raised an army, and marched to York, where he found the king already removed to Newcastle. He flew thither in pursuit of him; and Edward had just time to escape to Tinmouth, where he embarked, and sailed with Gavaston to Scarborough. He left his favourite in that fortress, which, had it been properly supplied with provisions, was deemed impregnable; and he marched forward to York, in hopes of raising an army, which might be able to support him against his enemies. Pembroke was sent by the confederates to besiege the castle of Scarborough; and Gavaston, sensible of the bad condition of his garrison, was obliged to capitulate, and to surrender himself prisoner on the 19th of May, 1312. He stipulated that he should remain in Pembroke's hands for two months; that endeavours should, during that time, be mutually used for a general accommodation; that if the terms proposed by the barons were not accepted, the castle should be restored to him in the same condition as when he surrendered it; and that the earl of Pembroke and Henry Piercy should, by contract, pledge all their lands for the fulfilling of these conditions. Pembroke, now master of the person of this public enemy, conducted him to the castle of Dedington, near Banbury, in Oxfordshire; where, on pretence of other business, he left him, protected by a feeble guard. Warwick, probably in concert with Pembroke, attacked the castle on the 17th of June: the garrison refused to make any resistance: Gavaston was yielded up to him, and conducted to Warwick castle: the earls of Lancaster, Hereford, and Arundel, immediately repaired thither;

(x) In those ages, when the government was subject to such continual revolutions, the situation of the people must have been truly deplorable; for, whenever the monarch sought to infringe on their rights by an undue exercise of his prerogative, the haughty and imperious barons, under pretence of reformation, seldom failed to make encroachments more dangerous to the constitution, and more fatal to the interests and happiness of society. Had a sovereign, endued with wisdom, prudence, and penetration, been anxious to establish a despotic and unlimited authority, he might easily have accomplished his purpose, by leaguing with the people against their aristocratical tyrants, who were always odious from continued oppression; and on the ruins of their power he might have raised his own on a solid foundation.

thither; and without any regard either to the laws, or the military capitulation, they ordered the head of the noxious favourite to be struck off by the hands of the executioner (y).

The king had retired northward to Berwick when informed of Gavaston's murder; and his resentment was proportioned to the affection which he had ever borne him while living. He threatened vengeance on all the nobility who had been active in that bloody scene, and made preparations for war in all parts of England. But he was not possessed of sufficient authority to ensure success to his endeavours; and having received intelligence that the confederated barons were advancing by hasty marches to the metropolis, at the head of an army more powerful and numerous than his own, the ardour of revenge became suddenly damped, and he appeared disposed to listen to conciliatory terms.

The count of Evreux, the queen's uncle; cardinal Arnaud, the pope's nuncio; and the earls of Gloucester and Richmond, offering themselves as mediators at this favourable juncture, a treaty was set on foot between the king and the barons. During the negociation the queen was delivered of a son, prince Edward, at Windsor, on the 13th of November; and Edward, whose weak mind was not susceptible of lasting impression, appears to have experienced such joy on this occasion, that he forgot his murdered favourite, and expressed his willingness to accede to any reasonable terms which his nobles might think proper to impose. In consequence of this disposition, a peace was concluded on the 30th of December, 1312; by which he granted the barons a pardon of all offences; and as they stipulated to ask him publicly pardon on their knees, he was so pleased with these vain appearances of submission, that he seemed to have sincerely forgiven all past injuries. But as they still pretended, notwithstanding their lawless conduct, a great anxiety for the maintenance of law, and required the establishment of their former ordinances as a necessary security for that purpose, Edward told them, that he was willing to grant them a free and legal confirmation of such of these ordinances as were not entirely derogatory to the prerogative of the crown. This answer was received, for the present, as satisfactory. The king's person, after the death of Gavaston, was now become less contemptible to the public; and as the ordinances insisted on appeared to be nearly the same with those which had formerly been extorted from Henry III. by Montfort, and which had been attended with so many fatal consequences, they were, on that account, demanded with less vehemence by the nobility and people.

In the interval between the meeting of parliament, Edward, having appointed his nephew, the earl of Gloucester, guardian of the realm, embarked at Dover for France, on the 23rd of May, with his queen, and a splendid retinue, to attend at the coronation of his brother-in-law, Louis, king of Navarre, which was performed at Paris on the 3rd of April.

During his stay on the continent, he sent over a commission to the bishops of Bath and Worcester, and the earls of Gloucester and Richmond, to hold a parliament; which was summoned to meet at Westminster on the 8th of July. But the king's absence prevented the transaction of business; and the barons, becoming impatient at his neglect to fulfil the conditions of his treaty with them, (for he certainly shewed a reluctance to comply with the terms agreed upon,) vented their discontent in murmurs, and threatened to have recourse to arms: but Edward arriving soon after, and being made sensible of the danger of trifling any longer with men whose minds were so turbulent, and whose power was so formidable, summoned a parliament to meet on the 23rd of September, when he complied with the terms of the pacification. The barons came into Westminster Hall, and on their knees implored his pardon; which the king soon after published, and which extended to themselves and all their adherents: but on the 17th of October, particular pardons passed the great seal, to the earls of Lancaster, Hereford, and Warwick, and about five hundred knights and gentlemen of their party, whose names were mentioned. As a proof that their reconciliation was sincere, the barons and knights of shires granted the king a twentieth, and the citizens and burgesses a fifteenth, of their moveables, to enable him to prosecute with vigour the war against Scotland.

Immediately after Edward's retreat from Scotland, as mentioned above, Robert Bruce left his fastnesses, in which he intended to have sheltered his feeble army; and supplying his defect of strength by superior vigour and abilities, he made deep impression on all his enemies, foreign and domestic. He chased lord Argyle, and the chieftain of the Macdowals, from their hills, and made himself entirely master of the high country: he thence invaded, with success, the Cummins in the low countries of the north: he took the castles of Inverness, Forfar, and Brechin. He daily gained some new accession of territory; and, what was a more important acquisition, he daily reconciled the minds of the nobility to his dominion, and inlisted under his standard every bold leader, whom he enriched by the spoils of his enemies. Sir James Douglas, in whom commenced the greatness and renown of that warlike family, seconded him in all his enterprizes: Edward Bruce, Robert's own brother, distinguished himself by acts of valour: and the terror of the English power being now abated by the feeble conduct of the king, even the least sanguine of the Scots began to entertain hopes of recovering their independence; and the whole kingdom, except a few fortresses, which he had not the means to attack, had acknowledged the authority of Robert.

In this situation, Edward had found it necessary to grant a truce to Scotland; and Robert successfully employed the interval in consolidating his power, and introducing order into the civil government, disjointed by a long continuance of wars and factions. The interval was very short: the truce, ill observed on both sides, was at last openly violated; and war recommenced with greater fury than ever. Robert, not content with defending himself, had made successful inroads into England, subsisted his needy followers by the plunder of that country, and taught them to despise the military genius of a people who had long been the object of their terror. Edward, at last, roused from his lethargy, had marched an army into Scotland; and Robert, determined not to risk too much against an enemy so much superior, retired again into the mountains. The king advanced beyond Edinburgh; but being destitute of provisions, and being ill supported by the English nobility, who were then employed in framing their ordinances, he was soon obliged to retreat, without gaining any advantage over the enemy. But the appearing union of all the parties in England, after the death of Gavaston, seemed to restore that kingdom to its native force, opened again the prospect of reducing Scotland, and promised a happy conclusion to a war in which both the interests and passions of the nation were so deeply engaged.

Edward assembled forces from all quarters, with a view of finishing, at one blow, this important enterprize. He summoned the most warlike of his vassals from Gascony: he inlisted troops from Flanders, and other foreign countries: he invited over great numbers of the disorderly Irish as to a certain prey: he joined to them a body of the Welsh, who were actuated by like motives; and assembling the whole military force of England, he marched to the frontiers with an army with which, according to the Scotch writers, amounted to a hundred thousand men.

The army collected by Robert exceeded not thirty thousand combatants; but being composed of men who had distinguished themselves by many acts of valour, who were rendered desperate by their situation, and who were inured to all the varieties of fortune, they might justly, under such a leader, be deemed formidable to the most numerous and best appointed armies. The castle of Stirling, which, with Berwick, was the only fortress in Scotland that remained in the hands of the English, had long been besieged by Edward brother to Bruce: Philip de Mowbray, the governor, after an obstinate defence, was at last obliged to capitulate, and to promise, that if, before a certain day which was near at hand, he were not relieved, he should open his gates to the enemy. Robert therefore, sensible that here was the ground on which he must expect the English, chose the field of battle with all the skill and prudence imaginable, and made the necessary preparations for their reception. He posted himself at Bannockburn, about two miles from Stirling: where he had a hill on his right flank, and a morass on his left; and not content with having taken these precautions to prevent his being surrounded by the more numerous army of the English, he forcsaw the superior strength of the enemy in cavalry, and made provision against it. Having a rivulet in front, he commanded deep pits to be dug along its banks, and sharp stakes to be planted in them; and he ordered the whole to be carefully covered over with turf. The English arrived in sight on the evening, and a bloody conflict immediately ensued between two bodies of cavalry; where Robert, who was at the head of the Scots, engaged in single combat with Henry de Bohun, a gentleman of the family of Hereford, and at one stroke cleft his adversary to the chin with a battle-ax, in sight of the two armies. The English horse, dismayed by this action, which inspired the Scots with fresh vigour, fled with precipitation to their main body.

The Scots, encouraged by this favourable event, and glorying in the valour of their prince, prognosticated a happy issue to the combat on the ensuing day: the English, confident in their numbers, and elated with former successes, longed for an opportunity of revenge; and the night, though extremely short in that season and in that climate, appeared tedious to the impatience of the several combatants. Early in the morning of the 25th of June, 1314, Edward drew out his army, and advanced towards the Scots. The earl of Gloucester, his nephew, who commanded the left wing of the cavalry, impelled by the ardour of youth, rushed on to the attack without precaution, and fell among the covered pits, which had been prepared by Bruce for the reception of the enemy. This body of horse was disordered: Gloucester himself was overthrown and slain: sir James Douglas, who commanded the Scottish cavalry, gave the enemy no leisure to rally, but pushed them off the field with considerable loss, and pursued them in sight of their whole line of infantry. While the English army were alarmed with this unfortunate beginning of the action, which commonly proves decisive, they observed an army on the heights towards the left, which seemed to be marching leisurely in order to surround them; and they were distracted by their multiplied fears. This was a number of waggoners and sumpter-boys, whom Robert had collected; and having supplied them with military standards, gave them the appearance, at a distance, of a formidable body. The stratagem took effect: a panic seized the English: they threw down their arms, and fled: they were pursued with great slaughter, for the space of ninety miles, till they reached Berwick: and the Scots, besides an inestimable booty, took many persons of quality prisoners, and above four hundred gentlemen, whom Robert treated with great humanity, and whose ransom was a new accession of wealth to the victorious army. The king himself narrowly escaped, by taking shelter in Dunbar, whose gates were opened to him by the earl of March; and he thence passed by sea to Berwick (z).

Robert, in order to avail himself of his present success, entered England, and ravaged all the northern counties without opposition: he laid siege to Carlisle; but that place was saved by the valour of sir Andrew Harcla, the governor: he was more successful against Berwick, which he took by assault: and this prince, elated by his continued prosperity, now entertained hopes of making the most important conquests on the English. He sent over his brother Edward, with an army of six thousand men, into Ireland (a): and that nobleman assumed the title of king of that Island: Robert himself followed soon after with more numerous forces: the horrible and absurd oppressions which the Irish suffered under the English government made them, at first, fly to the standard of the Scots, whom they regarded as their deliverers: but a grievous famine, which at that time desolated both Ireland and Britain, reduced the Scottish army to the greatest extremities, and Robert was obliged to return, with his forces much diminished, into his own country. His brother, after having experienced a variety of fortune, was defeated and slain near Dundalk by the English, commanded by lord Bermingham, on the 14th of October. And these projects, too extensive for the force of the Scottish nation, thus vanished into smoke.

Edward, besides suffering those disasters from the invasion of the Scots, and the insurrection of the Irish, was also infested with a rebellion in Wales; and, above all by the factions of his own nobility, who took advantage of the public calamities, insulted his fallen fortunes, and endeavoured to establish their own independence on the ruins of the throne. Lancaster, and the barons of his party, who had declined attending him on the Scottish expedition, no sooner saw him return with disgrace, than they insisted on the renewal of their ordinances, which, they still pretended, had validity; and the king's unhappy situation obliged him to submit to their demands. The ministry was new modelled by the direction of Lancaster: that prince was placed at the head of the council: it was declared, that all the offices should be filled, from time to time, by the votes of parliament, or rather by the will of the great barons; and the nation, under this new model of government, endeavoured to put itself in a better posture of defence against the Scots. But the factious nobles were far from being terrified with the progress of these public enemies: on the contrary, they founded the hopes of their own future grandeur on the weakness and distresses of the crown: Lancaster himself was suspected, with great appearance of reason, of holding a secret correspondence with the king of Scots: and though he was entrusted with the command of the English armies, he took care that every enterprize should be disappointed, and every plan of operations prove unsuccessful.

All the European kingdoms, especially that of England, were at this time unacquainted with the office of a prime minister, so well understood at present in all regular monarchies; and the people could form no conception of a man, who, though still in the rank of a subject, possessed all the power of a sovereign, eased the prince of the burthen of affairs, supplied his want of experience or capacity, and maintained all the rights of the crown, without degrading the greatest nobles by their submission to his temporary authority. Edward was plainly, by nature, unfit to hold himself the reins of government: he had no vices, but was unhappy in a total incapacity for serious business: he was sensible of his own defects, and necessarily sought to be governed: yet every favourite whom he successively chose was regarded as a fellow-subject exalted above his rank and station: he was the object of envy to the great nobility: his character and conduct were decried with the people: his authority over the king and kingdom was considered as an usurpation; and unless the prince had embraced the dangerous expedient of devolving his power on the earl of Lancaster, or some mighty baron, whose family interest was so extensive as to be able alone to maintain his influence, he could expect no peace or tranquillity upon the throne.

The countess of Lancaster being dissatisfied with the conduct of her husband, to whom she had brought an immense fortune, eloped from his house with a knight, who was a retainer to John de Warrenne, earl of Surrey; and that nobleman afforded her protection at his castle of Rye-gate. The knight advanced a claim to the person of the countess, founded on a contract prior to that which gave her to the earl of Lancaster: he also pretended to have cohabited with her as her husband; and, by an action brought in the king's court at Westminster, demanded, in her right, the earldoms of Lincoln and Salisbury, to which she was heiress. This outrage could not fail to irritate the earl of Lancaster, who was a prince of the blood royal, the first subject in England, and of a temper haughty and imperious: but, to render his mortification more complete, the countess, with all the effrontery of a lewd woman, made a voluntary confession of her own dishonour, and joined in the prosecution of her husband. Lancaster regarded the knight as a mere tool of the earl of Surrey; and as, in such cases, a man's suspicions are apt to fall on those he has most injured, he suspected the king of being concerned in this plot against his honour and fortune. Impressed with this idea, he determined to exact vengeance on the different objects of his resentment; and for that purpose assembled an army of eighteen thousand men.

Edward, being in no condition to cope with so powerful an adversary, was obliged to negociate with his rebellious subject; and some efforts were made by people, who preferred moderation to discord, to avert the dreadful calamities of a civil war: but their efforts were ineffectual; the queen entreated the cardinals to interpose their good offices toward an accommodation, which was accordingly brought about at Leicester. But though this peace had been made with every apparent intention of preserving it, Lancaster's animosity to his sovereign, probably heightened by a consciousness of the injuries he had done him, was such as to prevent his being satisfied with any thing short of his virtual deposition. The cardinals were now requested by the barons to persuade the king to an unconditional confirmation of the ordinances; and, having obtained a promise to that effect, they departed the kingdom, after issuing a sentence of excommunication and interdict against Bruce and his dominions.

(z) Such was the great and decisive battle of Bannockburn, which secured the independence of Scotland, fixed Bruce on the throne of that kingdom, and may be deemed the greatest overthrow that the English nation, since the Conquest, has ever received. The number of slain on these occasions is always uncertain, and is commonly much magnified by the victors: but this defeat made a deep impression on the minds of the English; and it was remarked, that, for some years, no superiority of numbers could encourage them to keep the field against the Scots.

After their departure, a parliament was holden at Northampton, in July, 1318; at which the power of the earl of Lancaster bore down all opposition. The unfortunate Edward, overawed and insulted by this nobleman, was compelled again to confirm the ordinances; and was, moreover, obliged to consent to an additional regulation of the same tenour, by which a perpetual council of eight bishops, four earls, and four barons, were appointed constantly to attend the king by turns, four every quarter; and without their advice, he was restrained from performing any one act of government.

During this time, the Scots had made frequent incursions into the northern counties, where they had committed great depredations; Edward therefore determined to embrace the earliest moment to revenge these insults; and, having passed the winter in the north, he assembled a parliament at York, in the spring of 1319, in which the preliminaries for an expedition to Scotland were arranged. The barons and knights of shires granted him an eighteenth, the citizens and burgesses a twelfth, and the clergy a tenth, to defray the expences of it; and all the military vassals of the crown were summoned to appear at Newcastle on the tenth of June. The citation being obeyed with alacrity, a numerous army was assembled, with which he invested Berwick on the first of September; while a fleet from the Cinque Ports blocked up the harbour. The siege was conducted with spirit; and the place was defended with equal bravery by the steward of Scotland, son-in-law to Bruce, who sustained several desperate assaults, in some of which the English troops had actually mounted the ramparts. Bruce, finding the enemy were so advantageously posted that he could not attack them with any prospect of success, resolved to make a diversion in favour of the besieged. The queen had established her residence at a village in the vicinity of York, where she lived exempt from any apprehension of danger, as she concluded that the Scots were so deeply employed in the defence of their own country, that they could not spare any troops for an expedition into England. Bruce formed a plan for surprizing the princess; and Sir James Douglass being appointed to carry it into execution, advanced with a body of chosen men towards the place of his destination; but the design miscarried, through the apprehension of one of his spies; who, being seized at York, was put to the torture and disclosed his scheme, so that the queen was removed in time to a place of safety. The archbishop of York determined to punish the Scots for their temerity, assembled the militia of the county; and, on the 20th of September, marched forth to attack them. Douglas, apprized of their approach, was ready to receive them; and as they advanced with the wind in their faces, he set fire to a great quantity of damp straw, which he had prepared for the purpose; and they were so completely blinded by the smoke, that they were unable to make any resistance. Great numbers of them were slain; and the remainder, with great difficulty, saved themselves by flight.

The king, informed of this disaster, raised the siege of Berwick, and divided his forces into two bodies, with a view to intercept the Scots in their retreat; but Douglas regulated his march with such prudence, that he avoided both divisions, and returned to his own country laden with plunder.

The bad success of this campaign induced Edward to make peaceable overtures to Bruce; in consequence of which commissioners were deputed from either kingdom, who met at Newcastle, December 6, 1319; and, on the 21st of the same month, a truce was concluded for two months.

In the summer of 1320 Edward was obliged to take a voyage to the continent, in order to do homage for the duchy of Guienne and the county of Poictou, to Philip le Long, who had lately succeeded to the throne of France, and had summoned the king to attend for that purpose. After his return, a parliament was held at Westminster, in the month of October; in which many salutary laws were enacted for restoring the internal police of the kingdom, which had been greatly relaxed by the late commotions, and for other purposes. But the beneficent works of peace were now destined to give way to the horrors of civil dissension.

Edward, unendowed by nature with those qualifications which are essentially requisite in a monarch, experienced an insuperable disgust to all serious exertions; and being conscious of his own defects, and moreover attached to the social enjoyments of private friendship in a degree that is almost incredible, ever anxiously sought for an object in whom he might repose an unlimited confidence, and who might assist him to support the weight of government, which he was unable to sustain alone. The queen certainly appeared to be the most proper person for this important trust; but her disposition is said to have been so truly diabolical, that Edward refused to make her the companion of his leisure hours, the only friend of his heart. The death of Piers Gavaston had left a vacuum in the king's breast, which he was eager to supply; and, after some deliberation, he bestowed his confidence on Hugh le Despenser, a young man of English birth, of high rank, and of a noble family. He possessed all the exterior accomplishments of person and address, which were fitted to engage the weak mind of Edward; but was destitute of that moderation and prudence which might have qualified him to mitigate the envy of the great, and conduct him through all the perils of that dangerous station to which he was advanced. His father, who was of the same name, and who by means of his son, had also attained great influence over the king, was a nobleman venerable from his years, respected through all his past life for wisdom, valour, and integrity, and well fitted by his talents and experience, could affairs have admitted of any temperament, to have supplied the defects both of the king and of his minion. But no sooner was Edward's attachment declared for young Despenser, than the turbulent Lancaster, and most of the great barons regarded him as their rival, made him the object of their animosity, and formed violent plans for his ruin. They first declared their discontent by withdrawing from parliament; and it was not long ere they found a pretence for proceeding to greater extremities against him.

The king, who set no limits to his bounty towards his minions, had married the younger Despenser to his niece, one of the co-heirs of the earl of Gloucester, who was slain at Bannockburn. The favourite, by his succession to that opulent family, had inherited great possessions in the marches of Wales; and being desirous of extending still farther his influence in those quarters, he is accused of having committed injustice on the barons of Audley and Ammori, who had also married two sisters of the same family. There was likewise a baron in that neighbourhood, called William de Braouse, lord of Gower, who had made a settlement of his estate on John de Mowbray, his son-in-law; and, in case of failure of that nobleman and his issue, had substituted the earl of Hereford in the succession to the barony of Gower. Mowbray, on the decease of his father-in-law, entered immediately in possession of the estate, without the formality of taking livery and seizin from the crown; but Despenser, who coveted that barony, persuaded the king to put in execution the rigour of the feudal law, to seize Gower as escheated to the crown, and to confer it upon him. This transaction, which was the proper subject of a law-suit, immediately excited a civil war in the kingdom. The earls of Lancaster and Hereford flew to arms: Audley and Ammori joined them with all their forces: the two Rogers de Mortimer and Roger de Clifford, with many others, disgusted, for private reasons, at the Despensers, brought a considerable accession to the party; and their army being now formidable, they sent a message to the king, requiring him immediately to dismiss or confine the younger Despenser; and menacing him, in case of refusal, with renouncing their allegiance to him, and taking revenge on that minister by their own authority. They scarcely waited for an answer; but immediately fell upon the lands of young Despenser, which they pillaged and destroyed; murdered his servants, drove off his cattle, and burned his houses. They thence proceeded to commit like devastations on the estates of Despenser the father, whose character they had hitherto seemed to respect; and having drawn and signed a formal association among themselves, they marched to London with all their forces, stationed themselves in the neighbourhood of that city, and demanded of the king the banishment of both the Despencers. These noblemen were then absent; the father abroad; the son at sea, and both of them employed in different commissions: the king therefore replied, that his coronation oath, by which he was bound to observe the laws, restrained him from giving his assent to so illegal a demand, or condemning noblemen who were accused of no crime, nor had any opportunity afforded them of making answer.

Equity and reason were but a feeble opposition to men who had arms in their hands, and who, being already involved in guilt, saw no safety but in success and victory. They entered London with their troops; and giving in to the parliament, which was then sitting, a charge against the Despensers, of which they attempted not to prove one article, they procured, on the 15th of July, 1321, by menaces and violence, a sentence of attainder and perpetual exile against those ministers (b). The only symptom which these turbulent barons gave of their regard to law, was their requiring from the king an indemnity for their illegal proceedings; which having obtained on the 19th of August, they disbanded their army, and separated in security, as they imagined, to their several castles.

This act of violence, in which the king was obliged to acquiesce, rendered his person and his authority so contemptible, that every one thought himself entitled to treat him with neglect. The queen, in a journey of devotion to Canterbury, having occasion soon after to pass by the castle of Leeds in Kent, which belonged to the lord Badlesmere (c), desired a night's lodging, but was refused admittance; and some of her attendants, who presented themselves at the gate, were killed (d). The insult upon this princess, who had always endeavoured to live on good terms with the barons, and who joined them heartily in their hatred of the young Despenser, was an action which nobody pretended to justify; and the king thought that he might, without giving general umbrage, assemble an army, and take vengeance on the offender. No one came to the assistance of Badlesmere and Edward prevailed (e): but having now some forces on foot, and having concerted measures with his friends throughout England, he ventured to take off the mask, to attack all his enemies, and to recal the two Despensers, whose sentence he declared illegal, unjust, contrary to the tenor of the Great Charter, passed without the assent of the prelates, and extorted by violence from him and the estate of barons (f). Still the commons were not mentioned by either party.

The king had now got the start of the barons; an advantage which, in those times, was commonly decisive; and he hastened with his army to the marches of Wales, the chief seat of the power of his enemies, whom he found totally unprepared for resistance. Many of the barons in those parts endeavoured to appease him by submission (g): their castles were seized, and their persons committed to custody. But Lancaster, in order to prevent the total ruin of his party, summoned together his vassals and retainers; declared his alliance with Scotland, which had long been suspected; received the promise of a reinforcement from that country, under the command of Randolf earl of Murray, and Sir James Douglas; and being joined by the earl of Hereford, advanced with all his force against the king, who had collected an army of thirty thousand men, and was superior to his enemies. Lancaster posted himself at Burton upon Trent, and endeavoured to defend the passages of the river; but being disappointed in that plan of operations, this prince, who had no military genius, and whose personal courage was even suspected, fled with his army to the north, in expectation of being there joined by his Scottish allies. He was pursued by the king; and his army diminished daily, till he came to Boroughbridge, where he found Sir Andrew Harcla posted with some forces on the opposite side of the river, and ready to dispute the passage with him. He was repulsed in an attempt which he made to force his way; the earl of Hereford was killed; the whole army of the rebels was disconcerted, on the 16th of March, 1322; Lancaster himself was become incapable of taking any measure either for flight or defence; and he was seized, without resistance, by Harcla, and conducted to the king. In those violent times, the laws were so much neglected on both sides, that, even where they might, without any sensible inconvenience, have been observed, the conquerors deemed it unnecessary to pay any regard to them. Lancaster, who was guilty of open rebellion, and was taken in arms against his sovereign, instead of being tried by the laws of his country, which pronounced the sentence of death against him, was condemned by a court-martial, and led to execution. Edward, however little vindictive in his natural temper, here indulged his revenge, and employed against the prisoner the same indignities which had been exercised, by his orders, against Gavaston. He was clothed in a mean attire, placed on a meagre hack, without a bridle, a hood was put on his head, and in this posture, attended by the acclamations of the people, this prince was conducted to an eminence about a mile distant, near Pomfret, one of his own castles, and there beheaded (h), on the 23rd of the same month.

In this situation, no success could be expected from foreign wars; and Edward, after making one more fruitless attempt against Scotland, whence he retreated with dishonour, found it necessary to terminate hostilities with that kingdom by a truce of thirteen years: the treaty for which was concluded on the 30th of March, 1323. Robert, though his title to the crown was not acknowledged in the treaty, was satisfied with ensuring his possession of it during so long a time. He had repelled with gallantry all the attacks of England: he had carried war both into that kingdom and into Ireland: he had rejected with disdain the pope's authority, who pretended to impose his commands upon him, and oblige him to make peace with his enemies: his throne was firmly established, as well in the affections of his subjects as by force of arms: yet there naturally remained some inquietude in his mind, while at war with a state which, however at present disordered by faction, was of itself so much an over-match for him, both in riches and in numbers of people. And this truce was, at the same time, the more seasonable for England, because the nation was at that juncture threatened with hostilities from France.

Philip the Fair, king of France, who died in 1315, had left the crown to his son Louis Hutin, who, after a short reign, dying without male issue, was succeeded by Philip the Long, his brother, whose death soon after made way for Charles the Fair, the youngest brother of that family. This monarch had some grounds of complaint against the king's ministers in Guienne; and as there was no common or equitable judge in that strange species of sovereignty established by the feudal law, he seemed desirous to take advantage of Edward's weakness, and, under that pretence, to confiscate all his foreign dominions. Edward was cited to appear at Amiens, on or before the first of July, 1324. After an embassy with the earl of Kent, the king's brother, had been tried in vain, queen Isabella obtained permission to go over to Paris, and endeavour to adjust, in an amicable manner, the difference with her brother: but while she was making some progress in this negociation, Charles started a new pretension, the justice of which could not be disputed, that Edward himself should appear in his court, and do homage for the fees which he held in France. But there occurred many difficulties in complying with this demand. Young Despenser, by whom the king was implicitly governed, had unavoidably been engaged in many quarrels with the queen, who aspired to the same influence; and though that artful princess, on her leaving England, had dissembled her animosity, Despenser, well acquainted with her secret sentiments, was unwilling to attend his master to Paris, and appear in a court where her (b) This sentence was voted by the lay barons alone; for the Commons, though now an estate in parliament, were yet of so little consideration, that their assent was not demanded; and even the votes of the prelates were neglected amidst the present disorders.

(c) This nobleman had been under great obligations to Edward, but had lately abandoned his interests, and joined himself to the confederate barons.

(h) Thus perished Thomas, earl of Lancaster, prince of the blood, and one of the most potent barons that had ever been in England. His public conduct sufficiently discovers the violence and turbulence of his character: his private deportment appears not to have been more innocent; and his hypocritical devotion, by which he gained the favour of the monks and populace, will rather be regarded as an aggravation than an alleviation of his guilt. Bedlesmer, Giffard, Barret, Cheney, Fleming, and about eighteen of the most notorious offenders, were afterwards condemned by a legal trial, and executed. Many were thrown into prison: others made their escape beyond sea: some of the king's servants were rewarded from the forfeitures: Harcla received for his services the earldom of Carlisle, and a large estate, which he soon after forfeited with his life, for a treasonable correspondence with the king of Scotland. But the greater part of those vast escheats was seized by young Despenser, whose rapacity was insatiable. Many of the barons of the king's party, were disgusted with this partial division of the spoils; the envy against Despenser rose higher than ever: the usual insolence of his temper, inflamed by success, impelled him to commit many acts of violence: the people, who always hated him, made him still more the object of aversion: all the relations of the attainted barons and gentlemen secretly vowed revenge; and though tranquillity was, in appearance, restored to the kingdom, the general contempt of the king, and odium against Despenser, became the source of future revolutions and convulsions.

credit might expose him to insults, if not to danger. He hesitated no less on allowing the king to make the journey alone; both fearing, lest that easy prince should in his absence fall under other influence; and foreseeing the perils to which himself should be exposed, if, without the protection of royal authority, he remained in England, where he was so generally despised. While these doubts occasioned delays and difficulties, Isabella proposed, that Edward should resign the dominion of Guienne to his son, now thirteen years of age; and that the prince should come to Paris, and do the homage which every vassal owed to his superior lord. This expedient, which seemed so happily to remove all difficulties, was immediately embraced: Despenser was charmed with the contrivance: young Edward was sent to Paris; and the ruin covered under this fatal snare, was never perceived or suspected by any of the English council.

The queen, on her arrival in France, had there found a great number of English fugitives, the remains of the Lancastrian faction; and their common hatred of Despenser soon begat a secret friendship and correspondence between them and that princess. Among the rest was young Roger Mortimer, a potent baron in the Welsh marches, who had been obliged, with others, to make his submissions to the king; had been condemned for high treason; but having received a pardon for his life, was afterwards detained in the Tower, with an intention of rendering his confinement perpetual. He was so fortunate as to make his escape into France; and being one of the most considerable persons now remaining of the party, as well as distinguished by his violent animosity against Despenser, he was easily admitted to pay his court to queen Isabella. The grace of his person and address advanced him quickly in her affections, he became her confidant and counsellor in all her measures; and gaining ground daily upon her heart, he engaged her to sacrifice at last to her passion, all the sentiments of honour and of fidelity to her husband. Hating now the man whom she had injured, and whom she never valued, she entered ardently into all Mortimer's conspiracies; and having artfully gotten into her hands the young prince, and heir of the monarchy, she resolved on the utter ruin of the king, as well as of his favourite. She engaged her brother to take part in the same criminal purpose: her court was daily filled with the exiled barons: Mortimer lived in the most declared intimacy with her: a correspondence was secretly carried on with the malcontent party in England: and when Edward, informed of those alarming circumstances, required her speedily to return with the prince, she publicly replied, that she would never set foot in the kingdom, till Despenser was for ever removed from his presence and councils: a declaration which procured her great popularity in England, and threw a decent veil over all her treasonable enterprizes.

Edward endeavoured to put himself in a posture of defence, and prepare for the worst; but, besides the difficulties arising from his own indolence and slender abilities, and the want of authority which of consequence attended all his resolutions, it was not easy for him, in the present state of the kingdom and revenue, to maintain a constant force ready to repel an invasion, which he knew not at what time or place he had reason to expect. All his efforts were unequal to the traitorous and hostile conspiracies, which, both at home and abroad, were forming against his authority, and which were daily penetrating farther even into his own family. His brother, the earl of Kent, a virtuous but weak prince, who was then at Paris, was engaged by his sister-in-law, and by the king of France, who was also his cousin-german, to give countenance to the invasion, whose sole object, he believed, was the expulsion of the Despensers: he prevailed on his elder brother, the earl of Norfolk, to enter secretly into the same design: the earl of Leicester, brother and heir of the earl of Lancaster, had too many reasons for his hatred of these ministers, to refuse his concurrence. Walter de Reynel, archbishop of Canterbury, and many of the prelates, expressed their approbation of the queen's measures: several of the most potent barons, envying the authority of the favourite, were ready to fly to arms: the minds of the people, by means of some truths and many calumnies, were strongly disposed to the same party; and there needed but the appearance of the queen and prince, with such a body of foreign troops as might protect her against immediate violence, to turn all this tempest, so artfully prepared, against the unhappy Edward.

Charles, though he gave countenance and assistance to the faction, was ashamed openly to support the queen and prince against the authority of a husband and father; and Isabella was obliged to court the alliance of some other foreign potentate, from whose dominions she might set out on her intended enterprize. For this purpose she affianced young Edward, whose tender age made him incapable to judge of the consequences, with Philippa, daughter of the count of Holland and Hainault; and having, by the open assistance of this prince, and the secret protection of her brother, inlisted in her service near three thousand men, she set sail from the harbour of Dort, and landed safely, and without opposition, at Orwell Haven, near Walton, on the coast of Suffolk, on the 24th of September, 1326. The earl of Kent and her paramour Roger Mortimer, were in her company: two other princes of the blood, the earl of Norfolk and the earl of Leicester, joined her soon after her landing with all their followers: three prelates, the bishops of Ely, Lincoln, and Hereford, brought her both the force of their vassals and the authority of their character: even Robert de Watteville, who had been sent by the king to oppose her progress in Suffolk, deserted to her with all his forces. To render her cause more favourable, she renewed her declaration, that the sole purpose of her expedition was to free the king and kingdom from the tyranny of the Despensers, and of chancellor Baldoc, their creature. The populace were allured by her specious pretences: the barons thought themselves secure against forfeitures by the appearance of the prince in her army: and a weak irresolute king, supported by ministers generally despised by the nation, was unable to stem this torrent, which bore with such irresistible violence against him.

Edward, after trying in vain to rouse the citizens of London to espouse his cause, departed for the west, where he hoped to meet with a better reception; and he had no sooner discovered his weakness by leaving the city, than the rage of the populace broke out without control against him and his ministers. They first plundered, then murdered all those who were disagreeable to them: they seized the bishop of Exeter, a virtuous and loyal prelate, as he was passing through the streets; and having beheaded him, they threw his body into the river. They made themselves masters of the Tower by surprize; then entered into a formal association to put to death, without mercy, every one who should dare to oppose, the enterprize of queen Isabella, and of the prince (i).

Edward was pursued to Bristol by the earl of Kent, seconded by the foreign forces under John de Hainault. He found himself disappointed in his expectations with regard to the loyalty of those parts; and passed over to Wales, where, he flattered himself, his name was more popular, and which he hoped to find uninfected with the contagion of general rage which had seized the English. The elder Despenser, created earl of Winchester, was left governor of the castle of Bristol; but the garrison mutinied against him, and he was delivered into the hands of his enemies. This venerable noble, who had nearly reached his ninetieth year, was instantly, without trial, or witness, or accusation, or answer, condemned to death by the rebellious barons: he was hanged on a gibbet; his body was cut in pieces, and thrown to the dogs; and his head was sent to Winchester, the place whose title he bore, and was there set on a pole, and exposed to the insults of the populace (k).

The king, disappointed anew in his expectations of succour from the Welsh, took shipping for Ireland; but being driven back by contrary winds, he endeavoured to conceal himself in the mountains of Wales: he was soon discovered, was put under the custody of the earl of Leicester, and was confined in the castle of Kenilworth. The younger Despenser,

(i) A like spirit was soon communicated to all other parts of England; and threw the few servants of the king, who still entertained thoughts of performing their duty, into terror and astonishment.

(k) "So much," says Dr. Henry, "had civil rage hardened the hearts and enflamed the passions of the humane and generous English." We confess ourselves utterly at a loss to conceive what part of our history this learned author could have founded his opinion on, that humanity and generosity were the characteristic virtues of the English nation. So far are we from concurring in these sentiments, that we will venture to assert without the least apprehension of contradiction, that the annals of the world do not present us with a country in which an equal progress having been made in the various arts of civilization, a spirit of savage ferocity was more prevalent than in England, from the earliest times to the period we are now delineating, with the single exception of the reign of Alfred: and a more despotic race of tyrants, more arbitrary in their principles, more cruel in their conduct, than the feudal nobles of England, during some centuries subsequent to the accession of William the First, could with difficulty be found in the history of any age or climate.

spenser, his favourite, who also fell into the hands of his enemies, was executed, like his father, without any appearance of a legal trial: the earl of Arundel, almost the only man of his rank in England who had maintained his loyalty, was, without any trial, put to death at the instigation of Mortimer: Baldoc, the chancellor, being a priest, could not with safety be so suddenly dispatched; but being sent to the bishop of Hereford's palace in London, he was there, as his enemies probably foresaw, seized by the populace, was thrown into Newgate, and soon after expired, from the cruel usage which he had received. Even the usual reverence paid to the sacerdotal character gave way, with every other consideration, to the present rage of the people.

The queen, to avail herself of the prevailing delusion, summoned, in the king's name, a parliament at Westminster; where, together with the power of her army, and the authority of her partisans among the barons, who were concerned to secure their past treasons by committing new acts of violence against their sovereign, she expected to be seconded by the fury of the populace, the most dangerous of all instruments, and the least answerable for their excesses. A charge was drawn up against the king, on the 13th of January, 1327, in which, even though it was framed by his inveterate enemies, nothing but his narrow genius, or his misfortunes, were objected to him: for the greatest malice found no particular crime with which it could reproach this unhappy prince. He was accused of incapacity for government, of wasting his time in idle amusements, of neglecting public business, of being swayed by evil counsellors, of having lost, by his misconduct, the kingdom of Scotland, and part of Guienne; and to swell the charge, even the death of some barons, and the imprisonment of some prelates, convicted of treason, were laid to his account. It was in vain, amidst the violence of arms and tumult of the people, to appeal either to law or to reason: the deposition of the king, without any appearing opposition, was voted by parliament: the prince, already declared regent by his party, was placed on the throne: and a deputation was sent to Edward at Kenilworth, to require his resignation, which menaces and terror soon extorted from him.

But it was impossible that the people, however corrupted by the barbarity of the times, still farther enflamed by faction, could for ever remain insensible to the voice of nature. Here, a wife had first deserted, next invaded, and then dethroned her husband; had made her minor son an instrument in this unnatural treatment of his father; had, by lying pretences, seduced the nation into a rebellion against their sovereign; had pushed them into violence and cruelties that had dishonoured them: all these circumstances were so odious in themselves, and formed such a complicated scene of guilt, that the least reflection sufficed to open men's eyes, and make them detest this flagrant infringement of every public and private duty. The suspicions which soon arose of Isabella's criminal commerce with Mortimer, the proofs which daily broke out of this part of her guilt, increased the general abhorrence against her; and her hypocrisy, in publicly bewailing with tears the king's unhappy fate, was not able to deceive even the most prejudicial of her adherents. In proportion as the queen became the object of public detestation, the dethroned monarch, who had been the victim of her crimes and her ambition, was regarded with pity, with friendship, with veneration; and men became sensible, that all his misconduct, which faction had so much exaggerated, had been owing to the unavoidable weakness, not to any voluntary depravity, of his character. The earl of Leicester, now earl of Lancaster, to whose custody he had been committed, was soon touched with those generous sentiments; and besides using his prisoner with gentleness and humanity, he was suspected to have entertained still more honourable intentions in his favour. The king, therefore, was taken from his hands, and delivered over to lord Berkeley, and Mautravers, and Gournay, who were entrusted alternately, each for a month, with the charge of guarding him. While he was in the custody of Berkeley, he was still treated with the gentleness due to his rank and his misfortunes; but when the turn of Mautravers and Gournay came, every species of indignity was practised against him, as if their intention had been to break entirely the prince's spirit, and to employ his sorrows and afflictions, instead of more violent and more dangerous expedients, for the instruments of his murder (l). The cruel methods practised for laying Edward in his grave appeared too slow to the impatient Mortimer, he secretly sent orders to the two keepers, who were at his devotion, instantly to dispatch him; and these ruffians contrived to make the manner of his death as cruel and barbarous as possible. Taking advantage of Berkeley's sickness, in whose custody he then was, and who was thereby incapacitated from attending his charge; they came to Berkeley-castle, and put themselves in possession of the king's person. They threw him on a bed; held him down violently with a table, which they flung over him; thrust into his fundament a red-hot iron, which they inserted through a horn; and though the outward marks of violence upon his person were prevented by this expedient, the horrid deed was discovered to all the guards and attendants by the screams with which the agonizing king filled the castle, while his bowels were consuming. Thus miserably perished the unfortunate Edward, on the 21st of September, 1327, which was the forty-third of his age, after a reign of nineteen years and six months, from the time of his accession to that of his deposition.

Gournay and Mautravers were held in general detestation; and when the ensuing revolution in England hurled their protectors from power, they found it necessary to provide for their safety by flying the kingdom. Gournay was afterwards seized at Marseilles, delivered over to the seneschal of Guienne, put on board a ship with a view of carrying him to England; but was beheaded at sea by secret orders, as was supposed, from some nobles and prelates in England, anxious to prevent any discovery which he might make of his accomplices. Mautravers concealed himself for several years in Germany; but having found means of rendering some service to Edward III. he ventured to approach his person, threw himself on his knees before him, submitted to mercy, and received a pardon.

It is not easy to imagine a man more innocent and inoffensive than the unhappy king whose tragical death we have related; nor a prince less fitted for governing that fierce and turbulent people subjected to his authority. He was obliged to devolve on others the weight of government, which he had neither ability nor inclination to bear. The same indolence and want of penetration led him to make choice of ministers and favourites who were not always the best qualified for the trust committed to them. The seditious grandees, pleased with his weakness, yet complaining of it; under pretence of attacking his ministers, insulted his person and invaded his authority; and the impatient populace, mistaking the source of their grievances, threw all the blame upon the king, and increased the public disorders by their faction and violence. It was in vain to look for protection from the laws, whose voice, always feeble in those times, was not heard amidst the din of arms. What could not defend the king was less able to give shelter to any of the people: the whole machine of government was torn in pieces with fury and violence; and men, instead of regretting the manners of their age, and the form of their constitution, which required the most steady and most skilful hand to conduct them, imputed all errors to the person who had the misfortune to be entrusted with the reins of empire. But though such mistakes are natural and almost unavoidable while the events are recent, it is a shameful delusion in modern historians, to imagine that all the ancient princes, who were unfortunate in their government, were also tyrannical in their conduct, and that the seditions of the people always proceeded from some invasion of their privileges by the monarch. Even a great and a good king was not in that age secure against faction and rebellion, as appears in the case of Henry II.; but a great king had the best chance, as we learn from the history of the same period, for quelling and subduing them. Compare the reigns and characters of Edward I. and II. The father made several violent attempts against the liberties of the people: his barons opposed him: he was obliged, at least found it prudent, to submit; but as they dreaded his valour and abilities, they were content with reasonable satisfaction, and pushed no farther their advantages against him. The facility and weakness of the son, not his violence, threw every thing into confusion: the laws and government were overturned: an attempt to reinstate them was an unpardonable crime; and no atonement, but the deposition and tragical death of the king himself, could give those barons contentment. It is easy

(l) It is reported that one day, when Edward was to be shaved, they ordered cold and dirty water to be brought from the ditch for that purpose; and when he desired it to be changed, and was still denied his request, he burst into tears, which bedewed his cheeks: and he exclaimed, that in spite of their insolence, he should be shaved with clean and warm water, to perceive that a constitution which depended so much on the personal character of the prince, must necessarily, in many of its parts, be a government of will, not of laws. But always to throw, without distinction, the blame of all disorders upon the sovereign, would introduce a fatal error in politics, and serve as a perpetual apology for treason and rebellion: as if the turbulence of the great, and madness of the people, were not, equally with the tyranny of princes, evils incident to human society, and no less carefully to be guarded against in every well-regulated constitution.

While these abominable scenes passed in England, the theatre of France was stained with a wickedness equally barbarous, and still more public and deliberate. The order of knights templars had arisen during the first fervour of the crusades; and uniting the two qualities, the most popular in that age, devotion and valour, and exercising both in the most popular of all enterprizes, the defence of the Holy Land, they had made rapid advances in credit and authority, and had acquired, from the piety of the faithful, ample possessions in every country of Europe, especially in France. Their great riches, joined to the course of time, had, by degrees, relaxed the severity of these virtues; and the templars had in a great measure lost that popularity which first raised them to honour and distinction. Acquainted from experience with the fatigues and dangers of those fruitless expeditions to the East, they rather chose to enjoy in ease their opulent revenues in Europe; and being all men of birth, educated, according to the custom of that age, without any tincture of letters, they scorned the ignoble occupations of a monastic life, and passed their time wholly in the fashionable amusements of hunting, gallantry, and the pleasures of the table. Their rival order, that of St. John of Jerusalem, whose poverty had as yet preserved them from like corruptions, still distinguished themselves by their enterprizes against the infidels, and succeeded to all the popularity, which was lost by the indolence and luxury of the templars. But though these reasons had weakened the foundations of this order, once so celebrated and revered, the immediate cause of their destruction proceeded from the cruel and vindictive spirit of Philip the Fair, who, having entertained a private disgust against some eminent templars, determined to gratify at once his avidity and revenge, by involving the whole order in an undistinguished ruin. On no better information than that of two knights, condemned by their superiors to perpetual imprisonment for their vices and profligacy, he ordered on one day all the templars in France to be committed to prison, and imputed to them such enormous and absurd crimes, as are sufficient of themselves to destroy all the credit of the accusation. Besides their being universally charged with murder, robbery, and vices the most shocking to nature; every one, it was pretended, whom they received into their order, was obliged to renounce his Saviour, to spit upon the cross, and to join to this impiety the superstition of worshipping a gilded head, which was secretly kept in one of their houses at Marseilles. They also initiated, it was said, every candidate by such infamous rites, as could serve to no other purpose, than to degrade the order in his eyes, and to destroy for ever the authority of all his superiors over him. Above a hundred of these unhappy gentlemen were put to the torture, in order to extort from them a confession of their guilt: the more obstinate perished in the hands of their tormentors: several, to procure immediate ease in the violence of their agonies, acknowledged whatever was required of them: forged confessions were imputed to others; and Philip, as if their guilt were now certain, proceeded to a confiscation of all their treasures. But no sooner were the templars relieved from their tortures, than, preferring the most cruel execution to a life with infamy, they disavowed their confessions, exclaimed against the forgeries, justified the innocence of their order, and appealed to all the gallant actions performed by them in ancient or latter times, as a full apology for their conduct. The tyrant, enraged at this disappointment, and thinking himself now engaged in honour to proceed to extremities, ordered fifty-four of them, whom he branded as relapsed heretics, to perish by the punishment of fire in his capital: great numbers expired after a like manner in other parts of the kingdom; and when he found that the perseverance of these unhappy victims, in justifying to the last their innocence, had made deep impressions on the spectators, he endeavoured to overcome the constancy of the templars by new inhumanities. The grand master of the order, John de Molay, and another great officer, brother to the sovereign of Dauphiny, were conducted to a scaffold, erected before the church of Notre Dame, at Paris, a full pardon was offered them on the one hand; the fire, destined for their execution, was shown to them on the other; these gallant nobles still persisted in the protestations of their own innocence and that of their order; and were instantly hurried into the flames by the executioner (m).

The kingdom of England was afflicted with a grievous famine during several years of the reign of Edward II. Perpetual rains and cold weather not only destroyed the harvest, but bred a mortality among the cattle, and raised every kind of food to an enormous price. The parliament in 1315, endeavoured to fix more moderate rates to commodities; not sensible that such an attempt was impracticable, and that, were it possible to reduce the price of provisions by any other expedient than by introducing plenty, nothing could be more pernicious and destructive to the public. When the produce of a year, for instance, falls so short, as to afford full sustenance only for nine months, the only expedient for making it last all the twelve, is to raise the price, to put the people by that means on short allowance, and oblige them to save their food till a more plentiful season. But, in reality, the increase of prices is a necessary consequence of scarcity; and laws, instead of preventing it, only aggravate the evil, by cramping and restraining commerce. The parliament accordingly, in the ensuing year, repealed their ordinance, which they had found useless and burdensome.

The prices affixed by the parliament are somewhat remarkable: three pounds twelve shillings of our present money for the best stalled ox: for other oxen, two pounds eight shillings: a fat hog of two years old, ten shillings: a fat wether unshorn, a crown; if shorn, three shillings and six-pence: a fat goose, seven-pence halfpenny: a fat capon, six-pence: a fat hen, three-pence: two chickens, three-pence: four pigeons, three-pence: two dozen of eggs, three-pence. If we consider these prices, we shall find that butcher's meat, in this time of great scarcity, must still have been sold, by the parliamentary ordinance, six times cheaper than our middling prices at present: poultry somewhat lower; because, being now considered as a delicacy, it has risen beyond its proportion. In the country places of Ireland and Scotland, where delicacies bear no price, poultry is at present as cheap, if not cheaper, than butcher's meat. But the inference we would draw from the comparison of prices is still more considerable: we suppose that the rates, affixed by parliament, were inferior to the usual market prices in those years of famine and mortality of cattle; and that these commodities, instead of a third, had really risen to a half of the present value. But the famine at that time was so consuming, that wheat was sometimes sold for above four pounds ten shillings a quarter (n), usually for three pounds; that is, thrice our middling prices: a certain proof of the wretched state of tillage in those ages. We formerly found that the midling price of corn in that period was one-third of the present price; while the midling price of cattle was only a twelfth part; we here find the same immense disproportion in years of scarcity. It may thence be inferred with certainty, that the raising of corn was a species of manufactory, which few in that age could practise with advantage; and there is reason to think, that other manufactures more refined, were sold even beyond their present prices: at least there is a demonstration for it in the reign of Henry VII. from the rates affixed to scarlet and other broad cloth by act of parliament. During

(m) In all this barbarous injustice, Clement V. who was the creature of Philip, and then resided in France, fully concurred; and without examining a witness, or making any enquiry into the truth of facts, he summarily, by the plenitude of his apostolic power, abolished the whole order. The templars all over Europe were thrown into prison; their conduct underwent a strict scrutiny; the power of their enemies still pursued and oppressed them; but no where except in France, were the smallest traces of their guilt pretended to be found. England sent an ample testimony of their piety and morals; but as the order was now annihilated, the knights were distributed into several convents, and their possessions were, by command of the pope, transferred to the order of St. John.

all those times, it was usual for the princes and great nobility to make settlements of their velvet beds and silken robes, in the same manner as of their estates and manors. In the list of jewels and plate which had belonged to the ostentatious Gavaston, and which the king recovered from the earl of Lancaster after the murder of that favourite, we find some embroidered girdles, flowered shirts, and silk waistcoats. It was afterwards one article of accusation against that potent and opulent earl, when he was put to death, that he had purloined some of that finery of Gavaston. The ignorance of those ages in manufactures, and still more, their unskilful husbandry, seem a clear proof that the country was then far from being populous.

All trade and manufactures indeed were then at a very low ebb. The only country in the northern parts of Europe where they seem to have risen to any tolerable degree of improvement, was Flanders. When Robert, earl of that country, was applied to by the king, and was desired to break off commerce with the Scots, whom Edward called his rebels, and represented as excommunicated on that account by the church, the earl replied, that Flanders was always considered as common, and free and open to all nations.

The petition of the elder Despenser to parliament complaining of the devastation committed on his lands by the barons, contains several particulars which are curious, and discovers the manners of the age. He affirms, that they had ravaged sixty-three manors belonging to him, and he makes his losses amount to forty-six thousand pounds; that is, to one hundred and thirty-eight thousand of our present money. Among other particulars he enumerates twenty-eight thousand sheep, one thousand oxen and heifers, one thousand two hundred cows with their breed for two years, five hundred and sixty cart horses, two thousand hogs, together with six hundred bacons, eighty carcases of beef, and six hundred muttons in the larder; ten tuns of cyder, arms for two hundred men, and other warlike engines and provisions. The plain inference is, that the greater part of Despenser's vast estate, as well as the estates of the other nobility, was farmed by the landlord himself, managed by his stewards or bailiffs, and cultivated by his villans. Little or none of it was let on lease to husbandmen: its produce was consumed in rustic hospitality by the barons or his officers: a great number of idle retainers, ready for any disorder or mischief, were maintained by him: all who lived upon his estate were absolutely at his disposal: instead of applying to courts of justice, he usually sought redress by open force and violence: the great nobility were a kind of independent potentates, who, if they submitted to any regulations at all, were less governed by the municipal law, than by a rude species of the law of nations. The method in which we find they treated the king's favourits and ministers, is a proof of their usual way of dealing with each other. A party which complains of the arbitrary conduct of ministers, ought naturally to affect a great regard for the laws and constitution, and maintain at least the appearance of justice in their proceedings: yet those barons, when discontented, came to parliament with an armed force, constrained the king to assent to their measures, and without any trial or witness or conviction, passed from the pretended notoriety of facts, an act of banishment or attainder against the minister, which on the first revolution of fortune, was reversed by like expedients. The parliament, during factious times, was nothing but the organ of present power. Though the persons, of whom it was chiefly composed, seemed to enjoy great independence, they really possessed no true liberty; and the security of each individual among them, was not so much derived from the general protection of law, as from his own private power and that of his confederates. The authority of the monarch, though far from absolute, was irregular, and might often reach him; the current of a faction might overwhelm him: a hundred considerations of benefits and injuries, friendships and animosities, hopes and fears, were able to influence his conduct; and amidst these motives a regard to equity and law and justice was commonly, in those rude ages, of little moment. Nor did any man entertain thoughts of opposing present power, who did not deem himself strong enough to dispute the field with it by force, and was not prepared to give battle to the sovereign or the ruling party.

Before we conclude this reign, we cannot forbear making another remark, drawn from the detail of losses given in by the elder Despenser; particularly the great quantity of salted meat which he had in his larder; six hundred bacons, eighty carcases of beef, six hundred muttons. We may observe that the outrage of which he complained began after the third of May, or the eleventh new style, as we learn from the same paper. It is easy therefore to conjecture what a vast store of the same kind he must have laid up at the beginning of winter; and we may draw a new conclusion with regard to the wretched state of ancient husbandry, who could not provide sustenance for the cattle during winter, even in such a temperate climate as the south of England; for Despenser had but one manor so far north as Yorkshire. There being few or no inclosures, except perhaps for deer, no sown grass, little hay, and no other resource for feeding cattle; the barons, as well as the people, were obliegd to kill and salt their oxen and sheep in the beginning of winter, before they became lean upon the common pasture: a precaution still practised with regard to oxen in the least cultivated parts of this island. The salting of mutton is a miserable expedient, which has every where been long disused. From this circumstance, however trivial in appearance, may be drawn important inferences with regard to the domestic œconomy and manner of life in those ages.

The disorders of the times, from foreign wars and intestine dissensions, but above all, the cruel famine, which obliged the nobility to dismiss many of their retainers, increased the number of robbers in the kingdom; and no place was secure from their incursions. They met in troops like armies, and over-ran the country. Two cardinals themselves, the pope's legates, notwithstanding the numerous train which attended them, were robbed, and despoiled of their goods and equipage, when they travelled on the highway.

Among the other wild fancies of the age, it was imagined, that the persons affected with leprosy, a disease at that time very common, probably from bad diet, had conspired with the Saracens to poison all the springs and fountains; and men being glad of any pretence to get rid of those who were a burthen to them, many of those unhappy people were burnt alive on this chimerical imputation. Several Jews also were punished in their persons, and their goods were confiscated on the same account.

Stowe, in his survey of London, gives us a curious instance of the hospitality of the ancient nobility in this period: it is taken from the accounts of the cofferer or steward of Thomas earl of Lancaster, and contains the expences of that earl during the year 1313, which was not a year of famine. For the pantry, buttery, and kitchen, three thousand four hundred and five pounds. For three hundred and sixty-nine pipes of red wine, and two of white, one hundred and four pounds, &c. The whole seven thousand three hundred and nine pounds; that is near twenty-two thousand pounds of our present money; and making allowance for the cheapness of commodities, near a hundred thousand pounds.

I have seen a French manuscript, containing accounts of some private disbursements of this king. There is an article, among others, of a crown paid to one for making the king laugh. To judge by the events of this reign, this ought not to have been an easy undertaking.

The king left four children, two sons and two daughters: Edward, his eldest son and successor; John, created afterwards earl of Cornwall, who died young at Perth; Jane, afterwards married to David Bruce, king of Scotland; and Eleanor, married to Reginald count of Gueldres.

CHAP. VII.

EDWARD III.

EDWARD the Third may justly be said to have commenced his reign on the 24th of January, 1327, for on that day the same parliament which had effected the deposition of his father had caused him to be proclaimed king; and he had accordingly been crowned in Westminster Abbey, on the first of February, by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The violent party, which had taken arms against the unfortunate Edward II., deemed it requisite for their future security to pay so far an exterior obeisance to the law, as to desire a parliamentary indemnity, for all their illegal proceedings; on account of the necessity which it was pretended, they lay under, of employing force against against the Despensers and other evil counsellors, enemies of the kingdom. All the attainders also, which had passed against the earl of Lancaster and his adherents, when the chance of war turned against them, were easily reversed during the triumph of their party; and the Despensers, whose former attainder had been reversed by parliament, were now again, in this change of fortune, condemned by the votes of their enemies. A council of regency was likewise appointed by parliament, consisting of twelve persons; five prelates, the archbishops of Canterbury and York, the bishops of Winchester, Worcester, and Hereford; and seven lay peers, the earls of Norfolk, Kent, and Surrey, and the lords Wake, Ingham, Piercy, and Ross. The earl of Lancaster was appointed guardian and protector of the king's person (o). That none of the abettors in the late criminal proceedings might go unrewarded, at a subsequent parliament, held at Westminster on the 13th of November, a pardon was accorded to the citizens of London for all the acts of violence they had committed; and in consideration of those very crimes, for which a pardon was deemed necessary, they received a confirmation of their charter, and a considerable enlargement of their privileges: at the same time, the city obtained the right of extending its jurisdiction over the borough of Southwark. Although it was reasonable to expect, that, as the weakness of the former king had given reins to the licentiousness of the barons, great domestic tranquility would not prevail during the present minority.

The king of Scots declining in years and health, but retaining still that martial spirit which had raised his nation from the lowest ebb of fortune, deemed the present distracted state of England a favourable opportunity for attacking it with advantage, and regardless of the truce which had been concluded in the late reign, entered on the borders with an army, and made an attempt on the castle of Norham, in which he was disappointed by the vigilance of sir Robert Manners, the governor of that fortress; he then collected an army of twenty-five thousand men on the frontiers, and having given the command to the earl of Murray and lord Douglas, threatened an incursion into the northern counties. The English regency, after trying in vain every expedient to restore peace with Scotland, made vigorous preparations for war; and besides assembling an English army of nearly sixty thousand men, they invited back John de Beaumont, who had returned to Hainault, and some foreign cavalry, whom they had dismissed, and whose discipline and arms had appeared superior to those of their own country. Young Edward himself, inheriting the martial ardour of his grandfather, and burning with a passion for military fame, appeared at the head of these numerous forces; and began his march to the north; but his progress was retarded by a dangerous dispute that occurred at York between the English archers and the foreign troops, which was not settled till after much blood had been shed on both sides. When they had composed this quarrel, he left York on the 10th of July, 1327, and advanced to Durham, the appointed place of rendezvous, where he arrived on the 18th. Here he received intelligence that the Scottish army had passed the river Tyne, and were laying every thing waste around them.

Murray and Douglas, to whom Bruce had entrusted the command of the forces, were the two most celebrated warriors, bred in the long hostilities between the Scots and English; and their forces, trained in the same school, and enured to hardships, fatigues, and dangers, were perfectly qualified, by their habits and manner of life, for that desultory and destructive war which they carried into England. Except a body of about four thousand cavalry, well armed, and fit to make a steady impression in battle, the rest of the army were light-armed troops, mounted on small horses, which found subsistence every where, and carried them with rapid and unexpected marches whether they meant to commit depredations on the peaceable inhabitants, or to attack an armed enemy, or to retreat into their own country (p).

The chief difficulty which Edward met with, was to come up with an army so rapid in its marches, and so little incumbered in its motions. Though the flame and smoke of burning villages directed him sufficiently to the place of their encampment, he found, upon hastening thither, that they had already dislodged; and he soon discovered, by new marks of devastation, that they had removed to some distant quarter. After harassing his army during some time in this fruitless chace, he advanced northwards, and crossed the Tyne, with a resolution of awaiting them on their return homewards, and taking vengeance for all their depredations. But that whole country was already so much wasted by their frequent incursions, that it could not afford subsistence to his army; and he was obliged again to return southwards, and change his plan of operations. He had now lost all track of the enemy; and though he promised the reward of a hundred pounds a year to any one who should bring him an account of their motions, he remained inactive for some days, before he received any intelligence of them. He found at last, by the intelligence he received from Thomas Rockesby, that they had fixed their camp on the southern banks of the Were, as they intended to await a battle; but their prudent leaders had chosen the ground with such judgement, that the English, on their approach, saw it impracticable, without temerity, to cross the river in their front, and attack them in their present situation. Edward, impatient for revenge and glory, here sent them a defiance, and challenged them, if they dared, to meet him in an equal field, and try the fortune of arms. The bold spirit of Douglas could ill brook this bravado, and he advised the acceptance of the challenge; but he was over-ruled by Murray, who replied to Edward, that he never took the counsel of an enemy in any of his operations. The king, therefore, kept still his position opposite to the Scots; and daily expected, that necessity would oblige them to change their quarters, and give him an opportunity of overwhelming them with superior forces. After a few days, they suddenly decamped, and marched farther up the river; but still posted themselves in such a manner as to preserve the advantage of the ground, if the enemy should venture to attack them. Edward insisted, that all hazards should be run, rather than allow these ravagers to escape with impunity; but Mortimer's authority prevented the attack, and opposed itself to the valour of the young monarch. While the armies lay in this position, an incident happened which had well nigh proved fatal to the English. Douglas, having gotten the word, and surveyed exactly the situation of the English camp, entered it secretly in the night time, with a body of two hundred determined soldiers, and advanced to the royal tent, with a view of killing or carrying off the king in the midst of his army. But some of Edward's attendants, awaking in that critical moment, made resistance; his chaplain and chamberlain sacrificed their lives for his safety; the king himself, after making a valorous defence, escaped in the dark: and Douglas, having lost the greater part of his followers, was glad to make a hasty retreat with the remainder. Soon after, the Scottish army decamped without noise in the dead of night; and having thus gotten the start of the English, arrived without further loss in their own country. Edward, on entering the place of the Scottish encampment, found only six Englishmen, whom the enemy, after breaking their legs, had tied to trees, in order to prevent their carrying any intelligence to their countrymen (q).

The king was highly incensed at the disappointment which he had met with in his first enterprize, and at the head of so powerful an army. The symptoms which he had

(o) The appointment of this regency, however, proved merely a matter of form, for the Queen and Mortimer, by whose intrigues the late revolution had been effected, were careful to monopolize all the authority of the state; and, at once to increase the influence and gratify their avarice, they appropriated to themselves all the forfeited property of the Despensers and their adherents, which was of immense value. Isabella likewise obtained from this prostituted parliament a grant of twenty thousand pounds to discharge her debts; besides an annual pension of equal value, by way of jointure.

(p) Their whole equipage, as described by Froissard, lib. iv. chap. 18. consisted of a bag of oat-meal, which, as a supply in case of necessity, each soldier carried behind him; together with a light plate of iron, on which he instantly baked the meal into a cake in the open fields. But his chief subsistence was the cattle which he seized; and his cookery was as expeditious as all his other operations. After flaying the animal, he placed the skin, loose and hanging in the form of a bag, upon some stakes; he poured water into it, kindled a fire below, and thus made it serve as a cauldron for the boiling of his victuals.

(q) Froissard, lib. iv. chap. 19.—It is somewhat singular that Dr Henry, in his account of this transaction, should have omitted to mention this last circumstance, though he was studious to detail every minutia of cruelty at any time practised by the English: it is also strange he should have asserted that, although Douglas in his attempt on the king's person experienced a desperate resistance, he retired, after having killed three hundred of the enemy, with little loss.

had discovered of bravery and spirit gave extreme satisfaction, and were regarded as sure prognostics of an illustrious reign: but the general displeasure fell violently on Mortimer, who was already the object of public odium; and every measure which he pursued, tended to aggravate, beyond all bounds, the hatred of the nation both against him and queen Isabella.

When the council of regency was formed, Mortimer, though in the plenitude of his power, had taken no care to ensure a place in it; but this semblance of moderation was only a cover to the most iniquitous and most ambitious projects. He rendered that council entirely useless by usurping to himself the whole sovereign authority; he settled on the queen-dowager the greater part of the royal revenues; he never consulted either the princes of the blood or the nobility in any public measure; the king himself was so besieged by his creatures that no access could be procured to him; and all the envy which had attended Gavaston and Despenser fell much more deservedly on the new favourite.

Mortimer, sensible of the growing hatred of the people, thought it requisite on any terms to secure peace abroad; and he entered into a negociation with Robert Bruce for that purpose. As the claim of superiority in England, more than any other cause, had tended to inflame the animosities between the two nations, Mortimer, besides stipulating a marriage between Jane, sister of Edward, and David, the son and heir of Robert, consented to resign absolutely this claim, to give up all the homages done by the Scottish parliament and nobility, and acknowledge Robert as independent sovereign of Scotland. In return for these advantages, Robert stipulated the payment of thirty thousand marks to England; which are said to have been divided between the queen and Mortimer. This treaty was ratified by parliament (r), in April, 1328; but was nevertheless the source of great discontent among the people, who, having entered zealously into the pretensions of Edward I. and deemed themselves disgraced by the successful resistance made by so inferior a nation, were disappointed, by this treaty, in all future hopes both of conquest and of vengeance.

The princes of the blood, Kent, Norfolk, and Lancaster, were much united in their councils; and Mortimer justly entertained suspicions of their designs against him. In summoning them to parliament, he strictly prohibited them, in the king's name, from coming attended by an armed force, an illegal but usual practice in that age. The three earls, as they approached to Salisbury, the place appointed for the meeting of parliament, found, that though they themselves, in obedience to the king's command, had brought only their usual retinue with them, Mortimer and his party were attended by all their followers in arms; and they began with some reason to apprehend a dangerous design against their persons. They retreated, assembled their retainers, and were returning with an army to take vengeance on Mortimer; when the weakness of Kent and Norfolk, who deserted the common cause, obliged Lancaster also to make his submissions. The quarrel by the interposition of the prelates, seemed for the present to be appeased.

Charles le Bel, king of France, dying in the month of February, 1328, left one daughter: his queen, however, being pregnant, the next male heir was appointed regent, with a declared right of succession, if the issue should prove female. This prince was Philip of Valois, cousin-german to the deceased king, being son of Charles de Valois, brother to Philip the Fair. The queen of France being delivered of a daughter, the regency ended; and Philip was unanimously placed on the throne. Immediately after his accession, he summoned Edward to do homage to him for his continental territories; but the young monarch had been inspired with the absurd idea that he himself was heir to the French crown, in right of his mother Isabella, who was sister to Charles le Bel; though it was notorious that, by a custom uninterrupted during the course of eleven generations, females were expressly excluded from the throne; and, to suppose that they could convey a right which they did not possess themselves, was as gross an absurdity as folly or ambition had ever engendered. Impressed, however, with the idea that his claim was valid, Edward was loth to evince any mark of submission to a monarch whom he deemed an usurper of his rights; but, being unable, at present, to enter into a contest with Philip, he was obliged, however unwilling, to obey the citation and to content himself with protesting, before his own council, that in so doing he only acted from prudential motives, without any intention of renouncing his right to the crown of France. After this precaution, not less absurd than the claim itself, he sailed from Dover on the 26th of May, 1329; did homage to Philip at Amiens; and returned to England on the 11th of the following month. Though his stay in France was but short, he had sufficient time to be dazzled with the splendour of the French court, and to be stricken with the beauty and fertility of the country: and this confirmed him in the resolution he had previously adopted of undertaking, at a convenient period, the conquest of that kingdom.

But Mortimer, in order to intimidate the princes, determined to have a victim; and the simplicity, with the good intentions of the earl of Kent, afforded him soon after an opportunity of practising his malice upon him. By himself and his emissaries he propagated a report, that king Edward the Second was still alive, and detained in Corfe Castle, or in some secret prison in England. This report soon reached the ears of the earl of Kent, whose remorse for the part which he had acted against the late king probably inclined him to give credit to this intelligence, which he wished to be true: he entered into a design of restoring him to liberty, of reinstating him on the throne, and of making thereby some atonement for the injuries which he himself had unwarily done him. The earl of Kent wrote a letter to sir James Devernel, the governor of Corfe Castle, who having been tutored for the purpose, gave such an answer to the earl's enquiries as tended to confirm his suspicions. The governor even offered to deliver a letter to the king his brother; which Kent having written, Devernel immediately sent it to Mortimer; who having received it, by the assistance of the queen, procured a parliament to be summoned to meet at Westminster on the 11th of March, 1330. The earl of Kent was particularly cited to attend; and, on his appearance, was instantly arrested. As this servile parliament was chiefly composed of the queen's factious adherents, it was no difficult matter to persuade them to condemn a man who had become odious to his minion. Kent was tried on the 16th, and convicted of high treason, on the curious accusation of having intended to raise a dead man to the throne. The queen and Mortimer, apprehensive of young Edward's lenity towards his uncle, hurried on the execution, and the unfortunate earl was beheaded on March 19th, the third day after his trial. But so general was the affection born him, and such pity prevailed for his unhappy fate, that though peers had been easily found to condemn him, it was evening before his enemies could find an executioner to perform the office. About three months after the execution of the earl of Kent, the young queen was delivered of a son at Woodstock, who was baptized by the name of Edward, and afterwards so well known to the world under the appellation of The Black Prince. This happy event filled the nation with joy, and was attended with a favourable turn in the administration of affairs.

The earl of Lancaster, on pretence of his having assented to this conspiracy, was soon after thrown into prison: many of the prelates and nobility were prosecuted: Mortimer employed this engine to crush all his enemies, and to enrich himself and his family by the forfeiture of their estates. The estate of the earl of Kent was seized for his younger son Geoffrey: the immense fortunes of the Despensers and their adherents were mostly converted to his own use: he affected a state and dignity equal or superior to the royal: his power became formidable to every one: his illegal practices were daily complained of; and all parties, foregoing their mutual animosities, conspired in their hatred of this licentious favourite.

It was impossible that these abuses could long escape the observation of a prince endowed with so much spirit and judgement as young Edward, who being now in his eighteenth year, and feeling himself capable of governing, repined at being held in fetters by an insolent minister and an unprincipled parent. But so much was he surrounded by the emissaries of Mortimer, that it behoved him to conduct the project for subverting him with the same secrecy and precaution as if he had been forming a conspiracy against his sovereign. He communicated his intentions to lord Montacute; and as the destruction of Mortimer was the necessary consequence of the king's resolution, and must necessarily be effected before the project could take place, it could not fail to prove agreeable to the nobles, who entertained the most invetrate hatred hatred to that rapacious minion. The lords Molins, Clifford, Ufford, Stafford, and Clinter, sir John Nevil of Hornby, sir Edward, sir Humphrey, and sir William de Bohun, and some others, to engage in their views; and the meeting of the next parliament, which was appointed to assemble at the castle of Nottingham fifteen days after Michaelmas, was fixed on as a proper time for putting their scheme in execution. The queen-dowager and Mortimer lodged in that fortress: the king also was admitted, though with a few only of his attendants; and as the castle was strictly guarded, the gates locked every evening, and the keys carried to the queen, who placed them under her pillow, it became necessary to communicate the design to sir William Eland the governor, who zealously took part in it. By his direction the king's associates were admitted, on the morning of the 19th of October, through a subterraneous passage, which had formerly been contrived for a secret outlet from the castle, but was now buried in rubbish; and Mortimer, without having it in his power to make resistance, was suddenly seized in an apartment adjoining to that of the queen. Isabella earnestly entreated her son to spare the life of her beloved favourite; but he was deaf to all her solicitations, and her entreaties experienced the contempt they deserved. The base object of her criminal desires was sent, under a proper guard to the Tower of London. Two of Mortimer's sons, with many of his adherents, were apprehended at the same time; and that very day Edward caused a proclamation to be issued, in which his subjects were informed that he had taken the reins of government into his own hands. A new parliament was summoned to meet at Westminster on the 26th of November, in order to try the prisoners. No formal trial, however, took place. Mortimer was accused before that assembly of having usurped regal power from the council of regency appointed by parliament; of having procured the death of the late king; of having deceived the earl of Kent into a conspiracy to restore that prince, who was dead; of having solicited and obtained exorbitant grants of the royal demesnes; of having dissipated the public treasure; of secreting twenty thousand marks of the money paid by the king of Scotland; and of other crimes and misdemeanours. The guilt of Mortimer, from the notoriety of the facts preferred against him in the accusation was so apparent, that it was thought unnecessary to examine witnesses, or even to hear an answer from himself. So little were the forms of law attended to in those days; and so ignorant were our ancestors of this important truth—That in legal processes where the form of justice is destroyed, the substance must speedily follow! Mortimer was declared by the the parliament to be found guilty of high treason, and condemned to suffer the death of a traitor. This sentence was accordingly put in execution on the 29th of November, 1330, at a place called The Elms, in the vicinity of the metropolis; where his body was suffered to hang two days on the common gibbet (s). It is remarkable that this sentence was, near twenty years after, reversed by parliament, in favour of Mortimer's son; and the reason assigned was the illegal manner of proceeding. The principles of law and justice were established in England, not in such a degree as to prevent any iniquitious sentence against a person hateful to the ruling party; but sufficient, on the return of his credit or that of his friends, to serve as a reason or pretence for its reversal.

Justice was also executed, by a sentence of the house of peers, on some of the inferior criminals, particularly on Simon de Bereford: but the barons in that act of jurisdiction entered a protest, that though they had tried Bereford, who was none of their peers, they should not for the future be obliged to receive any indictment of a similar nature. The queen was confined to her own house at Risings near London: her revenue was reduced to three thousand pounds a year; and though the king, during the remainder of her life, paid her a decent visit once or twice a year, she never was able to reinstate herself in any credit or authority.

Edward having, by those just and spirited proceedings, now taken the reins of government into his own hands, applied himself with industry and judgment to redress all those grievances which had proceeded either from want of authority to the crown, or from the late abuses of it. He issued writs to the judges, enjoining them to administer justice, without paying any regard to arbitrary orders from the ministers. He was studious to enforce a rigid and impartial administration of justice; and as the robbers, thieves, murderers, and criminals of all kinds, had, during the course of public convulsions, multiplied to an enormous degree, and were openly protected by the great barons, who made use of them against their enemies, the king, after exacting from the peers a solemn promise in parliament, that they would break off all connections with such malefactors, set himself in earnest to remedy the evil. Many of these gangs had become so numerous as to require his own presence to disperse them; and he exerted both courage and industry in executing this salutary office. The ministers of justice, from his example, employed the utmost diligence in discovering, pursuing, and punishing the criminals; and this disorder was by degrees corrected, at least palliated; the utmost that could be expected with regard to a disease hitherto inherent in the constitution.

In proportion as the government required authority at home, it became formidable to the neighbouring nations; and the ambitious spirit of Edward sought, and soon found, an opportunity of exerting itself. The wise and valiant Robert Bruce, who had recovered by arms the independence of his country, and had fixed it by the last treaty of peace with England, soon after died, and left David his son, a minor, under the guardianship of Randolf earl of Murray, the companion of all his victories (t).

Edward Baliol, the son of that John who was crowned king of Scotland, had been detained some time a prisoner in England after his father was released; but having also obtained his liberty, he went over to France, and resided in Normandy, on his patrimonial estate in that country, without any thoughts of reviving the claims of his family to the crown of Scotland. His pretensions, however, plausible, had been so strenuously abjured by the Scots, and rejected by the English, that he was universally regarded as a private person; and he had been thrown into prison on account of some private offence of which he was accused. Lord Beaumont, a great English baron, who in the right of his wife claimed the earldom of Buchan in Scotland (u), found him in this situation; and deeming him a proper instrument for his purpose, made such interest with the king of France, who was not aware of the consequences, that he recovered him his liberty, and brought him over with him to England.

The injured nobles, possessed of such a head, began to think of vindicating their rights by force of arms; and they applied to Edward for his concurrence and assistance. But there were several reasons which deterred the king from openly avowing their enterprize. In this treaty with Scotland he had entered into a bond of twenty thousand pounds, payable to the pope, if within four years he violated the peace; and as the term was not yet elapsed, he dreaded the exacting of that penalty by the sovereign pontiff, who possessed so many means of forcing princes to make payment. He was also afraid that violence and injustice would every where be imputed to him, if he attacked with superior force a minor king, and a brother-in-law, whose independent title had so lately been acknowledged by a solemn treaty. And as the regent of Scotland, on every demand which had been made of restitution to the English barons, had always confessed the justice of their claim, and had only given an evasive answer, grounded on plausible pretences, Edward resolved not to proceed by open violence, but to employ like artifices against him. He secretly encouraged Baliol in his enterprize;

(s) Thus perished Roger Mortimer, earl of March, by a death well suited to the ignominy of his life. This rapacious nobleman appears not to have possessed a single virtue that could afford the smallest compensation for the numerous bad qualities which vitiated his mind, and corrupted his heart; and, as the principal actions by which he had risen to distinction consisted in the complicated crimes of treason, adultery, and murder, it is not surprizing that he should at length have sunk to the disgrace he so justly merited; and that the rigour of his fate should have become an object of applause, instead of regret.

(t) It had been stipulated in this treaty, that both the Scottish nobility who before the commencement of the wars enjoyed lands in England, and the English who inherited estates in Scotland, should be restored to their respective possessions: but though this article had been executed pretty regularly on the part of Edward, Robert, who observed that the estates claimed by Englishmen were much more numerous and valuable than the others, either thought it dangerous to admit so many secret enemies into the kingdom, or found it difficult to wrest from his own followers the possessions bestowed on them as a reward of former services; and he had protracted the performance of his part of the stipulation. The English nobles, disappointed in their expectations, began to think of a remedy; and as their influence was great in the north, their enmity alone, even though unsupported by the king of England, became dangerous to the minor prince, who succeeded to the Scottish throne.

(u) Rymer, vol. iv. p. 251.

connived at his assembling forces in the north; and gave countenance to the nobles who were disposed to join the attempt. A force of near two thousand five hundred men were inlisted under Baliol, by Umfreville earl of Angus, the lords Beaumont, Ferrars, Fitz-warin, Wake, Stafford, Talbot, and Moubray. As these adventurers apprehended that the frontiers would be strongly armed and guarded, they resolved to make their attack by sea; and having embarked at Ravenspur, and sailing up the Frith of Forth, they landed at Kinghorn on the 6th of August, 1332.

Scotland was at that time in a very different situation from that in which it had appeared under the victorious Robert. Besides the loss of that great monarch, whose genius and authority preserved entire the whole political fabric, and maintained an union among the unruly barons, lord Douglas, impatient of rest, had gone over to Spain, in a crusade against the Moors, and had there perished in battle: the earl of Murray, who had long been declining through age and infirmities, had lately died, and had been succeeded in the regency by Donald earl of Marre, a man of much inferior talents: the military skill of the Scots, though still unbroken, was left without a proper guidance and direction; and a minor king seemed ill qualified to defend an inheritance, which it had required all the consummate valour and abilities of his father to acquire and maintain. But as the Scots were apprized of the intended invasion, great numbers, on the appearance of the English fleet, immediately ran to the shore, in order to prevent the landing of the enemy. Baliol had valour and activity, and he drove back the Scots with considerable loss. He marched westward into the heart of the country, flattering himself that the ancient partizans of his family would declare for him. But the fierce animosities which had been kindled between the two nations, inspiring the Scots with a strong prejudice against a prince supported by the English, he was regarded as a common enemy; and the regent found no difficulty in assembling a great army to oppose him. It is pretended that Marre had no less than forty thousand men under his banners; but the same hurry and impatience that made him collect a force, which from its greatness was so disproportioned to the occasion, rendered all his motions unskilful and imprudent. The river Erne ran between the two armies; and the Scots, confiding in that security, as well as in their great superiority of numbers, kept no order in their encampment. Baliol passed the river in the night-time; attacked the unguarded and undisciplined Scots on the 11th of August; threw them into confusion, which was increased by the darkness, and by their very numbers to which they trusted; and he beat them off the field with great slaughter. But in the morning, when the Scots were at some distance, they were ashamed of having yielded the victory to so weak a foe, and they hurried back to recover the honour of the day. Their eager passions urged them precipitately to battle, without regard to some broken ground which lay between them and the enemy, and which disordered and confounded their ranks. Baliol seized the favourable opportunity, advanced his troops upon them, prevented them from rallying, and anew chased them off the field with redoubled slaughter. There fell above twelve thousand Scots in this action; and among these the flower of the nobility; the regent himself, the earl of Carrie, a natural son of their late king, the earls of Athole and Monteith, lord Hay of Errol, constable, and the lords Keith and Lindsey. The loss of the English scarcely exceeded thirty men; a strong proof among many others, of the miserable state of military discipline in those ages.

Baliol soon after made himself master of Perth; but still was not able to bring over any of the Scots to his party. Patric Dunbar earl of March, and sir Archibald Douglas, brother to the lord of that name, appeared at the head of the Scottish forces, which amounted still to near forty thousand men; and they proposed to reduce Baliol and the English by famine. They blockaded Perth by land; they collected some vessels with which they invested it by water; but Baliol's ships, attacking the Scottish fleet, gained a complete victory; and opened the communication between Perth and the sea. The Scotch armies were then obliged to disband for want of pay and subsistence: the nation was, in effect, subdued by a handful of men: each nobleman who found himself most exposed to danger, successively submitted to Baliol: that prince was crowned at Scone, on the 27th of September: David, his competitor, was sent over to France with his betrothed wife, Jane, sister to Edward; and the heads of his party sued to Baliol for a truce, which he granted them, in order to assemble a parliament in tranquillity, and have his title recognized by the whole Scottish nation.

But Baliol's imprudence, or his necessities, making him dismiss the greater part of his English followers, he retired to Annan, there to celebrate the approaching festival of Christmas. But sir Archibald Douglas, the young earl of Murray, Sir Simon Fraser, and some other chieftains of that party, who had been taught by their late sovereign to despise both treaties and truces when impelled by interest to a violation of them, attacked Baliol in the night so suddenly, that he had scarcely time to effect his escape to Carlisle, on horseback, half naked: his brother John Baliol was slain, with many of his adherents; and thus lost his kingdom by a revolution as sudden as that by which he had acquired it.

While Baliol enjoyed his short-lived and precarious royalty, he had been sensible, that without the protection of England, it would be impossible for him to maintain possession of the throne; and he had secretly sent a message to Edward, offered to acknowledge his superiority, to renew the homage for his crown, and to espouse the princess Jane, if the pope's consent could be obtained for dissolving her former marriage, which was not yet consummated. Edward, ambitious of recovering that important concession, made by Mortimer during his minority, threw off all scruples, and willingly accepted the offer; but as the dethroning of Baliol had rendered this stipulation of no effect, the king prepared to reinstate him in possession of the crown; an enterprize which appeared from late experience so easy and so little hazardous. The Scots, in the mean time, flushed with success, made incursions into Cumberland, and spread their devastations over the whole country; which afforded a fair pretence to Edward for espousing the cause of the monarch whom they had lately expelled. Accordingly, having summoned a parliament to meet at York, in the beginning of March, he asked the advice of his barons on the subject. They declined, however, giving any opinion: but their approbation of his scheme, though not openly expressed, (probably from the idea of gaining a plausible pretext for exciting commotions in the kingdom, from which they were ever sure to derive advantage, should he fail in its execution,) was certainly implied in the grant which they made him, in order to support the enterprize, of a fifteenth of the personal estates of the nobility and gentry, and a tenth of the moveables of boroughs. But to this grant they added a petition, that the king would thenceforth live on his own revenue, without grieving his subjects by illegal taxes, or by the outrageous seizure of their goods in the shape of purveyance.

As the Scots expected that the chief brunt of the war would fall upon Berwick, Douglas, the regent, threw a strong garrison into that place, under the command of sir William Keith, and he himself assembled a great army on the frontiers, ready to penetrate into England, as soon as Edward should have invested that place. The English army was less numerous, but better supplied with arms and provisions, and retained in stricter discipline; and the king, notwithstanding the valiant defence made by Keith, had, in two months, reduced the garrison to extremities, and had obliged them to capitulate, on the 16th of July, 1333: they engaged to surrender, if they were not relieved by the morning of the 20th by their countrymen. This intelligence being conveyed to the Scottish army, which was preparing to invade Northumberland, changed their plan of operations, and engaged them to advance towards Berwick, and attempt the relief of that important fortress. Douglas, who had ever purposed to decline a pitched battle, in which he was sensible of the enemy's superiority, and who intended to have drawn out the war by small skirmishes, and by mutually ravaging each other's country, was forced, by the impatience of his troops, to put the fate of the kingdom upon the event of one day. He attacked the English at Halidown Hill, a little north of Berwick, on the 19th; and, though his heavy-armed cavalry dismounted, in order to render the action more steady and desperate, they were received with such valour by Edward, and were so galled by the English archers, that they were soon thrown into disorder, and, on the fall of Douglas their general, were totally routed. The whole army fled in confusion, and the English, but much more the Irish, under the command of Lord Darcy, gave little quarter in the pursuit:

pursuit: all the nobles of chief distinction were either slain or taken prisoners: near thirty thousand of the Scots fell in the action: while the loss of the English was inconsiderable (x).

After this fatal blow, the Scottish nobles had no other resource than instant submission; and Edward, leaving a considerable body with Baliol to complete the conquest of the kingdom, returned with the remainder of his army to England. Baliol was acknowledged king by a parliament assembled at Perth soon after Michaelmas; the superiority of England was again recognized; many of the Scottish nobility swore fealty to Edward; and to complete the misfortunes of that nation, Baliol repaired to Newcastle, on the 12th of June, 1334, and on the 18th did homage in person to Edward for the kingdom of Scotland; and ceded to him the counties of Edinburgh, Roxburgh, Selkirk, Dumfries, Peebles, Haddington, and Linlithgow; which were accordingly declared to be for ever annexed to the English monarchy.

If Baliol, on his first appearance, was dreaded by the Scots, as an instrument employed by England for the subjection of the kingdom, this deed confirmed all their suspicions, and rendered him the object of universal detestation. Whatever submissions they might be obliged to make, they considered him, not as their prince, but as the delegate and confederate of their determined enemy; and neither the manners of the age, nor the state of Edward's revenue, permitting him to maintain a standing army in Scotland, the English forces were no sooner withdrawn, than the Scots revolted from Baliol, and returned to their former allegiance under Bruce. Sir Andrew Murray, appointed regent by the party of this latter prince, employed with success his valour and activity in many small but decisive actions against Baliol; and in a short time had almost wholly expelled him the kingdom. Edward was obliged again to make application to his parliament for supplies, to assemble an army, and to march into Scotland: the Scots, taught by experience, withdrew into their hills and fastnesses: he destroyed the houses and ravaged the estates of those whom he called rebels: but this confirmed them still farther in their obstinate antipathy to England and to Baliol; and being now rendered desperate, they were ready to take advantage, on the first opportunity, of the retreat of their enemy, and they soon re-conquered their country from the English. Edward made anew his appearance in Scotland with like success: he found every thing hostile in the kingdom, except the spot on which he was encamped; and though he marched uncontrolled as far north as Inverness, from whence he proceeded to Aberdeen, which he reduced to ashes, the nation itself was farther than ever from being broken and subdued. Besides being supported by their pride and anger, passions difficult to tame, they were encouraged, amidst all their calamities, by daily promises of relief from France; and as a war was now likely to break out between that kingdom and England, they had reason to expect, from this incident, a great diversion of that force which had so long oppressed and overwhelmed them.

We now come to a transaction, on which depended the most memorable events, not only of this long and active reign, but of the whole English and French history, during more than a century; and it will therefore be necessary to give a particular account of the springs and causes of it.

It had long been a prevailing opinion, that the crown of France could never descend to a female; and, in order to give more authority to this maxim, and assign it a determinate origin, it had been usual to derive it from a clause in the Salian Code, the law of an ancient tribe among the Franks; though that clause, when strictly examined, carries only the appearance of favouring this principle, and does not really, by the confession of the best antiquaries, bear the sense commonly imposed upon it. But though positive law seems wanting among the French for the exclusion of females, the practice had taken place; and the rule was established beyond controversy on some ancient, as well as some modern precedents. During the first race of the monarchy, the Franks were so rude and barbarous a people, that they were incapable of submitting to a female reign; and in that period of their history there were frequent instances of kings advanced to royalty in prejudice to females, who were related to the crown by nearer degrees of consanguinity. These precedents, joined to like causes, had also established the male succession in the second race; and though the instances were neither so frequent nor so certain during that period, the principle of excluding the female line seems still to have prevailed, and to have directed the conduct of the nation. During the third race, the crown had descended from father to son for eleven generations, from Hugh Capet to Louis Hutin; and thus, in fact, during the course of nine hundred years, the French monarchy had always been governed by males, and no female, and none who founded his title on a female, had ever mounted the throne. Philip the Fair, father of Louis Hutin, left three sons, this Louis, Philip the Long, and Charles the Fair, and one daughter, Isabella queen of England. Louis Hutin, the eldest, left at his death one daughter, by Margaret sister to Eudes duke of Burgundy; and as his queen was then pregnant, Philip his younger brother was appointed regent, till it should appear whether the child proved a son or a daughter. The queen bore a male, who lived only a few days: Philip was proclaimed king; and as the duke of Burgundy made some opposition, and asserted the rights of his niece, the states of the kingdom, by a solemn and deliberate decree, gave her an exclusion, and declared all females for ever incapable of succeeding to the crown of France. Philip died after a short reign, leaving three daughters; and his brother Charles, without dispute or controversy, then succeeded to the crown. The reign of Charles was also short: he left one daughter; but as his queen was pregnant, the next male heir was appointed regent, with a declared right of succession, if the issue should prove female. This prince was Philip de Valois, cousin german to the deceased king; being the son of Charles de Valois, brother of Philip the Fair. The queen of France was delivered of a daughter: the regency ended; and Philip de Valois was unanimously placed on the throne of France.

The king of England, who was at that time a youth of fifteen years of age, embraced a notion that he was intitled, in right of his mother, to the succession of the kingdom, and that the claim of the nephew was preferable to that of the cousin-german. There could not well be imagined a notion weaker or worse grounded. The principle of excluding females was of old an established opinion in France, and had acquired equal authority with the most express and positive law: it was supported by ancient precedents; it was confirmed by recent instances, solemnly and deliberately decided; and what placed it still farther beyond controversy; if Edward was disposed to question its validity, he thereby cut off his own pretensions; since the three last kings had all left daughters, who were still alive, and who stood before him in the order of succession. He was therefore reduced to assert, that, though his mother Isabella was, on account of her sex, incapable of succeeding, he himself, who inherited through her, was liable to no such objection, and might claim by the right of propinquity. But, besides that this pretension was more favourable to Charles king of Navarre, descended from the daughter of Louis Hutin, it was so contrary to the established principles of succession in every country of Europe, was so repugnant to the practice, both in private and public inheritances, that nobody in France thought of Edward's claim: Philip's title was universally recognized; and he never imagined that he had a competitor; much less so formidable an one as the king of England.

But though the youthful and ambitious mind of Edward had rashly entertained this notion, he did not think proper to insist on his pretensions, which must have immediately involved him, on very unequal terms, in a dangerous and implacable war with so powerful a monarch. Philip was a prince of mature years, of great experience, and, at that time, of an established character both for prudence and valour; and by these circumstances, as well as by the internal union of his people, and their acquiescence in his undoubted right, he possessed every advantage above a raw youth, newly raised, by injustice and violence, to the government of the most intractable and most turbulent subjects in Europe. But there immediately occurred an incident which required that Edward should either openly declare his pretensions, or for ever renounce and abjure them. He was summoned to do homage for Guienne: Philip was preparing to compel him by force of arms: that country was in a very bad state of defence; and the forfeiture of so rich an inheritance was, by the feudal law, the immediate consequence of his refusing or declining to perform the duty of a vassal. Edward therefore thought it prudent to submit to present necessity: he went over to Amiens: did homage to Philip; and as there had arisen some controversy concerning the terms of this submission, he afterwards sent over a formal deed, in which he acknowledged that he owed liege homage to France; which was in effect ratifying, and that in the strongest terms, Philip's title to the the crown of that kingdom. His own claim indeed was so unreasonable, and so thoroughly disavowed by the whole French nation, that to insist on it was no better than pretending to the violent conquest of the kingdom; and it is probable that he would never have farther thought of it, had it not been for some incidents which excited an animosity between the monarchs.

Robert of Artois was descended from the blood royal of France, was a man of great character and authority, had espoused Philip's sister, and, by his birth, talents, and credit, was entitled to make the highest figure, and fill the most important offices, in the monarchy. This prince had lost, in 1309, the county of Artois, which he claimed as his birth-right, by a sentence, commonly deemed iniquitous, of Philip the Fair; and he was seduced to attempt recovering possession by an action so unworthy of his rank and character as a forgery. The detection of this crime covered him with shame and confusion: his brother-in-law not only abandoned him, but prosecuted him with violence, and confiscated his effects: Robert, incapable of bearing disgrace, left the kingdom, and hid himself in the Low Countries: chased from that retreat, by the authority of Philip, he came over to England; in spite of the French king's menaces and remonstrances, he was favourably received by Edward; and was soon admitted into the councils, and shared the confidence of that monarch. Abandoning himself to all the movements of rage and despair, he endeavoured to revive the prepossession entertained by Edward in favour of his title to the crown of France, and even flattered him, that it was not impossible for a prince of his valour and abilities to render his claim effectual. The king was the more disposed to hearken to suggestions of this nature, because he had, in several particulars, found reason to complain of Philip's conduct with regard to Guienne, and because that prince had both given protection to the exiled David Bruce, and supported, at least encouraged, the Scots in their struggles for independence. This resentment gradually filled the breasts of both monarchs, and made them incapable of hearkening to any terms of accommodation proposed by the pope, who never ceased interposing his good offices between them. Philip thought that he should be wanting to the first principles of policy, if he abandoned Scotland: Edward affirmed, that he must relinquish all pretensions to generosity, if he withdrew his protection from Robert. The former, informed of some preparations for hostilities which had been made by his rival, issued a sentence of felony and attainder against Robert, and declared, that every vassal of the crown, whether within or without the kingdom, who gave countenance to that traitor, would be involved in the same sentence; a menace easy to be understood: the latter, resolute not to yield, endeavoured to form alliances in the Low Countries and on the frontiers of Germany, the only places from which he either could make an effectual attack upon France, or produce such a diversion as might save the province of Guienne, which lay so much exposed to the power of Philip.

The king began with opening his intentions to the count of Hainault his father-in-law; and having engaged him in his interests, he employed the good offices and counsels of that prince in drawing into his alliance the other sovereigns of that neighbourhood. The duke of Brabant was induced by his mediation, and by large remittances of money from England, to promise his concurrence: the archbishop of Cologne, the duke of Gueldres, the marquis of Juliers, the count of Namur, the lords of Faquemont and Baquen, were engaged by like motives to embrace the English alliance. These sovereign princes could supply, either from their own states or from the bordering countries, great numbers of warlike troops; and naught was wanting to make the force on that quarter very formidable but the accession of Flanders; which Edward procured by means somewhat extraordinary and unusual.

As the Flemings were the first people in the northern parts of Europe, that cultivated arts and manufactures, the lower ranks of men among them had risen to a degree of opulence unknown elsewhere to those of their station in that barbarous age; had acquired privileges and independence; and began to emerge from that state of vassalage, or rather of slavery, into which the common people had been universally thrown by the feudal institutions. It was probably difficult for them to bring their sovereign and their nobility to conform themselves to the principles of law and civil government, so much neglected in every other country: it was impossible for them to confine themselves within the proper bounds in their opposition and resentment against any instance of tyranny: they had risen in tumult: had insulted the nobles: had chased their earl into France: and delivering themselves over to the guidance of a seditious leader, had been guilty of all that insolence and disorder, to which the thoughtless and enraged populace are so much inclined, whenever they are unfortunate enough to be their own masters.

Their present leader was James d'Arteville, a brewer in Ghent, who governed them with a more absolute sway than had ever been assumed by any of their lawful sovereigns: he placed and displaced the magistrates at pleasure: he was accompanied by a guard, who, on the least signal from him, instantly assassinated any man that happened to fall under his displeasure: all the cities of Flanders were full of his spies; and it was immediate death to give him the smallest umbrage: the few nobles who remained in the country, lived in continual terror from his violence: he seized the estates of all those whom he had either banished or murdered; and bestowing a part on their wives and children, converted the remainder to his own use. Such were the first effects that Europe saw of popular violence; after having groaned, during so many ages, under monarchical and aristocratical tyranny.

James d'Arteville was the man to whom Edward addressed himself for bringing over the Flemings to his interests; and that prince, the most haughty and most aspiring of the age, never courted any ally with so much assiduity and so many submissions, as he employed towards this seditious and criminal tradesman. D'Arteville, proud of these advances from the king of England, and sensible that the Flemings were naturally inclined to maintain connexions with the English, who furnished them the materials of their woollen manufactures, the chief source of their opulence, readily embraced the interests of Edward, and invited him over into the Low Countries. Edward, before he entered on this great enterprize, affected to consult his parliament, asked their advice, and obtained their consent. And the more to strengthen his hands, he procured from them a grant of twenty thousand sacks of wool; which might amount to about a hundred thousand pounds: this commodity was a good instrument to employ with the Flemings; and the price of it with his German allies. He completed the other necessary sums by loans, by pawning the crown jewels, by confiscating, or rather robbing at once all the Lombards, who now exercised the invidious trade formerly monopolized by the Jews, of lending on interest; and being attended by a body of English forces, and by several of his nobility, he sailed over to Flanders. Having at length completed his preparations, and appointed his eldest son Edward guardian of the realm, he sailed from the port of Orwell in Suffolk, the 16th of July, 1338, with a large fleet and a powerful army.

The German princes, in order to justify their unprovoked hostilities against France, had required the sanction of some legal authority; and Edward, that he might give them satisfaction on this head, had applied to Lewis of Bavaria, then emperor, and had been created by him vicar of the empire; an empty title, but which seemed to give him a right of commanding the service of the princes of Germany. The Flemings, who were vassals of France, pretending like scruples with regard to the invasion of their liege lord; Edward, by the advice of d'Arteville, assumed, in his commissions, the title of king of France; and, in virtue of this right, claimed their assistance for dethroning Philip de Valois, the usurper of his kingdom. This step, which he feared would destroy all future amity between the kingdoms, and beget endless and implacable jealousies in France, was not taken by him without much reluctance and hesitation; and not being in itself very justifiable, it has in the issue been attended with many miseries to both kingdoms. From this period we may date the commencement of that great animosity, which the English nation have ever since borne to the French, which has so visible an influence on all future transactions, and which has been, and continues to be, the spring of many rash and precipitate resolutions among them. In all the preceding reigns since the conquest, the hostilities between the two crowns had been only casual and temporary; and as they had never been attended with any bloody or dangerous event, the traces of them were easily obliterated by the first treaty of pacification. The English nobility and gentry valued themselves on their French or Norman extraction; they affected to employ the language of that country in all public transactions, and even in familiar conversation: and both the English court and camp being always full of nobles, who came from different provinces of France, the two people were during some centuries, more intermingled together than any two distinct nations whom we meet with in history. But the fatal pretensions of Edward III. dissolved all these connexions, and left the seeds of great animosity in both countries, especially among the English. For it is remarkable, that this latter nation, though they were commonly the aggressors, and by their success and situation were enabled to commit the most cruel injuries on the other, have always retained a stronger tincture of national antipathy; nor is their hatred retaliated on them to an equal degree by the French. That country lies in the middle of Europe, has been successively engaged in hostilities with all its neighbours, the popular prejudices have been diverted into many channels, and among a people of softer manners, they never rose to a great height against any particular nation, till the late revolution, which has subverted and overthrown the governments of all the kingdoms of Europe, except England, and made France by far the greatest power in the world.

Philip made great preparations against the attack from the English, and such as seemed more than sufficient to secure him from the danger. Besides the concurrence of all the nobility in his own populous and warlike kingdom, his foreign alliances were both more cordial and more powerful than those which were formed by his antagonist. The pope, who at this time lived at Avignon, was dependent on France, and being disgusted at the connexions between Edward and Lewis of Bavaria, whom he had excommunicated, he embraced with zeal and sincerity the cause of the French monarch. The king of Navarre, the duke of Bretagne, the count of Bar, were in the same interests; and on the side of Germany the king of Bohemia, the Palatine, the dukes of Lorraine and Austria, the bishop of Liege, the counts of Deuxpoint, Vaudemont, and Geneva. The allies of Edward were in themselves weaker; and having no object but his money, which began to be exhausted, they were slow in their motions and irresolute in their measures. The duke of Brabant, the most powerful among them, seemed even inclined to withdraw himself wholly from the alliance; and the king was necessitated, both to give the Brabanters new privileges in trade, and to contract his son Edward with the daughter of that prince, ere he could bring him to fulfil his engagements. The summer of 1339 was wasted in conferences and negociations before Edward could take the field; and he was obliged, in order to allure his German allies into his measures, to pretend that the first attack should be made upon Cambray a city of the empire which had been garrisoned by Philip. But finding, upon trial, the difficulty of the enterprize, he conducted them towards the frontiers of France; and there saw, by a sensible proof, the vanity of his expectations: the count of Namur, and even the count of Hainault his brother-in-law (for the old count was dead), refused to commence hostilities against their liege lord, and retired with their troops. So little account did they make of Edward's pretensions to the crown of France!

The king, however, notwithstanding this defection, entered the enemy's country, and encamped on the fields of Vironfosse near Capelle, with an army of near fifty thousand men, composed almost entirely of foreigners; Philip approached him with an army of near double the force, composed chiefly of native subjects; and it was daily expected that a battle would ensue. But the English monarch was averse to engage against so great a superiority: the French thought it sufficient if he eluded the attacks of his enemy, without running any unnecessary hazard. The two armies faced each other for some days: mutual defiances were sent: and Edward, at last, retired into Flanders, and disbanded his army.

Such was the fruitless and almost ridiculous conclusion of Edward's mighty preparations; and, as his measures were the most prudent that could be embraced in his situation, he might learn from experience in what a hopeless enterprize he was engaged. His expences, though they had led to no end, had been consuming and destructive: he had contracted near three hundred thousand pounds of debt; he had anticipated all his revenue; he had pawned every thing of value which belonged either to himself or his queen; he was obliged, in some measure, even to pawn himself to his creditors, by not sailing to England till he obtained their permission, and by promising, on his word of honour, to return in person, if he did not remit their money. Among other engagements which the king had entered into with his allies, he had promised not to quit the continent till the conclusion of the war; but this was a promise he now found it impossible to perform, his presence being absolutely necessary in England, to procure supplies for supporting the contest. Having therefore left his queen and his infant son Lionel, afterwards duke of Clarence, with four of his principal nobles, at Antwerp, as hostages for his return within a week after Midsummer, he embarked for England, and landed at Harwich on the 21st of February, 1340.

But he was a prince of too much spirit to be discouraged by the first difficulties of an undertaking; and was anxious to retrieve his honour by more successful and more gallant undertakings. For this purpose, he had, during the course of the campaign, sent orders to summon a parliament by his son Edward, whom he had left with the title of guardian, and to demand some supply in his urgent necessities. The barons seemed inclined to grant his request; but the knights, who often, at this time, acted as a separate body from the burgesses, made some scruple of taxing their constituents without their consent; and they desired the guardian to summon a new parliament, which might be properly empowered for that purpose. The situation of the king and parliament was for the time nearly similar to that which they constantly fell into about the beginning of the last century; and similar consequences began visibly to appear. The king, sensible of the frequent demands which he should be obliged to make on his people, had been anxious to ensure to his friends a seat in the house of commons, and at his instigation the sheriffs and other placemen had made interest to be elected into that assembly; an abuse which the knights desired the king to correct by the tenor of his writ of summons, and which was accordingly remedied. On the other hand, the knights had professedly annexed conditions to their intended grant, and required a considerable retrenchment of the royal prerogatives, particularly with regard to purveyance, and the levying of the ancient feudal aids for knighting the king's eldest son, and marrying his eldest daughter. The new parliament called by the guardian retained the same free spirit; and though they offered a large supply of thirty thousand sacks of wool, no business was concluded; because the conditions which they annexed appeared too high to be compensated by a temporary concession. But when Edward himself came over to England, in February, 1340, as above-mentioned, he summoned another parliament, to meet on the 29th of March, and had the interest to procure a supply on more moderate terms. A confirmation of the two charters, and of the privileges of boroughs, a pardon for old debts and trespasses, and a remedy for some abuses in the execution of common law, were the chief conditions insisted on; and the king, in return for his concessions on these heads, obtained from the barons and knights an unusual grant, for two years, of the ninth sheaf, lamb, and fleece on their estates; and from the burgesses a ninth of their moveables at their true value. The whole parliament also granted a duty of forty shillings on each sack of wool exported, on each three hundred wool fells, and on each last of leather for the same term of years; but dreading the arbitrary spirit of the crown, they expressly declared that this grant was to continue no longer, and was not to be drawn into precedent (y).

But there appeared at this time another jealousy in the parliament, which was very reasonable, and was founded on a sentiment that ought to have engaged them rather to check than support the king in all those ambitious projects so little likely to prove successful, and so dangerous to the nation if they did. Edward, who before the commencement of the former campaign, had in several commissions assumed the title of king of France, now more openly in all public deeds gave himself that appellation, and always quartered the arms of France with those of England in his seals and ensigns. The parliament thought proper to obviate the consequences of this measure, and to declare that they owed him no obedience as king of France, and that the two kingdoms must for ever remain distinct and independent (z).

(y) Being soon after sensible that this supply, though considerable and very unusual in that age, would come in slowly, and would not answer the king's urgent necessities, proceeding both from his debts and his preparations for war; they agreed that twenty thousand sacks of wool should immediately be granted him, and their value be deducted from the ninths which were afterwards to be levied.

As Philip was apprized, from the preparations which were making both in England and the Low Countries, that he must expect another invasion from Edward, he fitted out a great fleet of four hundred vessels, manned with forty thousand men; and he stationed them off Sluys, with a view of intercepting the king in his passage. The English navy was much inferior in number, consisting only of two hundred and sixty sail; but whether it were by the superior abilities of Edward, or the greater dexterity of his seamen, they gained the wind of the enemy, and had the sun in their backs; and with these advantages began the action, on the morning of Midsummer day. The battle was fierce and bloody: the English archers, whose force and address were now much celebrated, galled the French on their approach; and when the ships grappled together, and the contest became more steady and furious, the example of the king, and of so many gallant nobles who accompanied him, animated to such a degree the seamen and soldiery, that they maintained every where a superiority over the enemy. The French also had been guilty of some imprudence in taking their station so near the coast of Flanders, and chusing that place for the scene of action. The Flemings, descrying the battle, hurried out of their harbours, and brought a reinforcement to the English; which coming unexpectedly, had a greater effect than in proportion to its power and numbers. Two hundred and thirty French ships were taken; thirty thousand Frenchmen were killed, with two of their admirals: the loss of the English was inconsiderable, compared to the greatness and importance of the victory. None of Philip's courtiers, it is said, dared to inform him of the event; till his fool or jester gave him a hint, by which he discovered the loss that he had sustained. The day after the action, Edward entered the harbour of Sluys in triumph.

This splendid victory increased the king's authority among his allies, who assembled their forces with expedition, and joined the English army. Edward marched to the frontiers of France, early in the month of July, at the head of above one hundred thousand men, consisting chiefly of foreigners, a more numerous army than either before or since has ever been commanded by any king of England. At the same time the Flemings, to the number of fifty thousand men, marched out under the command of Robert d'Artois, and laid siege to St. Omer; but this tumultuary army, composed entirely of tradesmen unexperienced in war, was routed by a sally of the garrison, and, notwithstanding the abilities of their leader, was thrown into such a panic, that they were instantly dispersed, and never more appeared in the field. The attempts of Edward, though not attended with so inglorious an issue, proved equally vain and fruitless. The king of France had assembled an army more numerous than the English; was accompanied by all the chief nobility of his kingdom; was attended by many foreign princes, and even by three monarchs, the kings of Bohemia, Scotland, and Navarre: yet he still adhered to the prudent resolution of putting nothing to hazard, and after throwing strong garrisons into all the frontier towns, he retired backwards, persuaded that the enemy, having wasted their force in some tedious and unsuccessful enterprize, would afford him an easy victory.

Tournay was at that time one of the most considerable cities of Flanders, containing above sixty thousand inhabitants of all ages, who were affectionate to the French government; and as the secret of Edward's designs had not been strictly kept, Philip learned that the English, in order to gratify their Flemish allies, had intended to open the campaign with the siege of this place: he took care, therefore, to supply it with a garrison of fourteen thousand men, commanded by the bravest nobility of France; and he reasonably expected that these forces, joined to the inhabitants, would be able to defend the city against all the efforts of the enemy. Accordingly Edward, when he commenced the siege, about the end of July, found every where an obstinate resistance: the valour of one side was encountered with equal valour by the other: every assault was repulsed, and proved unsuccessful; and the king was at last obliged to turn the siege into a blockade, in hopes that the great numbers of the garrison and citizens, which had enabled them to defend themselves against his attacks, would but expose them to be the more easily reduced by famine. The count d'Eu, who commanded in Tournay, as soon as he perceived that the English had formed this plan of operations, endeavoured to save his provisions, by expelling all the useless mouths; and the duke of Brabant, who wished no success to Edward's undertakings, gave every one a free passage through his quarters.

After the siege had continued ten weeks, the city was reduced to distress; and Philip, recalling all his scattered garrisons, advanced towards the English camp, at the head of a mighty army, with an intention of still avoiding any decisive action, but of seeking some opportunity for throwing relief into the place. Here Edward, irritated with the small progress he had hitherto made, and with the disagreeable prospect that lay before him, sent Philip a defiance by a herald; and challenged sim to decide their claims for the crown of France, either by single combat, or by an action of a hundred against a hundred, or by a general engagement. But Philip replied, that Edward having done homage to him for the duchy of Guienne, and having solemnly acknowledged him for his superior, it by no means became him to send a defiance to his liege lord and sovereign: that he was confident, notwithstanding all Edward's preparations, and his conjunction with the rebellious Flemings, he himself should soon be able to chace him from the frontiers of France: that as the hostilities from England had prevented him from executing his purposed crusade against the infidels, he trusted in the assistance of the Almighty, who would reward his pious intentions, and punish the aggressor, whose ill-grounded claims had rendered them abortive: that Edward proposed a duel on very unequal terms, and offered to hazard only his own person against both the kingdom of France, and the person of the king: but that if he would increase the stake, and put also the kingdom of England on the issue of the duel, he would, notwithstanding that the terms would still be unequal, very willingly accept of the challenge. It was easy to see that these mutual bravadoes were intended only to dazzle the populace, and that the two kings were too wise to think of executing their pretended purpose.

While the French and English armies lay in this situation, the siege having continued about two months, and a general action was every day expected, Jane, countess of Hainault (a), interposed with her good offices, and endeavoured to conciliate peace between the contending monarchs, and to prevent any farther effusion of blood. As Philip had no material claims on his antagonist, she found that he hearkened willingly to the proposals; and even the haughty and ambitious Edward, who found his allies less ardent in his cause than he had expected, his supplies come in more slowly than he had hoped for, and being convinced of his fruitless attempt, was not averse to her negociation. He was sensible, from experience, that he had engaged in an enterprize, which far exceeded his force; and that the power of England was never likely to prevail over that of a superior kingdom, firmly united under an able and prudent monarch. He discovered that all the allies whom he could gain by negociation were at bottom averse to his expedition; and though they might second it to a certain length, would immediately detach themselves, and oppose its final accomplishment, if ever they could be brought to think that there was seriously any danger of it. He even saw that their chief purpose was to obtain money from him; and as his supplies from England had much disappointed his expectations, he perceived their growing indifference in his cause, and their desire of embracing all plausible terms of accommodation. Convinced at last that an undertaking must be imprudent which could only be supported by means so unequal to the end, he concluded a truce, on the 25th of September, for nine months, which left both parties in possession of their present acquisitions, and stopped all farther hostilities on the side of the Low Countries, Guienne, and Scotland, till midsummer next. A negociation was soon after opened at Arras, under the mediation of the pope's legates; and the truce was attempted to be converted into solid peace. Edward here required that Philip should free Guienne from all claims of superiority, and entirely withdraw his protection from Scotland; but as he seemed not anywise entitled to make such

(z) 14 Edward III. They undoubtedly foresaw that France, if subdued, would in the end prove the seat of government; and they deemed this previous protestation necessary, in order to prevent their becoming a province to that monarchy. A frail security, if the event had really taken place!

(a) This princess was mother-in-law to Edward, and sister to Philip; and though she had taken the vows in a convent, and had renounced the world, she left her retreat on this occasion, and employed all her pious efforts to allay those animosities which had taken place between persons so nearly related to her and to each other.

high demands, either from his past successes, or future prospects, they were totally rejected by Philip, who agreed only to a prolongation of the truce till the 25th of June, 1342.

The king of France soon after detached the emperor Lewis from the alliance of England, and engaged him to revoke the title of Imperial Vicar, which he had conferred on Edward. The king's other allies on the frontiers of France, disappointed in their hopes, gradually withdrew from the confederacy. And Edward himself, harassed by his numerous and importunate creditors, was obliged to make his escape by stealth into England: to effect which, he repaired to Zealand with great secrecy; and having embarked with his queen, landed at the Tower on the 30th of November, about midnight

The unusual tax of a ninth sheaf, lamb, and fleece, imposed by parliament, together with the great want of money, and still more of credit in England, had rendered some remittances the English were obliged to make extremely backward; nor could it be expected, says Hume, that any expeditious method of collecting an imposition, which was so new in itself, and which yielded only a gradual produce, could possibly be contrived by the king or his ministers. And though the parliament, foreseeing the inconvenience, had granted, as a present resource, twenty thousand sacks of wool, the only English goods that bore a sure price in foreign markets, and were the next to ready money; it was impossible but the getting possession of such a bulky commodity, the gathering it from different parts of the kingdom, and the disposing of it abroad, must take up more time than the urgency of the king's affairs would permit, and must occasion all the disappointments complained of during the course of the campaign in Flanders, where the king at that time was. But though nothing had happened which Edward might not reasonably have foreseen, he was so irritated with the unfortunate issue of his military operations, and so much vexed and affronted by his foreign creditors, that he was determined to throw the blame somewhere off himself, and he came highly chagrined into England. He discovered his peevish disposition by the first act which he performed after his arrival: as he landed unexpectedly, he found the Tower negligently guarded; and he immediately committed to prison Nicholas de la Beches the constable, and all others who had the charge of that fortress, and he treated them with unusual rigour. His vengeance fell next on the officers of the revenue, the sheriffs, the collectors of the taxes, the undertakers of all kinds; and besides dismissing all of them from their employments, he appointed commissioners to inquire into their conduct; and these men, in order to gratify the king's humour, were sure not to find any person innocent who came before them. Sir John St. Paul, keeper of the privy seal; sir John Stonore, chief justice; Andrew Aubrey, mayor of London; with many sheriffs of counties, and other public officers of inferior note, were displaced and imprisoned; as were also the bishop of Chichester, chancellor, and the bishop of Litchfield, treasurer. John Stratford, archbishop of Canterbury, to whom the charge of collecting the new imposts had been chiefly entrusted, fell likewise under the king's displeasure; but being absent at the time of Edward's arrival, he escaped feeling the immense effects of it (b).

Dreading to incur that censure he was conscious of meriting, the faithless primate had hastily retired to Canterbury; whither the king sent him a summons to appear at court, and answer for his conduct. To this citation Stratford coolly replied, that he did not chuse to appear in a place where he should be exposed to the malicious attacks of his enemies; and that, as to the other part of his majesty's proposal, which required him to account for the sums he had received, he should take the propriety of complying with it into consderation. But this mode of consideration was as curious as his reply was insolent; for he immediately summoned the clergy of his diocese to assemble in the cathedral of Canterbury, where, in an harangue well calculated to accomplish the design he meant to promote, he highly extolled the conduct of his immaculate predecessor, Thomas à Becket; censured himself for having suffered secular transactions to engross too large a portion of his time; and declared his firm resolution of supporting, in future, the rights and immunities of the church. As the officers who had been committed to prison for malversation were chiefly clergymen, this undaunted champion of clerical privileges, boldly issued a general sentence of excommunication against all who on any pretext exercised violence on the person or goods of clergymen; who infringed those privileges secured by the great charter, and by ecclesiastical canons; or who accused a prelate of treason, or any other crime, in order to bring him under the king's displeasure. Even Edward had reason to think himself struck at by this impudent sentence; both on account of the imprisonment of the two bishops and that of other clergymen concerned in levying the taxes, and on account of his seizing their lands and moveables, that he might make them answerable for any balance which remained in their hands. The clergy, with the primate at their head, were now formed into a regular combination against the king; and many calumnies were spread against him, in order to deprive him of the confidence and affections of his people. It was pretended that he meant to recal the general pardon, and the remission which he had granted of old debts, and to impose new and arbitrary taxes without consent of parliament. The archbishop went so far, in a letter to the king himself, as to tell him that there were two powers by which the world was governed, the holy pontifical apostolic dignity, and the royal subordinate authority: that of these two powers the clerical was evidently the supreme; since the priests were to answer at the tribunal of the divine judgement for the conduct of kings themselves: that the clergy were the spiritual fathers of all the faithful, and amongst others of kings and princes; and were entitled, by a heavenly charter, to direct their wills and actions, and to censure their transgressions; and that prelates had heretofore cited emperors before their tribunol, had sitten in judgement on their life and behaviour, and had anathematized them for their obstinate offences. These topics were not well calculated to appease Edward's indignation; and when he called a parliament, to assemble at Westminster on the 23rd of April, he sent not to the primate, as to the other peers, a summons to attend it. Stratford was not discouraged at this mark of neglect or anger: he appeared before the gates, arrayed in his pontifical robes, holding the crosier in his hand, and accompanied by a pompous train of priests and prelates; and he required admittance as the first and highest peer in the realm. But Edward, who was neither to be dazzled by priestly pomp, nor to be abashed by sacerdotal confidence, refused to let him enter till the charge preferred against him had undergone a minute investigation. This well-timed display of firmness in the king at length subdued the overbearing pride and insolence of the primate, who consented to make a public submission to his sovereign in the Painted Chamber; upon which he was permitted to take his seat; and a committee was appointed to examine his answers, and report the result of their examination to the next parliament. But, as no parliament was assembled till two years after this period, the archbishop, in the interim, had found means to re-instate himself in the favour of his sovereign, and all the proceedings against him were therefore cancelled (c).

Edward

(b) There were strong reasons which might discourage the kings of England in those ages from bestowing the chief offices of the crown on prelates and other ecclesiastical persons. These men had so intrenched themselves in privileges and immunities, and so openly challenged an exemption from all secular jurisdiction, that no civil penalty could be inflicted on them for any malversation in office; and as even treason itself was declared to be no canonical offence, nor was allowed to be a sufficient reason for deprivation or other spiritual censures, that order of men had ensured to themselves an almost total impunity, and were not bound by any political law or statute. But, on the other hand, there were many peculiar causes which favoured their promotion. Besides that they possessed almost all the learning of the age, and were best qualified for civil employments; the prelates enjoyed equal dignity with the greatest barons, and gave weight, by their personal authority, to the powers entrusted with them: while at the same time they did not endanger the crown, by accumulatsng wealth or influence in their families, and were restrained, by the decency of their character, from that open rapine and violence so often practised by the nobles. These motives had induced Edward, as well as many of his predecessors, to entrust the chief departments of government in the hands of ecclesiastics, at the hazard of seeing them disown his authority as soon as it was turned against them.

(c) Mr. Hume, in his account of this violent altercation between the Crown and the Mitre, concludes that the king was induced to put a stop to the prosecution against the primate from a conviction that the accusations he had preferred against him were wholly groundless. But this is an inference that no passage in the "Anglia Sacra," which he quotes, can possibly authorize; and which, indeed, is neither warranted by the accounts of any of the ancient writers, nor by the conduct of either of the parties concerned in the dispute. Had Stratford been actuated by the honest pride of conscious innocence, his conduct would have been manly and moderate, not violent and seditious: far from shunning investigation.

Edward now found himself in a bad situation both with his own people and with foreign states; and it required all his genius and capacity to extricate himself from such multiplied difficulties and embarrassments. His unjust and exorbitant claims on France and Scotland had engaged him in an implacable war with these two kingdoms, his nearest neighbours: he had lost almost all his foreign alliances by his irregular payments: he was deeply involved in debts, for which he owed a consuming interest: his military operations had vanished into smoke; and except his vaval victory, none of them had been attended even with glory or renown, either to himself or to the nation: the animosity between him and the clergy was open and declared: the people were discontented on account of many arbitrary measurs in which he had been engaged; and, what was more dangerous, the nobility, taking advantage of his present necessities, were determined to retrench his power, and by encroaching on the ancient prerogatives of the crown, to acquire to themselves independence and authority. But the aspiring genius of Edward, which had so far transported him beyond the bounds of discretion, proved at last sufficient to reinstate him in his former authority, and, finally, to render his reign the most triumphant that is to be met with in English history: though for the present he was obliged, with some loss of honour, to yield to the current which bore so strongly against him.

The parliament framed an act, which was likely to produce considerable innovations in the government. They premised, that whereas the great charter had, to the manifest peril and slander of the king, and damage of his people, been violated in many points, particularly by the imprisonment of free men, and the seizure of their goods, without suit, indictment, or trial, it was necessary to confirm it anew, and to oblige all the chief officers of the law, together with the steward and chamberlain of the household, the keeper of the privy-seal, the comptroller and treasurer of the wardrobe, and those who were entrusted with the education of the young prince, to swear to the regular observance of it. They also remarked, that the peers of the realm had formerly been arrested and imprisoned, and dispossessed of their temporalities and lands, and even some of them put to death, without judgement or trial; and they therefore enacted, that such violences should henceforth cease, and no peer be punished but by the award of his peers in parliament. They required, that whenever any of the great offices above mentioned became vacant, the king should fill it by the advice of his council, and the consent of such barons as should at that time be found to reside in the neighbourhood of the court. And they enacted, that on the third day of every session, the king should resume into his own hand all these offices, except those of justices of the two benches, and the barons of exchequer; that the ministers should for the time be reduced to private persons; that they should in that condition answer before parliament to any accusation brought against them; and that, if they were found anywise guilty, they should finally be dispossessed of their offices, and more able persons be substituted in their place (d).

In return for these important concessions, the parliament offered the king a grant of twenty thousand sacks of wool; and his wants were so urgent, from the clamours of his creditors, and the demands of his foreign allies, that he was obliged to accept of the supply on these hard conditions. He ratified this statute in full parliament; but he secretly entered a protest of such a nature as were sufficient, one would imagine, to destroy all future trust and confidence with his people: he declared, that as soon as his convenience permitted, he would, from his own authority, revoke what had been extorted from him (e). Accordingly, he was no sooner possessed of the parliamentary supply, than he issued an edict, which contains many extraordinary positions and pretensions. He first asserts, that that statute had been enacted contrary to law; as if a free legislative body could ever do any thing illegal. He next affirms, that as it was hurtful to the prerogatives of the crown, which he had sworn to defend, he had only dissembled when he seemed to ratify it, but that he had never in his own breast given his assent to it. He does not pretend that either he or the parliament lay under force; but only that some inconvenience would have ensued, had he not seemingly affixed his sanction to that pretended statute. He therefore, with the advice of his council, and of some earls and barons, abrogates and annuls it; and though he professes himself willing and determined to observe such articles of it as were formerly law, he declares it to have thenceforth no force or authority (f). The parliaments that were afterwards assembled took no notice of this arbitrary exertion of royal power, which, by a parity of reason, left all their laws at the mercy of the king; and during the course of two years, Edward had so far re-established his influence, and freed himself from his present necessities, that he then obtained from his parliament a legal repeal of the noxious statute (g).

But though Edward had recovered his authority at home, which had been impaired by the events of the French war, he had undergone so many mortifications from that attempt, and saw so little prospect of success, that he would probably have dropped his claim, had not a revolution in Bretagne opened to him more promising views, and given his enterprizing genius a full opportunity of displaying itself.

John III. duke of Bretagne had, during some years, found himself declining through age and infirmities; and having no issue, was solicitous to prevent those disorders to which, on the event of his demise, a disputed succession might expose his subjects. His younger brother, Guy, count of Penthievre, had left only one daughter, named Jane, whom the duke deemed his heir; and as his family had inherited the duchy by a female succession, he thought her title preferable to that of the count of Montfort, who, being his brother by a second marriage, was the male heir of that principality. He accordingly purposed to bestow his niece in marriage on some person who might be able to defend her rights; and he cast his eye on Charles Blois, nephew of the king of France, by his mother Margaret of Valois, sister to that monarch. But as he both loved his subjects, and was beloved by them, he determined not to take this important step without their approbation; and having assembled the states of Bretagne, he represented to them the advantages of that alliance, and the prospect which it gave of an entire settlement of the succesion. The Bretons willingly concurred in his choice: the marriage was concluded: all his vassals, and among the rest the count of Montfort, swore fealty to Charles and to his consort as to their future sovereigns; and every danger of civil commotions seemed to be obviated, as far as human prudence could provide a remedy against them. But on the death of this good prince, which happened on the 30th of April, 1341, the ambition of the count of Montfort broke through all these regulations, and kindled a war, not only dangerous to Bretagne, but to a great part of Europe. While Charles de Blois was soliciting at the court of France the investiture of the duchy, Montfort was active in acquiring immediate possession of it; and by force or intrigue he made himself master of Rennes, Nantz, Brest, Hennebonne, and all the most important fortresses, and engaged many considerable barons to acknowledge his authority. Sensible that he could expect no favour from Philip, he made a voyage to England, on pretence of soliciting his claim to the earldom of Richmond, which had devolved to him by his brother's death; and there, offering to do homage to Edward as king of France, for the duchy of Bretagne, he proposed a strict alliance for the support of their mutual pretensions. Edward saw immediately the advantages attending this treaty: Montfort, an active and valiant prince, closely united to him by interest, opened vestigation, he would have courted enquiry; instead of threats he would have employed proofs; or, if he had been weak enough to have made use of the former, when he found they had failed to intimidate, he never would have had recourse to submission. Of the force of this last instance, Mr. Hume, indeed, was probably aware; and therefore, with the prudence of a partizan, though not with the fidelity of an historian, suppressed it.

(d) 15 Edward III.—By these last regulations the barons approached as near as they durst to those restrictions which had formerly been imposed on Henry III. and Edward II. and which, from the dangerous consequences attending them, had become so generally odious, that they did not expect to have either the concurrence of the people in demanding them, or the assent of the present king in granting them.

(e) Statutes at Large, 15 Edward III. That this protest of the king's was secret, appears evidently, since otherwise it would have been ridiculous in the parliament to have accepted of his assent: besides, the king owns that he dissembled, which would not have been the case had his protest been public.

(f) Statutes at Large, 15 Edward III.

(g) This transaction certainly contains remarkable circumstances, which discover the manners and sentiments of that age, and may prove what inaccurate work might be expected from such rude hands, when employed in legislation, and in rearing the delicate fabric of laws and a constitution.

at once an entrance into the heart of France, and afforded him much more flattering views than his allies on the side of Germany and the Low Countries, who had no sincere attachment to his cause, and whose progress was also obstructed by those numerous fortifications which had been raised on that frontier. Robert de Artois was zealous in enforcing these considerations: the ambitious spirit of Edward was little disposed to sit down under those repulses which he had received, and which he thought had so much impaired his reputation: and it required a very short negociation to conclude a treaty of alliance between two men who, though their pleas with regard to the preference of male or female succession were directly opposite, were intimately connected by their immediate interests.

As this treaty was still a secret, Montfort on his return ventured to appear at Paris, in order to defend his cause before the court of peers; but observing Philip and his judges to be prepossessed against his title, and dreading their intentions of arresting him, till he should restore what he had violently seized, he suddenly made his escape; and war immediately commenced between him and Charles de Blois. Philip sent his eldest son the duke of Normandy, with a powerful army, to the assistance of the latter; and Montfort, unable to keep the field against his rival, remained in the city of Nantz, where he was besieged. The city was taken by the treachery of the inhabitants; Montfort fell into the hands of his enemies; was conducted as prisoner to Paris; and was shut up in the tower of the Louvre.

This event seemed to put an end to the pretensions of the count of Montfort; but his affairs were immediately retrieved by an unexpected incident, which inspired his party with new vigour. Jane, countess of Montfort, and sister to the earl of Flanders, the most extraordinary woman of the age, was roused, by the captivity of her husband, from those domestic cares to which she had hitherto confined her attention; and she courageously undertook to support the falling fortunes of her family. No sooner did she receive the fatal intelligence, than she assembled the inhabitants of Rennes, where she then resided; and carrying her infant son in her arms, deplored to them the calamity of their sovereign. She recommended to their care the illustrious orphan, the sole male remaining of their ancient princes, who had governed them with such indulgence and lenity, and to whom they had ever professed the most zealous attachment. She declared herself willing to run all hazards with them in so just a cause; discovered the resources which still remained in the alliance of England; and entreated them to make one effort against an usurper who, being imposed on them by the arms of France, would in return make a sacrifice to his protector of the ancient liberties of Bretagne. The audience, moved by the affecting appearance, and inspirited by the noble conduct of the princess, vowed to live and die with her in defending the rights of her family: all the other fortresses of Bretagne embraced the same resolution: the countess went from place to place, encouraging the garrisons, providing them with every thing necessary for subsistence, and concerting the proper plans for defence; and after she had put the whole province in a good posture, she shut herself up in Hennebonne, where she waited with impatience the arrival of those succours which Edward had promised her. Meanwhile she sent over her son to England, that she might both put him in a place of safety, and engage the king more strongly, by such a pledge, to embrace with zeal the interests of her family.

Charles de Blois, anxious to make himself master of so important a fortress as Hennebonne, and still more to take the countess prisoner, from whose vigour and capacity all the difficulties to his succession in Bretagne now proceeded, sat down before the place, in the spring of 1342, with a great army, composed of French, Spaniards, Genoese, and some Bretons; and he conducted the attack with indefatigable industry. The defence was no less vigorous: the besiegers were repulsed in every assault: frequent sallies were made with success by the garrison; and the countess herself being the most forward in all military operations, every one was ashamed not to exert himself to the utmost in this desperate situation. One day she perceived that the besiegers, entirely occupied in an attack, had neglected a distant quarter of their camp; and she immediately sallied forth at the head of a body of two thousand cavalry, threw them into confusion, did great execution upon them, and set fire to their tents, baggage, and magazines: but when she was preparing to return, she found that she was intercepted, and that a considerable body of the enemy had thrown themselves between her and the gates. She instantly took her resolution: she ordered her men to disband, and to make the best of their way by flight to Brest: she met them at the appointed place of rendezvous, collected another body of five hundred horse, returned to Hennebone, broke unexpectedly through the enemy's camp, and was received with shouts and acclamations by the garrison, who, encouraged by this reinforcement, and by so rare an example of female valour, determined to defend themselves to the last extremity. The reiterated attacks, however, of the besiegers had at length made several breaches in the walls; and it was apprehended that a general assault, which was every hour expected, would overpower the garrison, diminished in numbers, and extremely weakened with watching and fatigue. It became necessary to treat of a capitulation; and the bishop of Leon was already engaged, for that purpose, in a conference with Charles de Blois; when the countess, who had mounted a high tower, and was looking towards the sea with great impatience, descried some sails at a distance. She immediately exclaimed, "Behold the succours! the English succours! no capitulation!" This fleet had on board a body of heavy-armed cavalry, and six thousand archers, whom Edward had prepared for the relief of Hennebonne, but who had been long detained by contrary winds (h). They entered the harbour under the command of sir Walter Manny, one of the bravest captains of England; and having inspired fresh courage into the garrison, immediately sallied forth, beat the besiegers from all their posts, and obliged them to raise the siege.

But notwithstanding this success, the countess of Montfort found that her party, overpowered by numbers, was declining in every quarter; and she went to solicit more effectual succours from the king of England. Edward granted her a considerable reinforcement under Robert de Artois: who embarked on board a fleet of forty-five ships and sailed to Bretagne. He was met in his passage by the enemy; an action ensued, where the countess behaved with her wonted valour, and charged the enemy sword in hand; but the hostile fleets, after a sharp action, were separated by a storm, and the English arrived safely in Bretagne. The first exploit of Robert was the taking of Vannes, which he mastered by conduct and address: but he survived a very little time this prosperity. The Breton noblemen of the party of Charles assembled secretly in arms, attacked Vannes of a sudden, and carried the place; chiefly by reason of a wound received by Robert, of which he soon after died at sea on his return to England.

After the death of this unfortunate prince, the chief author of all the calamities with which his country was overwhelmed for more than a century, Edward undertook in person the defence of the countess of Montfort; and as the last truce with France was now expired, the war, which the English and French had hitherto carried on as allies to the competitors of Bretagne, was thenceforth conducted in the name and under the standard of the two monarchs. The king sailed from Sandwich on the 5th of October, 1342, and landed at Morbian, near Vannes, with an army of twelve thousand men; and, being master of the field, he endeavoured to give a lustre to his arms, by commencing at once three important sieges, that of Vannes, of Rennes, and of Nantz. But by undertaking too much, he failed of success in all his enterprizes. Even the siege of Vannes, which Edward conducted in person with vigour, advanced but slowly; and the French had all the leisure requisite for making preparations against him. The duke of Normandy, eldest son of Philip, appeared in Bretagne, at the head of an army of thirty thousand infantry and four thousand cavalry; and Edward was now obliged to draw together all his forces, and to entrench himself strongly before Vannes, where the duke of Normandy soon after arrived, and in a manner invested the besiegers. The garrison and the French camp were plentifully supplied with provisions: while the English, who durst not make any attempt upon the place in the presence of a superior army, drew all their subsistence from England, exposed to the hazards of the sea, and sometimes to those which arose from the fleet of the enemy. In this dangerous situation, Edward willingly hearkened to the mediation of the pope's legates, the cardinals of Palestine and Frescati, who endeavoured to negociate, if not a peace, at least a truce, truce, between the two kingdoms. A treaty was concluded for a cessation of arms during three years; and Edward had the abilities, notwithstanding his present dangerous situation, to procure to himself very equal and honourable terms. It was agreed that Vannes should be sequestered, during the truce, in the hands of the legates, to be disposed of afterwards as they pleased; and though Edward knew the partiality of the court of Rome towards his antagonists, he saved himself, by this device, from the dishonour of having undertaken a fruitless expedition. It was also stipulated, that all prisoners should be released, that the places in Bretagne should remain in the hands of the present possessors, and that the allies on both sides should be comprehended in the truce. Edward, soon after concluding this treaty, embarked with his army for England, and landed at Weymouth on the 2nd of March, 1343.

The king on his arrival in England, laid the truce he had concluded before a parliament, which had been summoned to meet at Westminster on the 28th of April, and consulted them on the proposals which had been made by the legates for entering into a negociation in order to promote a solid peace. The lords and commons having separately deliberated on the subject, expressed their approbation of the truce, and advised the king to send commissioners to negociate an accommodation in the presence of the pope; and the commons, who had deputed sir William Russel to deliver their sentiments apart, farther added, that if he could not obtain a reasonable peace, they would assist him to the utmost in supporting the honour of the nation and the dignity of the crown. In consequence of this advice, the king appointed Hugh Despenser, lord of Glamorgan; Ralph de Stafford; William de Norwich, dean of Lincoln; William Russel, knight; and Andrew de Ufford, professor of civil law; his commissioners, to negociate a peace with those of Philip de Valois, in the presence of the pope, who was to be considered as acting in the capacity of a common friend, and not in that of a judge. These conferences were accordingly opened at Avignon, where the sovereign pontiff then resided, on the 22nd of October, and continued till the 22nd of the following month; when they concluded, without coming to any determination.

Each monarch now endeavoured to throw on the other the blame of the infraction of the truce, for though it was calculated for a long time, it was but of short duration. Of course the historians of the two countries differ in their account of the matter. It seems probable, however, as is affirmed by the French writers, that Edward, in consenting to the truce, had no other view than to extricate himself from a perilous situation into which he had fallen, and was afterwards very careless in observing it. In all the memorials which remain on this subject, he complains chiefly of the punishment inflicted on Oliver de Clisson, John de Montauban, and other Breton noblemen, who he says were partizans of the family of Montfort, and consequently under the protection of England. But it appears, that at the conclusion of the truce, these noblemen had openly, by their declarations and actions, embraced the cause of Charles de Blois; and if they had entered into any secret correspondence and engagements with Edward, they were traitors to their party, and were justly punishable by Philip and Charles for their breach of faith; nor had Edward any ground of complaint against France for such severities. But when he laid these pretended injuries before the parliament, which met at Westminster on the 7th of June, 1344, whom he affected to consult on all occasions, that assembly entered into the quarrel, advised the king not to be amused by a fraudulent truce, and granted him supplies for the renewal of the war: the counties were charged with a fifteenth for two years, and the boroughs with a tenth. The clergy consented to give a tenth of the produce of their livings for three years. He raised a farther sum by summoning every gentleman in the kingdom possessed of forty pounds a year to repair to court by the 10th of August, in order to receive the honour of knighthood, or to pay a pecuniary fine to have his attendance dispensed with. This was a species of extortion frequently practised in the times we are delineating, and authorized by the feudal institutions.

These supplies enabled the king to complete his military preparations; and having published a manifesto, containing his reasons for renewing the war before the expiration of the truce, he dispatched a small force into Bretagne, under sir Thomas Dagworth, to assist the countess of Montfort and her adherents; he then sent his cousin, Henry earl of Derby, son of the earl of Lancaster, into Guienne, for the defence of that province. This prince, the most accomplished in the English court, possessed to a high degree the virtues of justice and humanity, as well as those of valour and conduct (i); and not content with protecting and cherishing the province committed to his care, he made a successful invasion on the enemy. He attacked Bernard count de L'Isle, the French general, at Bergerac, beat him from his entrenchments, and took the place. He reduced a great part of Perigord, and continually advanced in his conquests, till the count de L'Isle, having collected an army of ten or twelve thousand men, sat down before Aubroche, in hopes of recovering that place, which had fallen into the hands of the English. The earl of Derby came upon them by surprize, with only a thousand cavalry, threw the French into disorder, pushed his advantages and obtained a complete victory. L'Isle himself, with many considerable nobles, was taken prisoner. After the action, Derby returned to Bourdeaux; and having put his troops into winter quarters, sailed to England, to solicit a reinforcement.

About this time John de Montfort, who had languished in prison for four years, effected his escape from the Louvre in the disguise of a beggar, and soon after repaired to the court of Edward; to whom, as king of France, he did homage for the duchy of Bretagne, on the 20th of May, 1345; and in the following month returned to the continent with a supply of English troops, which enabled him to make some progress in support of his pretensions. But he was not long permitted to enjoy the flattering prospect that had opened itself to his view, being seized with a fever at Hennebonne, which put an end to his life on the 20th of September.

The earl of Derby had, in the month of June, returned to Guienne, with the reinforcement he had come over to solicit, and had pursued his conquests with astonishing rapidity and success. He took Monsegur, Monsepat, Villefranche, Miremont, and Tonnins, with the fortress of Damassen. Aiguillon, a fortress deemed impregnable, fell into his hands from the cowardice of the governor. Angouleme was surrendered after a short siege. The only place where he met with considerable resistance was Reole, which, however, was at last reduced, after a siege of above nine weeks. He made an attempt on Blaye, but thought it more prudent to raise the siege, than waste his time before a place of small importance.

While the earl of Derby was thus actively engaged, Edward had made a voyage to Flanders, in the hope of obtaining that earldom for his son; but his patron and ally, James D'Arteville, the brewer of Ghent, who had induced him to undertake this expedition, being massacred on the 17th of July, by that very populace who had so long revered him as their idol, the king was compelled to forego his designs, and returned to his own dominions.

The reason why the earl of Derby was permitted to make, without opposition, such progress on the side of Guienne, was the difficulties under which the French finances then laboured, and which had obliged Philip to lay on new impositions, particularly the duty on salt, to the great discontent, and almost mutiny, of his subjects. But after the court of France was supplied with money, great preparations were made; an army of one hundred thousand men was collected: and the duke of Normandy, attended by the duke of Burgundy and other great nobility, led towards Guienne a powerful army, which the English could not think of resisting in the open field. The earl of Derby stood on the defensive, and allowed the French to carry on, at leisure, the siege of Angouleme, which was their first enterprize. John lord Norwich, the governor, after a brave and vigorous defence, found himself reduced to such extremities, as obliged him to employ a stratagem, in order to save his garrison, and to prevent his being reduced to surrender at discretion. He appeared on the walls, and desired a parley with the duke of Normandy. The prince there told Norwich, that he supposed he intended to capitulate. "Not at all," replied the governor: "but as to-morrow is the feast of the Virgin, to whom I know that you, Sir, as well as myself, bear a great devotion, I desire a cessation of arms for that day." The proposal was agreed to; and Norwich, having ordered his forces to prepare all their baggage, marched out next day, and advanced towards the French camp. The besiegers, imagining they were to be attacked, ran to their arms; but Norwich sent a messenger to the duke, reminding him of his engagement. The duke, who piqued himself on faithfully keeping his word, exclaimed, "I see the governor has outwitted me: but let us be content with gaining possession of the town: and the English were allowed to pass through the camp unmolested. After some other successes, the duke of Normandy laid siege to Aiguillon; and as the natural strength of the fortress, together with a brave garrison under the command of the earl of Pembroke and sir Walter Manny, rendered it impossible to take the place by assault, he purposed, after making several fruitless attacks, to reduce it by famine: but, before he could finish this enterprize, he was called to another quarter of the kingdom, by one of the greatest disasters that ever befel the French monarch.

(i) It is reported of this prince, that having once, before the attack of a town, promised the soldiers the plunder, one private man happened to fall upon a great chest full of money, which he immediately brought to the earl, as thinking it too great for himself to keep possession of. But Derby told him that his promise did not depend on the greatness or smallness of the sum; and ordered him to keep it all for his own use.

Edward, informed by the earl Derby of the great danger to which Guienne was exposed, had prepared a force with which he intended, in person, to bring it relief. He embarked at Southampton, on board a fleet of near a thousand sail of all dimensions; and carried with him, besides all the chief nobility of England, his eldest son, the prince of Wales, now fifteen years of age. The winds proved long contrary, and kept the fleet wind bound from the beginning of June, till the 10th of July, 1346; when the king, in despair of arriving in time at Guienne, was persuaded by Geoffrey d'Harcourt (k), to change the destination of his enterprize. The reasons urged by this nobleman, which had not before been duly weighed by Edward, began to make more impression, after the disappointments which he met with in his voyage to Guienne: he ordered his fleet to sail to Normandy, and safely disembarked his army at La Hogue, on the 12th of that month.

This army, which during the course of the ensuing campaign was crowned with the most splendid success, consisted of four thousand men at arms, ten thousand archers, ten thousand Welsh infantry, and six thousand Irish. The Welsh and Irish were light disorderly troops, fitter for doing execution in a pursuit, or scouring the country, than for any stable action. The bow was always esteemed a frivolous weapon, where true military discipline was known, and regular bodies of well-armed foot maintained. The only solid force in this army were the men at arms; and even these, being cavalry, were on that account much inferior, in the shock of battle, to good infantry; and as the whole were new levied troops, we are led to entertain a very unfavourable idea of the military force of those ages, which, being ignorant of every other art, had not properly cultivated the art of war itself, the sole object of general attention.

The king created the earl of Arundel constable of his army, and the earls of Warwick and Harcourt mareschals: he bestowed the honour of knighthood on the prince of Wales and several of the young nobility immediately upon his landing. After destroying all the ships in la Hogue, Barfleur, and Cherbourg, he spread his army over the whole country, and gave them an unbounded licence of burning, spoiling, and plundering every place of which they became masters. The loose discipline then prevalent could not be much hurt by these disorderly practices; and Edward took care to prevent any surprize, by giving orders to his troops, however they might disperse themselves in the day-time, always to quarter themselves at night near the main body. In this manner Montebourg, Carentan, St. Lo, Valognes, and other places in the Cotentin, were pillaged without resistance; and the whole province was thrown into the utmost consternation.

The intelligence of this unexpected invasion soon reached Paris; and threw Philip into great perplexity. He issued orders, however, for levying forces in all quarters, and dispatched the count d'Eu, constable of France, and the count de Tancarville, with a body of troops, to the defence of Caen, a populous and commercial, but open city, which lay in the neighbourhood of the English army. The temptation of so rich a prize soon allured Edward to approach it; and the inhabitants, encouraged by their numbers, and by the reinforcements which they daily received from the country, ventured to meet him in the field. But their courage failed them on the first shock: they fled with precipitation: the counts d'Eu and Tancarville were taken prisoners: the victors entered the city along with the vanquished, and a furious massacre commenced, without distinction of age, sex, or condition. The citizens, in despair, barricadoed their houses, and assaulted the English with stones, bricks, and every missile weapon: the English made way by fire to the destruction of the citizens: till Edward, anxious to save both his spoils and his soldiers, stopped the massacre; and having obliged the inhabitants to lay down their arms, gave his troops licence to begin a more regular and less hazardous plunder of the city. The pillage continued for three days: the king reserved for his own share the jewels, plate, silks, fine cloth, and fine linen; and bestowed all the remainder of the spoil on his army. The whole was embarked on board the ships, and sent over to England; together with three hundred of the richest citizens of Caen, whose ransom was an additional profit, which he expected afterwards to levy. This dismal scene passed in the presence of two cardinal legates, who had come to negociate a peace between the kingdoms.

The king next advanced to Roüen, in hopes of treating that city in the same manner; but found that the bridge over the Seine was already broken down, and that the king of France himself was arrived there with his army. He marched along the banks of that river towards Paris, destroying the whole country, and every town and village which lay on his road. Some of his light troops carried their ravages even to the gates of Paris; and the royal palace of St. Germains, together with Nanterre, Ruelle, and some other villages, was reduced to ashes within sight of the capital. The English intended to pass the river at Poissy, but found the French army encamped on the opposite banks, and the bridge at that place, as well as all others over the Seine, broken down by orders from Philip. Edward now saw that the French meant to inclose him in their country, in hopes of attacking him with advantage on all sides; but he saved himself by a stratagem from this perilous situation. He gave his army orders to dislodge, and to advance farther up the Seine; but immediately returning by the same road, he arrived at Poissy, which the enemy had already quitted in order to attend his motions. He repaired the bridge with incredible celerity, passed over his army, and having thus disengaged himself from the enemy, advanced by quick marches towards Flanders. His vanguard, commanded by Harcourt, met with the townsmen of Amiens, who were hastening to reinforce their king, and defeated them with great slaughter: he passed by Beauvois, and burned the suburbs of that city; but as he approached the Somme, he found himself in the same difficulty as before: all the bridges on that river were either broken down, or strongly guarded: an army under the command of Godemar du Faye, was stationed on the opposite banks: Philip was advancing on him from the other quarter, with an army of an hundred thousand men; and he was thus exposed to the danger of being inclosed, and of starving in an enemy's country. In this extremity he published a reward to any one that should bring him intelligence of a passage over the Somme. A peasant, called Gobin Agace, whose name has been preserved by the share which he had in these important transactions, was tempted on this occasion to betray the interests of his country; and he informed Edward of a ford below Abbeville which had a sound bottom, and might be passed without difficulty at low water. The king hastened thither, but found Godemar du Faye on the opposite banks. Being urged by necessity, he deliberated not a moment; but threw himself into the river, sword in hand, at the head of his troops; drove the enemy from their station; and pursued them to a distance on the plain. The French army under Philip arrived at the ford when the rear-guard of the English were passing. So narrow was the escape which Edward, by his prudence and celerity, made from this danger! the rising of the tide prevented the French king from following him over the ford, and obliged that prince to take his rout over the bridge at Abbeville; by which some time was lost.

(k) This nobleman was a Norman by birth, had long made a considerable figure in the court of France, and was generally esteemed for his personal merit and his valour; but being disobliged and persecuted by Philip, he had fled into England; and recommended himself to Edward, who was an excellent judge of men; and had succeeded to Robert d'Artois in the invidious office of exciting and assisting the king in every expedition against his native country. He had long insisted, that an expedition to Normandy promised, in the present circumstanees, more favourable success than one to Guienne; that Edward would find the northern provinces almost destitute of military force, which had been drawn to the south; that they were full of flourishing cities, whose plunder would enrich the English; that their cultivated fields, as yet unspoiled by war, would supply them with plenty of provisions; and that the neighbourhood of the capital rendered every event of importance in those quarters.

It is natural to think that Philip, at the head of so vast an army, was impatient to take revenge on the English, and to prevent the disgrace to which he must be exposed if an inferior enemy should be allowed, after ravaging so great a part of his kingdom, to escape with impunity. Edward also was sensible that such must be the object of the French monarch; and, as he had advanced but a little way before his enemy, he saw the danger of precipitating his march over the plains of Picardy, and of exposing his rear to the insults of the numerous cavalry, in which the French camp abounded. He therefore chose his ground with advantage, near the village of Crecy; he disposed his army in excellent order; he determined to await in tranquillity the arrival of the enemy; and he hoped that their eagerness to engage and to prevent his retreat, after all their past disappointments, would hurry them on to some rash ill-concerted action. He drew up his army on a gentle ascent, and divided them into three lines: the first, consisting of eight hundred men at arms, four thousand archers, and six thousand Welsh infantry, was commanded by the prince of Wales, and under him by the earls of Warwick and Oxford, by Harcourt, and the lords Chandos, Holland, and other noblemen: the earls of Arundel and Northampton, with the lords Willoughby, Basset, Roos, and sir Lewis Tufton, were at the head of the second line, which was composed of eight hundred men at arms, four thousand halberdiers, and two thousand archers. He took to himself the command of the third division, consisting of seven hundred men at arms, five thousand three hundred billmen, and six thousand archers, by which he purposed either to bring succour to the two first lines, or to secure a retreat in case of any misfortune, or to push his advantages against the enemy. He had likewise the precaution to throw up trenches on his flanks, in order to secure himself from the numerous bodies of the French, who might assail him from that quarter; and he placed all his baggage behind him in a wood, which he also secured by an intrenchment.

The skill and order of this disposition, with the tranquillity in which it was made, served extremely to compose the minds of the soldiers; and the king, that he might farther inspirit them, rode through the ranks with such an air of cheerfulness and alacrity, as conveyed the highest confidence into every beholder. He pointed out to them the necessity to which they were reduced, and the certain and inevitable destruction which awaited them, if in their present situation, enclosed on all hands in an enemy's country, they trusted to any thing but their own valour, or gave that enemy an opportunity of taking revenge for the many insults and indignities which they had of late put upon him. He reminded them of the visible ascendant which they had hitherto maintained over all the bodies of the French troops that had fallen in their way; and assured them, that the superior numbers of the army which at present hovered over them, gave them not greater force, but was an advantage easily compensated by the order in which he had placed his own army, and the resolution which he expected from them. He demanded nothing, he said, but that they would imitate his own example, and that of the prince of Wales; and as the honour, the lives, the liberties of all were now exposed to the same danger, he was confident that they would make one common effort to extricate themselves from the present difficulties, and that their united courage would give them the victory over all their enemies.

It is related by some historians, that Edward, besides the resources which he found in his own genius and presence of mind, employed also a new invention against the enemy, and placed in his front some pieces of artillery, the first that had yet been made use of on any remarkable occasion in Europe (l). The invention of artillery was at this time known in France as well as in England; but Philip, in his hurry to overtake the enemy, had probably left his cannon behind him, which he regarded as a useless incumbrance. All his other movements discovered the same imprudence and precipitation. Impelled by anger, a dangerous counsellor, and trusting to the great superiority of his numbers, he thought that all depended on forcing an engagement with the English; and that, if he could once reach the enemy in their retreat, the victory on his side was certain and inevitable. He made a hasty march, in some confusion, from Abbeville; but after he had advanced above two leagues, some gentlemen, whom he had sent before to take a view of the enemy, returned to him, and brought him intelligence, that they had seen the English drawn up in great order, and awaiting his arrival. They therefore advised him to defer the combat till the ensuing day, when his army would have recovered from their fatigue, and might be disposed into better order than their present hurry had permitted them to observe. Philip assented to this counsel; but the former precipitation of his march, and the impatience of the French nobility, made it impracticable for him to put it in execution. One division pressed upon another: orders to stop were not seasonably conveyed to all of them: this immense body was not governed by sufficient discipline to be manageable; and the French army, imperfectly formed into three lines, arrived, already fatigued and disordered, in presence of the enemy. The first line, consisting of fifteen thousand Genoese cross-bow men, was commanded by Anthony Doria and Charles Grimaldi: the second was led by count d'Alençon, brother to the king: the king himself was at the head of the third. Besides the French monarch, there was no less than three crowned heads in this engagement: the king of Bohemia, the king of the Romans, his son, and the king of Majorca; with all the nobility and great vassals of the crown of France. The army now consisted of above one hundred and twenty thousand men, more than three times the number of the enemy. But the prudence of one man was superior to the advantage of all this force and splendour.

The English, on the approach of the enemy, kept their ranks firm and immoveable; and the Genoese first began the attack. There had happened, a little before the engagement, a thunder shower, which had moistened and relaxed the strings of the Genoese cross-bows; their arrows, for this reason, fell short of the enemy. The English archers, taking their bows out of their cases, poured in a shower of arrows upon this multitude who were opposed to them, and soon threw them into disorder. The Genoese fell back upon the heavy-armed cavalry of the count of Alençon; who, enraged at their cowardice, ordered his troops to put them to the sword. The artillery fired amidst the crowd; the English archers continued to send in their arrows among them; and nothing was to be seen in that vast body but hurry and confusion, terror and dismay. The young prince of Wales had the presence of mind to take advantage of this situation, and to lead on his line to the charge. The French cavalry, however, recovering somewhat their order, and encouraged by the example of their leader, made a stout resistance; and having at last cleared themselves of the Genoese runaways, advanced upon their enemies, and by their superior numbers began to hem them round. The earls of Arundel and Northampton now advanced their line to sustain the prince, who, ardent in his first feats of arms, set an example of valour, which was imitated by all his followers. The battle became, for some time, hot and dangerous; and the earl of Warwick, apprehensive of the event from the superior numbers of the French, dispatched a messenger to the king, and entreated him to send succours to the relief of the prince. Edward had chosen his station on the top of the hill; and he surveyed in tranquillity the scene of action. When the messenger accosted him, his first question was, whether the prince were slain or wounded? on his receiving an answer in the negative, "Return," said he, "to my son, and tell him that I reserve the honour of the day to him: I am confident that he will show himself worthy of the honour (l) This is the epoch of one of the most singular discoveries that has been made among men; a discovery which changed by degrees the whole art of war, and by consequence many circumstances in the political government of Europe. But the ignorance of that age in the mechanical arts rendered the progress of this new invention very slow. The artillery first framed were so clumsy, and of such difficult management, that men were not immediately sensible of their use and efficacy; and even to the present times, improvements have been continually making on this furious engine, which, though it seemed contrived for the destruction of mankind, and the overthrow of empires, has in the issue rendered battles less bloody, and has given greater stability to civil societies. Nations by its means have been brought more to a level: conquests have become less frequent and rapid: success in war has been reduced nearly to be a matter of calculation; and any nation overmatched by its enemies, either yields to their demands, or secures itself by alliances against their violence and invasion.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN EDW: III, AND THE PRINCE OF WALES,

of knighthood which I so lately conferred upon him: he will be able, without my assistance, to repel the enemy." This answer being reported to the prince and his attendants, inspired them with fresh courage: they made an attack with redoubled vigour on the French, in which the count d'Alençon was slain: that whole line of cavalry was thrown into disorder: the riders were killed or dismounted: the Welsh infantry rushed into the throng, and with their long knives cut the throats of all who had fallen; nor was any quarter given that day by the victors.

The king of France advanced in vain with the rear to sustain the line commanded by his brother: he found them already discomfited; and the example of their rout increased the confusion which was before but too prevalent in his own body. He had himself a horse killed under him: he was remounted; and, though left almost alone, he seemed still determined to maintain the combat; when John de Hainault seized the reins of his bridle, turned about his horse, and carried him off the field of battle. The whole French army took to flight, and was followed and put to the sword, without mercy, by the enemy; till the darkness of the night put an end to the pursuit. The king, on his return to the camp, flew into the arms of the prince of Wales, and exclaimed, "My valiant son! persevere in your honourable course: you are my son; for you have acquitted yourself nobly to-day: you have shewn yourself worthy the crown you are destined to wear."

The prince, whose modesty was equal to his courage, made no reply to this effusion of paternal satisfaction: the blush of unconscious merit suffused his youthful cheek; he sunk down on his knee, and demanded the blessing of his father.

This battle, which is known by the name of the battle of Crecy, began about three o'clock in the afternoon, of the 26th of August, 1346, and continued till evening. The next morning was foggy; and as the English observed that many of the enemy had lost their way in the night and in the mist, they employed a stratagem to bring them into their power: they erected on the eminences some French standards which they had taken in battle; and all who were allured by this false signal were put to the sword, and no quarter given them. In excuse for this inhumanity, it was alledged that the French king had given like orders to his troops; but the real reason probably was, that the English, in their present situation, did not chuse to be encumbered with prisoners. On the day of battle, and on the ensuing, there fell, by a moderate computation, one thousand two hundred French knights, one thousand four hundred gentlemen, four thousand men at arms, besides about thirty thousand of inferior rank: many of the principal nobility of France, the dukes of Lorraine and Bourbon, the earls of Flanders, Blois, Vaudemont, Aumale, Alençon, Auxerre, Sancerre, and St. Pol, were left on the field of battle. The king also of Bohemia and Majorca were slain (m). The loss of the English is not accurately known: Knyghton indeed asserts that it only amounted to one esquire, three knights, and a very few of inferior rank: but this assertion can only be believed by those who are possessed of sufficient credulity to accept it as a demonstration, that the prudent disposition planned by Edward, and the disorderly attack made by the French, had rendered the whole rather a rout than a battle; which was indeed the common case with engagements in those times.

The prudence of Edward appeared not only in obtaining this memorable victory, but in the measures which he pursued after it. Not elated by his present prosperity, so far as to expect the total conquest of France, or even that of any considerable provinces; he purposed only to secure such an easy entrance into that kingdom, as might afterwards open the way to more moderate advantages. He knew the extreme distance of Guienne: he had experienced the difficulty and uncertainty of penetrating on the side of the Low Countries, and had already lost much of his authority over Flanders by the death of d'Arteville. The king, therefore, limited his ambition to the conquest of Calais; and after the interval of a few days, which he employed in interring the slain, he marched from Crecy on the first of September, with his victorious army, and presented himself before that place on the 8th.

John of Vienne, a valiant knight of Burgundy, was governor of Calais, and being supplied with every thing necessary for defence, he encouraged the townsmen to perform to the utmost their duty to their king and country. Edward, therefore, sensible from the beginning that it was in vain to attempt the place by force, purposed only to reduce it by famine: he chose a secure station for his camp; drew entrenchments round the whole city; raised huts for his soldiers, which he covered with straw or broom; and provided his army with all the conveniences necessary to make them endure the winter season, which was approaching. As the governor soon perceived his intention, he expelled all the useless mouths; and the king had the generosity to allow these unhappy people to pass through his camp, and, it is said, he even supplied them with money to defray the expences of their journey.

While Edward was engaged in this siege, which employed him near a twelvemonth, there passed in different places many other events, and all to the honour of the English arms.

The retreat of the duke of Normandy from Guienne left the earl of Derby master of the field; and he was not negligent in making his advantage of the superiority. He took Mirebeau by assault: he made himself master of Lusignan in the same manner: Taillebourg and St. Jean d'Angeli fell into his hands; Poictiers opened its gates to him; and the earl of Derby having thus broken into the frontiers on that quarter, carried his incursions to the banks of the Loire, and filled all the southern provinces of France with horror and devastation.

The flames of war were at the same time kindled in Bretagne. Charles de Blois invaded that province with a considerable army, in the summer of 1347, and invested the fortress of Roche de Rien; but the countess of Montfort, reinforced by some English troops under sir Thomas Dagworth, attacked him during the night in his intrenchments, on the 20th of June, dispersed his army, and took Charles himself prisoner. His wife, by whom he enjoyed his pretensions to Bretagne, compelled by the present necessity, took on her the government of the party, and proved herself a rival in every shape, and an antagonist to the countess of Montfort, both in the field and in the cabinet. And while these heroic dames presented this extraordinary scene to the world, another princess in England, of still higher rank, showed herself no less capable of exerting every manly virtue.

The Scottish nation, after long defending, with incredible perseverance, their liberties against the superior force of the English, recalled their king David Bruce, in 1342. Though that prince, neither by his age nor capacity, could bring them great assistance, he gave them the countenance of sovereign authority; and as Edward's wars on the continent proved a great diversion to the force of England, they rendered the balance more equal between the kingdoms. In every truce which Edward concluded with Philip, the king of Scotland was comprehended; and when Edward made his last invasion upon France, David was strongly solicited by his ally to begin also hostilities, and to invade the northern counties of England. The nobility of his nation being always forward in such incursions, David soon mustered a great army, entered Northumberland at the head of above fifty thousand men, and carried his ravages and devastations to the gates of Durham. But queen Philippa, assembling a body of little more than twelve thousand men, which she entrusted to the command of lord Percy, ventured to approach him at Neville's Cross, near that city; and riding through the ranks of her army, exhorted every man to do his duty, and to take revenge on these barbarous ravagers. Nor could she be persuaded to leave the field, till the armies were on the point of engaging. The Scots have often been unfortunate in the great pitched battles which they fought with the English; even though they commonly declined such engagements where the superiority of numbers was not on their side: but never did they receive a more fatal blow than the present. They were broken and chased off the field: fifteen thousand of them, some historians say twenty thousand, were slain; among whom were Edward Keith, earl mareschal; and sir Thomas Charteris, chancellor; and the king himself was taken prisoner, with the earls of Sutherland, (m) The fate of the king of Bohemia was remarkable: he was blind from age; but being resolved to hazard his person, and set an example to others, he ordered the reins of his bridle to be tied on each side to the horses of two gentlemen of his train; and his dead body, and those of his attendants, were afterwards found among the slain, with their horses standing by them in that situation. The standard of this king, who acted as a volunteer, was taken and carried to the prince of Wales: on it was his crest, which was three ostrich feathers; and his motto these German words, "Ich dien," "I serve;" which the prince of Wales and his successors adopted in memorial of this great victory.

Fife, Monteith, Carrick, lord Douglas, and many other noblemen. This battle happened on the 17th of October.

Philippa, having secured her royal prisoner in the Tower, crossed the sea at Dover; and was received in the English camp before Calais with all the triumph due to her rank, her merit, and her success. This age was the reign of chivalry and gallantry: Edward's court excelled in these accomplishments as much as in policy and arms: and if any thing could justify the obsequious devotion then professed to the fair sex, it must be the appearance of such extraordinary women as shone forth during that period.

The town of Calais had been defended with remarkable vigilance, constancy, and bravery by the townsmen, during a siege of unusual length: but Philip, informed of their distressed condition, determined at last to attempt their relief; and he approached the English with an immense army, which the writers of that age make to amount to two hundred thousand men. But he found Edward so surrounded with morasses, and secured by intrenchments, that, without running on inevitable destruction, he concluded it impossible to make an attempt on the English camp. He had no other resource than to send his rival a vain challenge to meet him in the open field; which being refused, he was obliged to decamp with his army, and disperse them into their several provinces.

John de Vienne, governor of Calais, now saw the necessity of surrendering his fortress, which was reduced to the last extremity by famine (n) and the fatigue of the inhabitants. He appeared on the walls, and made a signal to the English centinels that he desired a parley. Sir Walter Manny was sent to him by Edward. "Brave knight," cried the governor, "I have been entrusted by my sovereign with the command of this town: it is almost a year since you besieged me; and I have endeavoured, as well as those under me, to do our duty. But you are acquainted with our present condition: we have no hopes of relief; we are perishing with hunger; I am willing therefore to surrender, and desire, as the sole condition, to ensure the lives and liberties of these brave men, who have so long shared with me every danger and fatigue. Manny replied, that he was well acquainted with the intentions of the king of England; that that prince was incensed against the townsmen of Calais for their pertinacious resistance, and for the evils which they had made him and his subjects suffer; that he was determined to take exemplary vengeance on them; and would not receive the town on any condition which should confine him in the punishment of these offenders. "Consider," replied Vienne, "that this is not the treatment to which brave men are entitled: if any English knight had been in my situation, your king would have expected the same conduct from him. The inhabitants of Calais have done for their sovereign what merits the esteem of every prince; much more of so gallant a prince as Edward. But I inform you, that if we must perish, we shall not perish unrevenged; and that we are not yet so reduced, but we can sell our lives at a high price to the victors. It is the interest of both sides to prevent these desperate extremities; and I expect that you yourself, brave knight, will interpose your good offices with your prince in our behalf." Manny was struck with the justness of the sentiments, and represented to the king the danger of reprisals, if he should give such treatment to the inhabitants of Calais. Edward was at last persuaded to mitigate the rigour of the conditions demanded: he only insisted that six of the most considerable citizens should be sent to him, to be disposed of as he thought proper; that they should come to his camp carrying the keys of the city in their hands, bareheaded and barefooted, with ropes about their necks; and, on these conditions, he promised to spare the lives of all the remainder. When this intelligence was conveyed to Calais, it struck the inhabitants with new consternation. To sacrifice six of their fellow-citizens to certain destruction for signalizing their valour in a common cause, appeared to them even more severe than that general punishment with which they were before threatened; and they found themselves incapable of coming to any resolution in so cruel and distressful a situation. At last one of the principal inhabitants, called Eustace de St. Pierre, whose name deserves to be recorded, stepped forth, and declared himself willing to encounter death for the safety of his friends and companions: another, animated by his example, made a like generous offer: a third and a fourth presented themselves to the same fate; and the whole number was soon completed. These six heroic burgesses appeared before Edward in the guise of malefactors, laid at his feet the keys of their city, and implored his mercy; but were ordered to be led to execution. It is surprizing that so generous a prince should ever have entertained such a barbarous purpose against such men; and still more that he should seriously persist in the resolution of executing it. But the entreaties of his queen saved his memory from that infamy: she threw herself on her knees before him, and, with tears in her eyes, begged the lives of these citizens. Having obtained her request, she carried them into her tent, ordered a repast to be set before them, and, after making them a present of money and clothes, dismissed them in safety (o).

The king took possession of Calais, on the 4th of August, 1347; and immediately, in order to secure a conquest which had cost him so much trouble to acquire, he executed an act of rigour, more justifiable, because more necessary, than that which he had before resolved on. He knew that, notwithstanding his pretended title to the crown of France, every Frenchman regarded him as a mortal enemy; and therefore ordered all the inhabitants of Calais to evacuate the town, and he peopled it anew with English; a policy which probably preserved so long to his successors the dominion of that important fortress. He made it the staple of wool, leather, tin, and lead; the four chief, if not sole commodities of the kingdom, for which there was any considerable demand on the continent. All the English were obliged to bring thither these goods: foreign merchants came to the same place in order to purchase them; and at a period when posts were not established, and when the communication between states was so imperfect, this institution, though it hurt the navigation of England, was probably of advantage to the kingdom.

Through the mediation of the pope's legates, Edward concluded a truce with France, to continue till the 8th of July, 1348; and which was afterwards prolonged by different treaties, till the year 1355: but, even during this cessation of arms, he had very nearly lost Calais, the sole fruit of all his boasted victories. The king had entrusted that place to Aimerie de Pavie, an Italian, who had discovered bravery and conduct in the wars, but was utterly destitute of every principle of honour and fidelity. He then embarked for England with his family, and landed at Sandwich on the 12th of October, 1347. Amerie de Pavie, agreed to deliver up Calais for the sum of twenty thousand crowns; and Geoffrey de Charni, who commanded the French forces in those quarters, and who knew that, if he succeeded in this service, he should not be disavowed, ventured, without consulting his master, to conclude the bargain with him. Edward, informed of this treachery by means of Aimerie's secretary, summoned the governor to London on other pretences; and having charged him with the guilt, promised him his life, but on condition that he would turn the contrivance to the destruction of the enemy. The Italian easily agreed to this double treachery. A day was appointed for the admission of the French; and Edward, having prepared a force of about a thousand men, under sir Walter Manny, secretly departed from London, carrying with him the prince of Wales; and, without being suspected, arrived the evening before at Calais. He made a proper disposition for the reception of the enemy, and kept all his forces and the garrison under arms. On the appearance of Charni, at the gate of Boulogne, a chosen band of French soldiers was admitted (n) It is asserted, that the distresses of the town were so great, their provisions having been long expended, that neither a horse, cat or any species of vermin that was eatable, however impalatable and disgusting, remained in the town.

(o) Such is the account of this extraordinary transaction, as recorded by Froissard; but it should be remembered, that it rests on the single testimony of that author, since all subsequent writers have taken it from him, whose frequent errors and misrepresentations are universally acknowledged. Robert de Avesbury, a contemporary writer, says not a word on the subject; and his history of the reign of Edward III. up to the year 1356, is remarked for its correctness and fidelity. From this consideration, and from an attentive review of Edward's character, we are strongly inclined to doubt the veracity of Froissard's account, and to believe that his love of the marvellous, so frequently visible in his works, induced him to exaggerate. Edward, exasperated by the obstinacy of their resistance, might possibly excite the fears of the inhabitants of Calais in an unjustifiable manner, by promulgating a pretended resolution to sacrifice six of the principal citizens; but we cannot believe that he could seriously intend to punish with death an uncommon portion of courage; when, at other times, acts of extraordinary valour formed the chief objects of his praise and admiration.

admitted at the postern; and Aimerie, receiving the stipulated sum, promised that, with their assistance, he would immediately open the great gate to the troops, who were waiting with impatience for the fulfilling of his engagement. All the French who entered were immediately slain, or taken prisoners, on the 1st of January, 1349: the great gate opened: Edward rushed forth with cries of battle and of victory: the French, though astonished at the event, behaved with valour: a fierce and bloody engagement ensued. As the morning broke, the king, who was not distinguished by his arms, and who fought as a private man under the standard of sir Walter Manny, remarked a French gentleman, called Eustace de Ribaumont, who exerted himself with singular vigour and bravery; and he was seized with a desire of trying a single combat with him. He stepped forth from his troop, and challenging Ribaumont by name (for he was known to him), began a sharp and dangerous encounter. He was twice beaten to the ground by the valour of the Frenchman: he twice recovered himself: blows were redoubled with equal force on both sides: the victory was long undecided; till Ribaumont, perceiving himself to be left almost alone, called out to his antagonist, "Sir knight, I yield myself your prisoner;" and at the same time delivered his sword to the king. Most of the French, being overpowered by numbers, and intercepted in their retreat, lost either their lives or their liberty (p).

Shortly after Edward's landing in England from Calais, he summoned a parliament to assemble at Westminster on the 14th of January, 1348, and asked their advice as to the propriety of attempting to negociate a solid peace during the continuation of the truce: and as to the most effectual means of preserving the internal peace of the kingdom. The commons, recollecting how dearly they had paid for the last counsels they had afforded him, were careful not to advise him to pursue the war, as the demand of a subsidy would, they knew, be the inevitable consequence. The king, finding them backward in offering what he wished them to grant, speedily dismissed them; and in a short time summoned another parliament, to meet at the same place, on the 17th of March. He there represented the alarming preparations of France for an invasion of his dominions; and demanded an aid, that he might be enabled to adopt such means as should be deemed necessary for averting a danger of so serious a nature. The commons, after making heavy complaints of the late onerous imposts, and strenuously pleading their extreme poverty, granted him a supply of three fifteenths, to be expressly appropriated to defray the expences of the war.

The prudent conduct and great success of Edward in his foreign wars had excited a strong emulation, and a military genius among the English nobility; and these turbulent barons, overawed by the crown, gave now a more useful direction to their ambition, and attached themselves to a prince who led them to the acquisition of riches and of glory. That he might farther promote the spirit of emulation and obedience, the king instituted the order of the Garter, in imitation of some orders of a like nature, religious as well as military, which had been established in different parts of Europe. The number received into this order consisted of twenty-five persons, besides the sovereign; and as it has never been enlarged, this badge of distinction continues as honourable as at its first institution, and is still as valuable, though a cheap present, which the prince can confer on his greatest subjects. A vulgar story prevails, but is not supported by any ancient authority, that at a court-ball, Edward's mistress, commonly supposed to be the countess of Salisbury, dropped her garter; and the king, taking it up, observed some of the courtiers to smile, as if they thought that he had not obtained this favour merely by accident: upon which he called out, "Honi soit qui mal y pense," i. e. "Evil be to him that evil thinks;" and as every incident of gallantry among those ancient warriors was magnified into a matter of great importance, he instituted the order of the Garter in memorial of this event, and gave these words as the motto of the order. The origin, though frivolous, is not unsuitable to the manners of the times; and it is indeed difficult by any other means to account, either for the seemingly unmeaning terms of the motto, or for the peculiar badge of the garter, which seems to have no reference to any purpose either of military use or ornament (q).

But a sudden damp was thrown over this festivity and triumph of the court of England, by a destructive pestilence which invaded that kingdom, as well as the rest of Europe; and is computed to have swept away near a third of the inhabitants in every country which it attacked. It was probably more fatal in great cities than in the country; and above fifty thousand souls are said to have perished by it in London alone (r). This malady first discovered itself in the north of Asia, was spread over all that country, made its progress from one end of Europe to the other, and sensibly depopulated every state, through which it passed. So grievous a calamity, more than the pacific disposition of the princes, served to maintain and prolong the truce between France and England.

While England was afflicted with this grievous calamity, its coasts were infested and insulted by a formidable fleet of Spanish pirates, consisting of forty sail of strong ships, supposed to be secretly instigated by the court of France; and these daring depredators, not content with taking every vessel that came in their way, had the audacity to meditate an invasion, and even to flatter themselves with the conquest of the kingdom. Edward, however, soon put a stop to their destructive courses; for, having embarked on board a powerful fleet, accompanied by many of his chief nobility, he came up with the pirates, off Winchelsey, on the 29th of August, 1350; and after a severe conflict, obtained a compleat victory, and took twenty-four of their vessels.

During this true Philip de Valois died, without being able to re-establish the affairs of France, which his ill success against England had thrown into disorder. This monarch, during the first years of his reign, and obtained the appellation of Fortunate, and acquired the character of prudent; but he ill maintained either the one or the other; less from his own fault, than because he was over-matched by the superior fortune and superior genius of Edward. But the incidents in the reign of his son John gave the French nation cause to regret even the calamitous times of his predecessor. John was distinguished by many virtues, particularly a scrupulous honour and fidelity: he was not deficient in personal courage: but he wanted that masterly prudence and foresight, which his difficult situation required. Soon after his accession this prince renewed the truce with England; but the mutual animosity which prevailed between the two nations induced its violation whenever an opportunity occurred. Frequent incursions

(p) The French officers who had fallen into the hands of the English were conducted into Calais; where Edward discovered to them the antagonist with whom they had the honour to be engaged, and treated them with great regard and courtesy. They were admitted to sup with the prince of Wales and the English nobility; and, after supper, the king himself came into the apartment, and went about conversing familiarly with one or other of his prisoners. He even addressed himself to Charni, and avoided reproaching him, in too severe terms, with the treacherous attempt which he had made upon Calais during the truce: but he openly bestowed the highest encomiums on Ribaumont! called him the most valorous knight that he had ever been acquainted with; and confessed that he himself had at no time been in so great danger as when engaged in combat with him. He then took a string of pearls, which he wore about his own head, and throwing it over the head of Ribaumont, he said to him, "Sir Eustace, I bestow this present upon you as a testimony of my esteem for your bravery: and I desire you to wear it a year for my sake: I know you to be gay and amorous, and to take delight in the company of ladies and damsels; let them all know from what hand you had the present: you are no longer a prisoner; I acquit you of your ransom; and you are at liberty to-morrow to dispose of yourself as you think proper." Though the human mind may be replete with contradictory sentiments, and subject to continual changes that baffle all arguments, it is difficult to conceive that a prince, who could act thus generously, should be guilty of such flagrant barbarity as is laid to the charge of Edward in his conduct to the six citizens of Calais.

(q) The institution of this noble order consisted of the king of England, as sovereign, and twenty-five knights, companions; and as the number has never been augmented, this badge of distinction continues as honourable as at its first institution. On the festival of St. George this year, (1349) the knights walked bareheaded in procession, clad in gowns of russet, and mantles of fine blue woollen cloth, with the rest of the habit of the order, to St. George's Chapel, Windsor; where they heard mass celebrated by William Edendon, bishop of Winchester, prelate of the order; and, after divine service was finished, they returned to a sumptuous entertainment! The solemnity concluded with military sports of tilts and tournaments; at which David Bruce, with other prisoners of quality, both Scots and French, were permitted to assist. Indeed these diversions formed the principal occupation of Edward in times of peace, probably as much from motives of policy as inclination, that he might thereby keep the minds of his martial barons employed; for, as war was their only source of amusement, when public tranquillity was restored, and nothing remained to fix their attention, they were to apt to give way to their turbulent spirit, and seek for employment in seditious practices.

(r) Stowe's Survey, p. 478. There were buried fifty thousand bodies in one church-yard, which sir Walter Manny had bought for the use of the poor; on which was afterwards founded a convent of Carthusian friars. The same author says, that there died above fifty thousand persons of the plague in Norwich, which is quite incredible.

were made, both by the English and French governors, on the territories of each other, in the course of the two succeeding years; which, as usual, gave rise to mutual complaints; but no event occurred of sufficient importance to be recorded in history, except an action on the plain of Mauron, near Rennes, in Bretagne, which took place on the 14th of August, 1352, between a body of English troops under the command of sir Walter Bentley, and a French army under the mareshal de Nesle, in which the former, though taken by surprize, and greatly inferior in numbers to the enemy, obtained a complete victory. The French general was slain, with eighty knights and five hundred gentlemen; and one hundred and sixty knights and gentlemen were made prisoners.

Edward, conscious that the hour of victory was the most proper time for securing an advantageous peace, seems at this period to have been seriously inclined to listen to terms of accommodation. A negociation having taken place, under the mediation of the pope, he gave instructions to his plenipotentiaries, the archbishop of Canterbury and the duke of Lancaster, to propose his entire resignation of the French crown, on condition that the king of France would, in return, give up to him the absolute sovereignty of Guienne, Aquitaine, and the town and marches of Calais. But these proposals were rejected by John, though the state of his kingdom, weakened by frequent and unsuccessful exertions, and shaken by intestine feuds, should have urged him to seek for peace on almost any terms he could procure. The dangerous faction that now prevailed in France owed its origin to Charles king of Navarre, who received the epithet of the bad or wicked, and whose conduct fully entitled him to that appellation (s).

The constable of Eu, who had been taken prisoner by Edward at Caen, recovered his liberty, on the promise of delivering as his ransom the town of Guisnes, near Calais, of which he was superior lord: but as John was offended at this stipulation, which, if fulfilled, opened still farther that frontier to the enemy; and as he suspected the constable of more dangerous connexions with the king of England, he ordered him to be seized, and, without any legal or formal trial, caused him to be assassinated in prison. Charles de la Cerda was appointed constable in his place; and had a like fatal end: the king of Navarre ordered him to be assassinated; and such was the weakness of the crown, that this prince, instead of dreading punishment, would not even agree to ask pardon for his offence, but on condition that he should receive an accession of territory: and he had also John's second son put into his hands as a security for his person, when he came to court, and performed this act of mock penitence and humiliation before his sovereign, in the year 1354.

The two French princes seemed entirely reconciled; but this dissimulation, to which John submitted from necessity, and Charles from habit, did not long continue; and the king of Navarre knew that he had reason to apprehend the most severe vengeance for the many crimes and treasons which he had already committed, and the still greater, which he was meditating. To ensure himself of protection, he entered into a secret correspondence with England, by means of Henry earl of Derby, now earl of Lancaster, who at that time was employed in fruitless negociations for peace at Avignon, under the mediation of the pope. John detected this correspondence; and to prevent the dangerous effects of it, he sent forces into Normandy, the chief seat of the king of Navarre's power, and attacked his castles and fortresses. But hearing that Edward had prepared an army to support his ally, he had the weakness to propose an accommodation with Charles, and even to give this traiterous subject the sum of a hundred thousand crowns as the purchase of a feigned reconcilement, which rendered him still more dangerous; for he employed the money in the acquisition of new partizans. The king of Navarre, insolent from past impunity, and desperate from the dangers which he apprehended, continued his intrigues; and associating himself with Geoffrey d'Harcourt, who had received his pardon from Philip de Valois, but persevered still in his factious disposition, he increased the number of his adherents in every part of the kingdom. He even seduced, by his address, Charles the king of France's eldest son, a youth of seventeen years of age, who was the first that bore the appellation of Dauphin, by the re-union of the province of Dauphiny to the crown. But this prince, being made sensible of the danger and folly of these connexions, promised to make atonement for the offence by the sacrifice of his associates; and, in concert with his father, he invited the king of Navarre, and other noblemen of the party, to a feast at Rouen, where they were betrayed into the hands of John. Some of the most noxious were immediately led to execution; the king of Navarre was thrown into prison: but this stroke of severity in the king, and of treachery in the dauphin, was far from proving decisive in maintaining the royal authority. Philip of Navarre brother to Charles, and Geoffrey d'Harcourt, put all the towns and castles belonging to that prince in a posture of defence; and had immediate recourse to the protection of England in this deperate extremity.

The truce between the two kingdoms, which had always been ill observed on both sides, expired at Midsummer in 1355; and Edward was entirely free to support the French malcontents. Well pleased that the factions in France had at length gained him some partizans in that kingdom, which his pretensions to the crown had never been able to accomplish, he purposed to attack his enemy both on the side of Guienne, under the command of the prince of Wales, and on that of Calais, in his own person.

Young Edward sailed from Plymouth, and arrived in the Garonne with his army, on board a fleet of three hundred sail, on the 10th of September, attended by the earls of Warwick, Salisbury, Oxford, Suffolk, and other English noblemen. Being joined by the vassals of Gascony, he took the field; and as the present disorders in France prevented every proper plan of defence, he carried on with impunity his ravages and devastations, according to the mode of war in that age. He reduced all the villages and several towns in Languedoc to ashes: he presented himself before Thoulouse; passed the Garonne, and burned the suburbs of Cacassonne; advanced even to Narbonne, laying every place waste around him; and after an incursion of six weeks, returned with a vast booty and many prisoners to Guienne, where he took up his winter quarters. The constable of Bourbon, who commanded in these provinces, received orders, though at the head of a superior army, on no account to run the hazard of a battle.

The king of England's incursion from Calais (t) was of the same nature, and attended with the same issue. He broke into France at the head of a numerous army; to which he gave a full licence of plundering and ravaging the open country. He advanced to St. Omer, where the king of France was posted; and on the retreat of that prince followed him to Hesdin. John still kept at a distance, and declined an engagement: but, in order to save his reputation, he sent Edward a challenge to fight a pitched battle with him; a usual bravado in that age, derived from the practice of single combat, and ridiculous in the art of war. The king finding no sincerity in this defiance, retired to Calais, and thence went over to England, in order to defend that kingdom against a threatened invasion of the Scots.

The Scots, taking advantage of the king's absence, and that of the military power of England, had surprized Berwick; and had collected an army with a view of committing ravages upon the northern provinces: but on the approach of Edward (u) they abandoned that place, which was not tenable while the castle was in the hands of the English; and retiring to their mountains, gave the enemy full liberty of burning and destroying the whole country from Berwick to Edinburgh. Baliol attended Edward on (s) This prince was descended from the males of the blood royal of France; his mother was daughter of Lewis Hutin; he had himself espoused a daughter of king John: but all these ties, which ought to have connected him with the throne, gave him only greater power to shake and overthrow it. With regard to his personal qualities, he was courteous, affable, engaging, eloquent; full of insinuation and address; inexhaustible in his resources; active and enterprizing. But these splendid accomplishments were attended with such defects as rendered them pernicious to his country, and even ruinous to himself: he was volatile, inconstant, faithless, revengeful, malicious: restrained by no principle or duty: insatiable in his pretensions; and whether successful or unfortunate in one enterprize, he immediately undertook another, in which he was never deterred from employing the most criminal and most dishonourable expedients.

(t) King Edward landed at Calais, with a numerous army, in the month of October.

(u) Upon Edward's return to England from Calais, he summoned a parliament to meet at Westminster on the 23rd of November; at which sir Walter Manny, by order of his sovereign, gave an account of the Scottish invasion; and demanded an aid, to enable the king to bring the war to a speedy and propitious termination. This demand gave rise to some debate; which, however, ended in a determination to grant a liberal supply of fifty shillings on every sack of wool exported for three years.

this expedition; but finding that his constant adherence to the English had given his countrymen an unconquerable aversion to his title, and that he himself was declining through age and infirmities, he finally resigned into the king's hands his pretensions to the crown of Scotland, and received in lieu of them an annual pension of two thousand pounds, with which he passed the remainder of his life in privacy and retirement. After this transaction the king returned to London, in the month of February, 1356; and the earl of Northumberland concluded a truce with the Scots till Michaelmas.

During these military operations, Edward received information of the increasing disorders in France, arising from the imprisonment of the king of Navarre; and he sent Lancaster, at the head of a small army, to support the partizans of that prince in Normandy. The war was conducted with various success; but chiefly to the disadvantage of the French malcontents; till an event happened in another quarter of the kingdom, which threatened the monarchy of France with annihilation.

The prince of Wales, encouraged by the success of the preceding campaign, marched from Bourdeaux on the 6th of July, 1356, with an army, which no historian makes amount to above twelve thousand men, viz. two thousand men at arms, six thousand archers, and four thousand infantry, of which not a third were English; and, with this small body, he ventured to penetrate into the heart of France. After ravaging the Agenois, Quercy, Auvergne, and the Limousin, he entered the province of Berry, and made some attacks, though without success, on the towns of Bourges and Issoudun. It appeared, that his intentions were to march into Normandy, and to join his forces with those of the earl of Lancaster and the partizans of the king of Navarre; but finding all the bridges on the Loire broken down, and every pass carefully guarded, he was obliged to think of making his retreat into Guienne. He found this resolution the more necessary, from the intelligence which he received of the king of France's motions. That monarch, provoked at the insult offered him by this incursion, and entertaining hopes of success from the young prince's temerity, collected a great army of above sixty thousand men, and advanced, by hasty marches, to intercept his enemy. The prince, not aware of John's near approach, lost some days on his retreat before the castle of Remorantin; which he took after a siege of six days, on the 4th of September; and thereby he gave the French an opportunity of overtaking him. They came within sight at Maupertuis near Poictiers, on the 17th of September; and Edward, sensible that his retreat was now become impracticable, prepared for battle with all the courage of a young hero, and with all the prudence of the oldest and most experienced commander. But the utmost prudence and courage would have proved insufficient to save him in this extremity, had the king of France known how to make use of his present advantages. His great superiority in numbers enabled him to surround the enemy; and, by intercepting all provisions, which were already become scarce in the English camp, to reduce this small army, without a blow, to the necessity of surrendering at discretion. But such was the impatient ardour of the French nobility, and so much had their thoughts been bent on overtaking the English as their sole object, that this idea never struck any of the commanders; and they immediately took measures for the assault, as for a certain victory. While the French army was drawn up in order of battle, on the ensuing morning, they were stopped by the appearance of the cardinal of Perigord; who, having learned the approach of the two armies to each other, had hastened, by interposing his good offices, to prevent any farther effusion of blood. By John's permission, he carried proposals to the prince of Wales; and found him so sensible of the bad posture of his affairs, that an accommodation seemed not impracticable. Edward told him, that he would agree to any terms consistent with his own honour and that of England; and he offered to purchase a retreat, by ceding all the conquests which he had made during this and the former campaign, by restoring all the prisoners and all the booty he had taken, and by stipulating not to serve against France during the course of seven years. But John, imagining that he had now got into his hands a sufficient pledge for the restitution of Calais, required that Edward should surrender himself prisoner with a hundred of his attendants; and offered, on these terms, a safe retreat to the English army. The prince rejected the proposal with disdain; and declared that whatever fortune might attend him, England should never have his ransom to pay. This resolute answer cut off all hopes of accommodation; but, as the day was already spent in negociating, the battle was delayed till the next morning, the 19th.

The cardinal of Perigord, as did all the prelates of the court of Rome, bore a great attachment to the French interest; but the most determined enemy could not, by any expedient, have done a greater prejudice to John's affairs than he did them by this delay. The prince of Wales had leisure, during the night, to strengthen, by new intrenchments, the post which he had before so judiciously chosen; and he contrived an ambush of three hundred men at arms, and as many archers, whom he put under the command of the Captal de Buche, and ordered to make a circuit, that they might fall on the flank or rear of the French army during the engagement. The van of his army was commanded by the earl of Warwick, the rear by the earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, the main body by the prince himself. The lords Chandos, Audeley, and many other brave and experienced commanders, were at the head of different corps of his army. John also arranged his forces in three divisions, nearly equal: the first was commanded by the duke of Orleans, the king's brother; the second by the dauphin, attended by his two younger brothers; the third by the king himself, who had by his side Philip his fourth son and favourite, then about fourteen years of age. There was no reaching the English army but through a narrow lane, covered on each side by hedges; and in order to open this passage, the mareschals Andrehen and Clermont were ordered to advance with a separate detachment of men at arms. While they marched along the lane, a body of English archers, who lined the hedges, plyed them on each side with their arrows; and being very near them, yet placed in perfect safety, they coolly took their aim against the enemy, and slaughtered them with impunity. The French detachment, much discouraged by the unequal combat, and diminished in their number, arrived at the end of the lane, where they met on the open ground the prince of Wales himself, at the head of a chosen body, ready for their reception. They were discomfited and overthrown: one of the mareschals was slain; the other taken prisoner: and the remainder of the detachment, who were still in the lane, and exposed to the shot of the enemy, without being able to make resistance, recoiled upon their own army, and put every thing into disorder. In that critical moment the Captal de Buche unexpectedly appeared, and attacked in flank the dauphin's line, which fell into some confusion. Landas, Bondenai, and St. Venant, to whom the care of that young prince and his brothers had been committed, too anxious for their charge or for their own safety, carried them off the field, and set the example of flight, which was followed by that whole division. The duke of Orleans, seized with a like panic, and imagining all was lost, thought no longer of fighting, but carried off his division by a retreat, which soon turned into a flight. Lord Chandos called out to the prince, that the day was won; and encouraged him to attack the division under king John, which, though more numerous than the whole English army, were somewhat dismayed with the precipitate flight of their companions. John here made the utmost efforts to retrieve by his valour what his imprudence had betrayed; and the only resistance made that day was by his line of battle. The prince of Wales fell with impetuosity on some German cavalry placed in the front, and commanded by the counts of Sallebruche, Nydo, and Nassau: a fierce battle ensued: one side were encouraged by the near prospect of so great a victory: the other were stimulated by the shame of quitting the field to an enemy so much inferior; but the three German generals, together with the duke of Athens constable of France, falling in battle, that body of cavalry gave way, and left the king himself exposed to the whole fury of the enemy. The ranks were every moment thinned around him: the nobles fell by his side one after another: his son, scarce fourteen years of age, received a wound, while he was fighting valiantly in defence of his father: the king himself, spent with fatigue, and overwhelmed by numbers, might easily have been slain; but every English gentleman, ambitious of taking alive the royal prisoner, spared him in the action, exhorted him to surrender, and offered him quarter: several who attempted to seize him suffered for their temerity. He still cried out, "Where is my cousin, the prince of Wales?" and seemed unwilling to become prisoner to any person of inferior rank. But being told that the prince was at a distance on the field, he threw down his gauntlet, and yielded himself to Dennis de Morbec, a knight of Arras, who had been obliged to fly his country for murder. His son was taken with him. The prince of Wales, who had been carried away in pursuit of the flying enemy, finding the field entirely clear, had ordered a tent to be pitched, and was reposing himself after the toils of battle; enquiring still with great anxiety concerning the fate of the French monarch. He dispatched the earl of Warwick to bring him intelligence; and that nobleman came happily in time to save the life of the captive prince, which was exposed to greater danger than it had been during the heat of the action. The English had taken him by violence from Morbec: the Gascons claimed the honour of detaining the royal prisoner: and some brutal soldiers, rather than yield the prize to their rivals, had threatened to put him to death. Warwick overawed both parties, and approaching the king with great demonstrations of respect, offered to conduct him to the prince's tent.

Here commences the real and truly admirable heroism of Edward: for victories are vulgar things in comparison of that moderation and humanity displayed by a young prince of twenty-seven years of age, not yet cooled from the fury of battle, and elated by as extraordinary and as unexpected success as had ever crowned the arms of any commander. He came forth to meet the captive king with all the marks of regard and sympathy; administered comfort to him amidst his misfortunes; paid him the tribute of praise due to his valour; and ascribed his own victory merely to the blind chance of war, or to a superior providence, which controls all the effects of human force and prudence. The behaviour of John shewed him not unworthy of this courteous treatment: his present abject fortune never made him forget a moment that he was a king: more touched by Edward's generosity than by his own calamities, he confessed, that, notwithstanding his defeat and captivity, his honour was still unimpaired; and that, if he yielded the victory, it was at least gained by a prince of such consummate valour and humanity. Edward ordered a magnificent repast to be prepared in his tent for the prisoner; and he himself served at the royal captive's table, as if he had been one of his retinue: he stood at the king's back during the meal; constantly refused to take a place at table; and declared, that, being a subject, he was too well acquainted with the distance between his own rank and that of royal majesty, to assume such freedom. All his father's pretensions to the crown of France were now buried in oblivion: John, in captivity, received the honours of a king, which were refused him when seated on the throne: his misfortunes, not his title, were respected; and the French prisoners, conquered by this elevation of mind, more than by their late discomfiture, burst into tears of admiration; which were only checked by the reflection, that such genuine and unaltered heroism in an enemy must certainly in the issue prove but the more dangerous to their native country (x).

The day after the battle, Edward ordered a general thanksgiving to the Dispenser of all human events for the glorious victory he had obtained: he then thanked his troops for the gallantry of their conduct, to which, under Heaven, he ascribed his success. As the lord Audley had signalized his bravery during the action in a very particular manner, the prince bestowed on him a grant of five hundred marks a year, to be paid out of his own inheritance; which that generous nobleman immediately divided among his four valiant esquires who had fought by his side during the action. Edward, informed of this circumstance, highly applauded an act in which justice and generosity coincided; confirmed the donation; and made a farther grant to the earl of six hundred marks a year, payable from the coinage of the stannaries of Cornwall.

The prince of Wales, finding his army not sufficiently powerful to pursue the advantages he had gained by extending his military operations, retired by easy marches to Bourdeaux, where he passed the winter. As the pope still continued to offer his mediation, and their misfortunes had rendered the French more tractable, a truce was concluded between England and France, on the 23rd of March, 1357, to continue for two years; and, on the 24th of the following month, prince Edward, accompanied by the French monarch and his son, and attended by a numerous train of English and French nobility, sailed from Bourdeaux, and arrived in England at the beginning of May. The king, on receiving the intelligence of his son's success, endued with that philosophic firmness of mind which adversity cannot sink to depression, nor prosperity transport beyond the limits of moderation, instead of evincing any extravagant symptoms of joy, ordered the archbishop of Canterbury to appoint a week of prayer and thanksgiving; which was religiously observed throughout the kingdom. He then ordered his son to be received with the honours that were due to his merit, and to the rank of the captive who accompanied him. The lord mayor was commanded to raise triumphal arches on the road, and to regulate the procession appointed to attend him. That magistrate accordingly met the prince in Southwark on the 24th of May, followed by the aldermen, adorned with the insignia of their office, and one thousand of the principal citizens. The captive monarch was arrayed in royal robes, and mounted on a superb white courser, conspicuous for its size and beauty, and the magnificence of its furniture; while his princely victor, habited in a simple manner, rode by his side on a black palfry, whose figure and trappings displayed an appearance of that humility which dignified and adorned the soul of its master. The houses were hung with tapestry and military weapons, and the streets were lined with an infinite concourse of people. In this situation, more glorious than a Roman emperor in the hour of triumph, insulting the misfortunes of his shackled captives, did the prince of Wales proceed to Westminster Hall; where his father descended from his throne, and advanced to meet the king of France, whom he received with the same respect and cordiality as if he had repaired to his court for the purpose of paying him a visit of friendship. When the ceremony of reception was over, John and his son were conducted to the palace of the Savoy; where they were entertained in the most sumptuous and hospitable manner (y).

The king of France, besides the generous treatment which he met with in England, had the melancholy consolation of the wretched, to see companions in affliction. The king of Scots had been eleven years a captive in Edward's hands; and the good fortune of this latter monarch had reduced at once the two neighbouring potentates, with whom he was engaged in war, to be prisoners in his capital. But Edward, finding that the conquest of Scotland was nowise advanced by the captivity of its sovereign, and that the government, conducted by Robert Stuart, his nephew and heir, was still able to defend itself, consented to restore David Bruce to his liberty, for the ransom of one hundred thousand marks sterling; and that prince delivered the sons of all his principal nobility as hostages for the payment, which was to be made in the course of ten years, during which time a truce was to subsist between the two nations.

Meanwhile, the captivity of John, joined to the preceding disorders of the French government, had produced in that country a dissolution, almost total, of civil authority, and had occasioned confusions, the most horrible and destructive that had ever been experienced in any age or in any nation. The dauphin, now (1358) about eighteen years of age, naturally assumed the royal power during his father's captivity; but though endowed with an excellent capacity, even in such early years, he possessed neither experience nor authority sufficient to defend a state, assailed at once by foreign power and shaken by intestine faction. In order to obtain supply, he assembled the states of the kingdom: that assembly, instead of supporting his administration, were themselves seized with the (x) All the English and Gascon knights imitated the generous example set them by their prince, and the captives were every where treated with humanity. History affords but few examples of a victory so complete and extraordinary as that of Poictiers. The French are said to have left on the field of battle two dukes, nineteen counts, a great number of knights and gentlemen, five thousand men at arms, and about eight thousand infantry; so that, if this account be true, the number of slain exceeded that of the whole British army. Besides the king and his son Philip, there were taken the counts of Ponthieu, Eu, and Tankarville, princes of the blood; the archbishop of Sens; seventeen counts; fifteen hundred barons, knights, and gentlemen, and several thousand men at arms. These were all set at liberty, except the king and his son, on paying a moderate ransom to the persons into whose hands they had fallen. The extent of their fortunes was considered; and an attention was given, that they should have sufficient means left to perform their military service in a manner suitable to their rank and quality. Every soldier in Edward's army was enriched with the spoils of the French camp, which amounted to a considerable sum; for, when the ransom of a captive did not exceed ten thousand crowns, it belonged to the captor; when more, it became the property of the king.

(y) It is impossible, in reflecting on this noble conduct, not to perceive the advantages which resulted from the otherwise whimsical principles of chivalry, and which gave men, in those rude times, some superiority even over a people of a more cultivated age and nation.

spirit of confusion; and laid hold of the present opportunity to demand limitations of the prince's power, the punishment of past malversations, and the liberty of the king of Navarre. Marcel, provost of the merchants, and first magistrate of Paris, put himself at the head of the unruly populace; and from the violence and temerity of his character, pushed them to commit the most criminal outrages against the royal authority. They detained the dauphin in a sort of captivity; they murdered in his presence Robert de Clermont and John de Conflans, mareschals, the one of Normandy, the other of Burgundy; they threatened all the other ministers with a like fate; and when Charles, who was obliged to temporize and dissemble, made his escape from their hands, they levied war against him, and openly erected the standard of rebellion. The other cities of the kingdom, in imitation of the capital, shook off the dauphin's authority; took the government into their own hands; and spread the disorder into every province. The nobles, whose inclinations led them to adhere to the crown, and were naturally disposed to check these tumults, had lost all their influence; and being reproached with cowardice on account of the base desertion of their sovereign in the battle of Poictiers, were treated with universal contempt by the inferior orders. The troops, who, from the deficiency of pay, were no longer retained in discipline, threw off all regard to their officers, sought the means of subsistence by plunder and robbery, and associating to them all the disorderly people, with whom that age abounded, formed numerous bands, which infested all parts of the kingdom. They desolated the open country, burned and plundered the villages; and by cutting off all means of communication or subsistence, reduced even the inhabitants of the walled towns to the most extreme necessity. The peasants, formerly oppressed and now left unprotected by their masters, became desperate from their present misery; and rising every where in arms, carried to the last extremity those disorders which were derived from the sedition of the citizens and disbanded soldiers. The gentry, hated for their tyranny, were every where exposed to the violence of popular rage; and instead of meeting with the regard due to their past dignity, became only, on that account, the object of more wanton insult to the mutinous peasants. They were hunted like wild beasts, and put to the sword without mercy: their castles were consumed with fire, and levelled to the ground: their wives and daughters were first ravished, then murdered: the savages proceeded so far as to impale some gentlemen, and roast them alive before a slow fire: a body of nine thousand of them broke into Meaux, where the wife of the dauphin, with above three hundred ladies, had taken shelter: the most brutal treatment and most atrocious cruelty were justly dreaded by this helpless company: but the Captal de Buche, though in the service of Edward, yet moved by generosity, and by the gallantry of a true knight, flew to their rescue, and beat off the peasants with great slaughter. In other civil wars, the opposite factions, falling under the government of their several leaders, commonly preserve still the vestige of some rule and order: but here the wild state of nature seemed to be renewed: every man was thrown loose and independent of his fellows; and the populousness of the country, derived from the preceding police of civil society, served only to increase the horror and confusion of the scene.

Amidst these disorders, the king of Navarre made his escape from prison, and presented a dangerous leader to the furious malcontents. But the splendid talents of this prince qualified him only to do mischief, and to increase the public distractions: he wanted the steadiness and prudence requisite for making his intrigues subservient to his ambition, and forming his numerous partizans into a regular faction. He revived his pretensions, somewhat obsolete, to the crown of France: but while he advanced his claim, he relied entirely on his alliance with the English, who were concerned in interest to disappoint his pretensions; and who, being public and inveterate enemies to the state, served only, by the friendship which they seemingly bore him, to render his cause the more odious. And in all his operations he acted more like a leader of banditti, than one who aspired to be the head of a regular government, and who was engaged, by his station, to endeavour the re-establishment of order in the community.

The eyes, therefore, of all the French, who wished to restore peace to their miserable and desolated country, were turned towards the dauphin; and that young prince, though not remarkable for his military talents, possessed so much prudence and spirit, that he daily gained the ascendant over all his enemies. Marcel, the seditious provost of Paris, was slain while he was attempting to deliver the city to the king of Navarre and the English; and the capital immediately returned to its duty. The most considerable bodies of the mutinous peasants were dispersed and put to the sword: some bands of military robbers underwent the same fate; and though many grievous disorders still remained, France began gradually to assume the face of a regular civil government, and to form some plan for its defence and security.

During the confusion of the dauphin's affairs, Edward seemed to have a favourable opportunity for pushing his conquests: but besides that his hands were tied by the truce, and he could only assist underhand the faction of Navarre; the state of the English finances and military power during those ages, rendered the kingdom incapable of making any regular or steady effort, and obliged it to exert its force at very distant intervals, by which all the projected ends were commonly disappointed. Edward employed himself, during a conjuncture so inviting, chiefly in negociations with his prisoner; and John had the weakness to sign terms of peace, on the 4th of May, 1359, which, had they taken effect, must have totally ruined and dismembered his kingdom. He agreed to restore all the provinces which had been possessed by Henry II. and his two sons, and to annex them for ever to England, without any obligation of homage or fealty on the part of the English monarch. But the dauphin and the states of France rejected this treaty, so dishonourable and pernicious to the kingdom; and Edward, on the expiration of the truce, having now by subsidies and frugality collected some treasure, prepared himself for a new invasion of France.

The great authority and renown of the king and the prince of Wales, the splendid success of their former enterprizes, and the certain prospect of plunder from the defenceless provinces of France; soon brought together the whole military power of England; and the same motives invited to Edward's standard all the hardy adventurers of the different countries of Europe. He sailed for Calais on the 27th of October, with an army of near a hundred thousand men (z); a force which the dauphin could not pretend to withstand in the open field: that prince, therefore, prepared himself to elude a blow which it was impossible for him to resist. He put all the considerable towns in a posture of defence, ordered them to be supplied with magazines and provisions; distributed proper garrisons in all places; secured every thing valuable in the fortified cities; and chose his own station at Paris, with a view of allowing the enemy to vent their fury on the open country.

Edward, aware of this plan of defence, was obliged to carry along with him six thousand waggons, loaded with the provisions necessary for the subsistence of his army. He marched from Calais on the 4th of November, and after ravaging the province of Picardy, he advanced into Champagne; and having a strong desire of being crowned king of France at Rheims, the usual place in which this ceremony is performed, he laid siege to that city, and carried on his attacks, though without success, for the space of seven weeks. The place was bravely defended by the inhabitants, encouraged by the exhortations of the archbishop John de Craon; till the advanced season (for this expedition was entered upon in the beginning of winter) obliged the king to raise the siege (a). The province of Champagne meanwhile was desolated by his incursions; and he thence conducted his army with a like intent into Burgundy. He took and pillaged Tonnerre, Gaillon, Avalon, and other small places; but the duke of Burgundy, that he might preserve his country from farther ravages, consented to pay him the sum of one hundred thousand nobles. Edward then bent his march towards the Nivernois, which saved itself by a similar composition: He laid waste Brie and the Gatinois; and after a long (z) Edward's fleet employed on this occasion, amounted to eleven hundred sail, on board of which were his four eldest sons, and all the principal nobility of England.

(a) Edward expected, from the success which had hitherto attended him in his military expeditions, to be invested with the royal diadem of France at the place; and the archbishops of Lincoln and Durham attended him for the express purpose of performing the ceremony of coronation.

march,

march, very destructive to France, and somewhat ruinous to his own troops, he appeared before the gates of Paris, and taking up his quarters at Bourg-la-Reine, extended his army to Long-jumeau, Mont-rouge, and Vaugirard. He tried to provoke the dauphin to hazard a battle, by sending him a defiance; but could not make that prudent prince change his plan of operations. Paris was safe from the danger of an assault by its numerous garrison; from that of a blockade by its well supplied magazines; and as Edward himself could not subsist his army in a country wasted by foreign and domestic enemies, and left also empty by the precaution of the dauphin, he was obliged to remove his quarters; and he spread his troops into the provinces of Maine, Beausse, and the Chartraine, which were abandoned to the fury of their devastations. The only repose which France experienced, was during the festival of Easter, in 1360, when the king stopped the course of his ravages. For superstition can sometimes restrain the rage of men, which neither justice nor humanity is able to control.

While the war was carried on in this ruinous manner, the negociations for peace were never interrupted: but as the king still insisted on the full execution of the treaty, which he had made with his prisoner at London, and which was strenuously rejected by the dauphin, there appeared no likelihood of an accommodation. The earl, now duke of Lancaster (for this title was introduced into England during the present reign) endeavoured to soften the rigour of these terms, and to finish the war on more equal and reasonable conditions. He insisted with Edward, that notwithstanding his great and surprising successes, the object of war, if such were to be esteemed the acquisition of the crown of France, was not become any nearer than at the commencement of it; or rather was set at a greater distance by those very victories and advantages which seemed to lead to it. That his claim of succession had not from the first procured him one partizan in the kingdom; and the continuance of these destructive hostilities had united every Frenchman in the most implacable animosity against him. That though intestine faction had creeped into the government of France, it was abating every moment; and no party, even during the greatest heat of the contest, when subjection under a foreign enemy usually appears preferable to the dominion of fellow-citizens, had ever adopted the pretensions of the king of England. The king of Navarre himself, who alone was allied with the English, instead of being a cordial friend, was Edward's most dangerous rival, and, in the opinion of his partizans, possessed a much preferable title to the crown of France. That the prolongation of the war, however it might enrich the English soldiers, was ruinous to the king himself, who bore all the charges of the armament, without reaping any solid or durable advantage from it. That if the present disorders of France continued, that kingdom would soon be reduced to such a state of desolation, that it would afford no spoils to its ravagers; if it could establish a more steady government, it might turn the chance of war in its favour, and by its superior force and advantages be able to repel the present victors. That the dauphin, even during his greatest distresses, had yet conducted himself with so much prudence, as to prevent the English from acquiring one foot of land in the kingdom; and it were better for the king to accept by a peace what he had in vain attempted to acquire by hostilities, which, however hitherto successful, had been extremely expensive, and might prove very dangerous: and that Edward having acquired so much glory by his arms, the praise of moderation was the only honour to which he could now aspire; an honour so much the greater, as it was durable, was united with that of prudence, and might be attended with the most real advantages.

These reasons induced Edward to accept of more moderate terms of peace; and it is confidently said, that, in order to palliate this change of resolution, he ascribed it to a vow made during a dreadful tempest, which attacked his army on their march (b). Be this as it may, the conferences between the English and French commissioners were carried on during a few days at Bretigni in the Chartraine, and the peace was at last concluded, May 8, 1360, on the following conditions: It was stipulated that king John should be restored to his liberty, and should pay as his ransom three millions of crowns of gold, about one million five hundred thousand pounds of our present money; which was to be discharged at different payments: that Edward should for ever renounce all claim to the crown of France, and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, Touraine, and Anjou, possessed by his ancestors; and should receive in exchange the provinces of Poictou, Xaintonge, l'Agenois, Perigord, the Limousin, Quercy, Rovergue, l'Angoumois, and other districts in that quarter, together with Calais, Guisnes, Montreuil, and the county of Ponthieu, on the other side of France: that the full sovereignty of all these provinces, as well as that of Guienne, should be vested in the crown of England, and that France should renounce all title to feudal jurisdiction, homage, or appeal from them: that the king of Navarre should be restored to all his honours and possessions: that Edward should renounce his confederacy with the Flemings, John his connexions with the Scots: that the disputes concerning the succession of Bretagne, between the families of Blois and Montfort, should be decided by arbiters appointed by the two kings; and if the competitors refused to submit to the award, the dispute should no longer be a ground of war between the two kingdoms; and that forty hostages, such as should be agreed on, should be sent to England as a security for the execution of all these conditions (c).

When Edward had completed the pacification, he embarked for England; and, on the 18th of May, landed at Rye in Sussex. About seven weeks after his arrival, on the 8th of July, he sent John to Calais, whither he soon after repaired himself; and there the treaty, after some deliberation, was solemnly ratified by the two kings, on the 24th of October. The next day John set out for Boulogne; and Edward accompanied him the distance of a mile from Calais, where they parted with the most cordial professions of mutual amity and esteem.

The good disposition of John made him fully sensible of the generous treatment which he had received in England, and obliterated all memory of the ascendant gained over him by his rival. There seldom has been a treaty of so great importance so faithfully executed by both parties. Edward had scarcely from the beginning entertained any hopes of acquiring the crown of France: by restoring John to his liberty, and making peace at a juncture so favourable to his arms, he had now plainly renounced all pretensions of this nature: he had sold at a very high price that chimerical claim: and had at present no other interest than to retain those acquisitions which he had made with such singular prudence and good fortune. John, on the other hand, though the terms were severe, possessed such fidelity and honour, that he was determined at all hazards to execute them, and to use every expedient for satisfying a monarch who had indeed been his greatest political enemy, but had treated him personally with singular humanity and regard. But, notwithstanding his endeavours, there occurred many difficulties in fulfilling his purpose; chiefly from the extreme reluctance which many towns and vassals in the neighbourhood of Guienne expressed against submitting to the English dominion.

The joy experienced by every class of people at the termination of a war which, though marked with success, had occasioned the exaction of numerous imposts, was excessive. But their satisfaction was speedily interrupted by a dreadful pestilence, which made its appearance in the spring of the year 1361, and destroyed great numbers of people; and among others the lords Mowbray and Seymour, and several other noblemen of rank: but the loss of no man caused such extreme regret as that of Henry duke of Lancaster, justly denominated The Good; a nobleman whose virtuous principles and numerous accomplishments, both of mind and person, highly deserved that esteem and affection in which he was universally held.

(b) At the distance of about two leagues from Chartres Edward's army was overtaken by a dreadful storm of hail, the stones of which were of such a prodigious size as to kill six thousand horses, and one thousand men. The king, frightened at the dreadful scene, threw himself prostrate on the ground; and extending his arms towards the church of Chartres, made a solemn vow no longer to reject the offers of peace, if he could obtain it on reasonable terms.

(c) The hostages were the two sons of the French king, John and Louis; his brother Philip duke of Orleans, the duke of Bourbon, James de Bourbon count de Ponthieu, the counts d'Eu, de Longueville, de St. Pol, de Harcourt, de Vendome, de Couci, de Craon, de Montmorency, and many of the chief nobility of France. The princes were mostly released on the fulfilling of certain articles: others of the hostages, and the duke of Berry among the rest, were permitted to return upon their parole, which they did not keep. Rymer, vol. vi. p. 278, 285, 287.

Edward,

Edward, finding his new subjects on the continent still averse to the English government, determined to place them under the immediate command of the prince of Wales, who was esteemed even by his enemies. The prince had lately married, by virtue of a dispensation from the pope, his cousin Jane, daughter and heiress of Edward Plantagenet, earl of Kent, and widow of Sir Thomas Holland; when his father had conveyed to him the county of Poictou, together with all the provinces in his possession from thence to the Pyrennees; and the king now farther invested him with the dignity of Prince of Aquitaine, accompanied by a grant of part of Gascony, and of all other territories which he enjoyed in France, subject to feudal homage, and an annual tribute of an ounce of gold.

The prince of Wales, having received the investiture of his new dominions, resolved to fix his residence at Bourdeaux, at which place he arrived in the month of February, 1363, and experienced a most welcome reception from all the nobles of that country, who immediately took the oath of fealty; and he soon found means, by a mild and equitable administration, to conciliate the affections of the people.

The final execution of the treaty of Bretigni, however, was still retarded, as above mentioned, by many of the French governors, who refused, in opposition to the orders of their sovereign, to evacuate the places entrusted to their command; the brother and two sons of the French king, the dukes of Orleans, Anjou, and Berry, who had been sent as hostages to the English court, evinced an anxiety to return to their native country; and they gave Edward to understand, that if they were removed to Calais they might by their influence remove those obstructions which delayed their liberation. They were accordingly conveyed thither, and suffered to enjoy as much liberty as they could desire; but, finding their efforts unsuccessful, the duke of Anjou broke his parole, and escaped into the dominion of his father, who severely reproved him for his dishonourable conduct; and in order to make atonement for his fault, he resolved to repair to England in person, to obviate the possibility of misrepresentation, and to concert measures with Edward for the accomplishment of the treaty. When his ministers, who thought honour should be subservient to policy, endeavoured to divert him from a resolution which to them appeared imprudent and dangerous, he told them, that "though honour and good faith were banished from every other place, they ought always to find an asylum in the bosoms of princes." A sentiment which shewed that the monarch who possessed it was worthy the crown he wore. John accordingly embarked for England, and was received by Edward with those marks of respect which his virtues so richly deserved. He was lodged in the Savoy, where he had resided during his captivity; and where he died of a fever, about three months after his arrival, on the 8th of April, 1364 (d).

John was succeeded in the throne of France by his son Charles the Fifth, a prince educated in the school of adversity, and well qualified, by his consummate prudence and experience, to repair all the losses which the kingdom had sustained from the errors of his two predecessors. Contrary to the practice of all the great princes of those times, which held nothing in estimation but military courage, he seems to have fixed it as a maxim never to appear at the head of his armies; and he was the first king in Europe that shewed the advantage of policy, foresight, and judgement, above a rash and precipitate valour. The events of his reign, compared with those of the preceding, are a proof how little reason kingdoms have to value themselves on their victories, or to be humbled by their defeats; which in reality ought to be ascribed chiefly to the good or bad conduct of their rulers, and are of little moment towards determining national characters and manners.

Before Charles could think of counterbalancing so great a power as England, it was necessary for him to remedy the many disorders to which his own kingdom was exposed. He turned his arms against the king of Navarre, the great disturber of France during that age: he defeated this prince by the conduct of Bertrand du Guesclin, a gentleman of Bretagne, one of the most accomplished characters of the age, whom he had the discernment to chuse as the instrument of all his victories: and he obliged his enemy to accept of moderate terms of peace. Du Guesclin was less fortunate in the wars of Bretagne, which still continued, notwithstanding the mediation of France and England: he was defeated and taken prisoner at Auray by John de Chandos, constable of Guienne: Charles of Blois was there slain, and the young count of Montfort soon after got entire possession of that duchy. But the prudence of Charles broke the force of this blow: he submitted to the decision of fortune: he acknowledged the title of Montfort, though a zealous partizan of England; and received the proffered homage for his dominions. But the chief obstacle which the French king met with in the settlement of the state proceeded from obscure enemies, whom their crimes alone rendered eminent, and their numbers dangerous.
